THE TWELVE-HOUR DAY

The joint statement on the twelve-hour day in the steel industry, issued to the press on June 6 by national Protestant, Catholic and Jewish bodies, was extensively commented on in the press. The editorials that have been received have been almost entirely favorable. The statement was agreed upon quickly and with a surprising unanimity of sentiment. There seems to be but one mind among church people on the subject. Conservative religious leaders who seldom take a hand in industrial affairs have indicated a marked interest in the twelve-hour day question and have shared the indignation which the American Iron and Steel Institute's report aroused. There is reason to believe that members of the Steel Institute itself who were influenced by the unanimous action of the twelve-hour day committee to concur in its findings were nevertheless disappointed in the report and felt that it had put them morally on the defensive. Some of the editorial comments have been instructive.

The "New York Times": "When church organizations representing many creeds find the twelve-hour day in the steel mills 'morally indefensible,' and declare that the report of the American Iron and Steel Institute committee adverse to cutting down the working day at this time 'shatters the public confidence that was inspired by the creation of the committee a year ago at the request of the President of the United States,' the United States Steel Corporation cannot fail to take notice."

The Philadelphia "Evening Public Ledger": "It may, as three great church organizations charge in a biting and bitter condemnation, be 'morally indefensible' and run 'counter to the teachings of religion.' The Federal Council of Churches, the National Catholic Welfare Council and the Central Conference of American Rabbis, in a joint statement say all of these things, and much more, of the twelve-hour day. All of these assertions can be defended and, may be, proved by the organizations making them. But the only thing needed to smash the steel industry's defense of its twelve-hour day is the fact that twelve hours is more hours than any man should work, one day after another, at any hard or heavy manual labor. Those who defend it have never known, or have forgotten, the strain it places on human tissues. . . . When, however, Protestant and Catholic and Jew, speaking for organizations claiming 50,000,000, declare that the twelve-hour day in steel must come to its sundown, it is time for the lords of steel to hearken and give ear."

The "New York World": "Judge Gary may have thought that he had closed the question of the twelve-hour day when he made his report at the recent meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute. Instead, the question is reopened with a vigor of attack unsurpassed thus far in the long campaign against this industrial outrage. Judge Gary, if we remember correctly, ventured to allude to the importance of religion in business. He now knows, if he did not know it before, that his twelve-hour policy is condemned by the whole of organized religion in America. . . . On the immorality of the twelve-hour day there is united opinion."

The Buffalo "Express": "That apologia for the twelve-hour day which recently emanated from the American Iron and Metal (Steel) Institute is the subject of the conclusive reply from the three great religious organizations. The religious leaders have not worded their condemnation too strongly. The report of the steel interests' committee appears to have been inspired solely by the fear that abolition of the twelve-hour day would add to the cost of producing steel. An unconscious influence was probably the industry's reluctance to go through the upheaval of management and methods that would be involved in creating a three-shift system where a two-shift system has prevailed. . . . As a clinching argument, the employers' committee declares that the abolition of the twelve-hour day will mean an increase in the cost of steel which must be borne by the public. If it does, the public should pay cheerfully. However expensive steel may be, it is cheaper than human beings. . . . The twelve-hour day in the steel industry approaches slavery even though for high wages."

The Providence "Tribune": "Never has public opinion, and influential public opinion, spoken so clearly and distinctly upon an economic problem. The church report analyzes the recent committee report and answers satisfactorily its argument. Along with the churches there is unanimous opposition to the twelve-hour day by newspapers throughout the country, by labor unions, by the inarticulate mass of men. . . . Elbert Gary, president of the United States Steel, at the same meeting which brought forth the committee's adverse report, pleaded for a return to the Bible and the principles of Christianity as the basis for business dealings throughout the world. If Judge Gary includes the United States Steel Corporation as one that is to be guided by the principles of Christ, surely he should be the first to echo the voice of the church in denouncing the twelve-hour day. We shall see."

The "Christian Science Monitor": "This statement on behalf of an organization representing to such a high degree the moral forces of the nation, should not merely attract the attention of the president of the steel corporation, but of the President of the United States as well. It is all very well, and wholly proper, to defer in some degree to the superior knowledge of the technicalities of operating great productive industries possessed by their officials. But it cannot be forgotten that those officials consider the matter mainly from the standpoint of immediate expense, and with direct, and often excessive, consideration of the interests of their stockholders. The time is past in all civilized countries when the interests of stockholders take precedence over the rights and immunities of men. The dollar in the dividend statement shall not count more than the good health, the happiness, and the morale of the workers who make that dollar possible."

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. THE SCHEME FOR REGIONAL RAILWAYS

On his trip westward, the President stopped at Kansas City to make a speech advocating a law to consolidate the railroad systems of our country into a few regional systems. Only in America and Great Britain are all the railroads still owned by private interests. Both governments took over the control of their railroads during the war and in both the railroads have had more or less difficulty since they have been turned back to private owners. The British have already consolidated their railroads into four great systems. The Esch-Cummins Law made similar consolidations permissible in the United States, except that the number of systems would be considerably greater than in Great Britain. But so long as the law is only permissive, the stronger roads may not be inclined to take over the weaker ones. So the President further believes that these regional consolidations should be made compulsory. The President has shown some courage in his choice of subjects for addresses. The last Senators elected from Missouri have been opposed to the League of Nations. It was in St. Louis that the President took occasion to advocate again our entry into the World Court, although he also most carefully divorced the Court from any connection with the League. Kansas City is not enthusiastic over regional consolidations lest such a move hurt its railroad business. The President's audience listened respectfully but without any very great appearance of enthusiasm in either case.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S AID TO THE FARMER

The little town of Hutchison is in the midst of the country's grain belt. The President stopped there on his westward trip to prove that he could cut wheat with a tractor and to tell the farmers about what the administration has done for agriculture. Needless to say the farmers and their wives and children flocked in from miles about. Chester O'Neal, on whose farm the President reaped a little wheat, reckoned that the cost per acre of raising wheat was as follows: $5 for interest, $1.50 for ploughing, 25 cents for harrowing, 33 cents for drilling, $2.50 for cutting, $2.25 for threshing, 72 cents for hauling and 85 cents for seeding. Mr. O'Neal also wanted to include taxes, but the President insisted that taxes were paid on all other investments and should be omitted. Thus the total cost for cultivating one acre of wheat would be $13.40. They reckoned that the average crop per acre might be put at eighteen bushels, although one of the farmers listening to the conversation said that fifteen bushels was a fairer estimate. Mr. O'Neal reported that he received only 85 cents a bushel. That would make the farmer net $1.90 per acre. If taxes came to $1.40 to $1.80 an acre, the farmer's profit would be practically wiped out. Such figures ought to give the whole country pause. It is self-evident that the farmers cannot go on raising crops which barely pay for themselves. The President later told the people of Hutchison and Kansas—and the country—about the banking measures which have been worked out by the administration in behalf of the farmers. Our ordinary banks were developed to serve merchants and manufacturers. Merchants and manufacturers commonly need credit only for a period of three or four months to allow for merchandizing. The farmer may need his credit for a period up to nine months or if he is raising live stock for a period up to three years. In the height of the deflation of prices, the property of many farmers was swept away because they could not renew their notes. Congress passed the Agricultural Credit Act this year, which authorizes Federal Intermediate Credit Banks, twelve in number, like the Twelve Federal Reserve banks, and also twelve Federal fund loan banks. Federal Intermediate Banks are to make loans to banks or to co-operative marketing associations of farmers, the loans to aid agriculture. The Farm Loan Board may issue bonds against the securities which the Intermediate Credit Banks have taken. The sale of these bonds will supply funds which the Credit banks can loan again, in effect creating a revolving fund available for the development of agriculture. The Farm Loan Banks advance money only on real estate mortgage security, but the Intermediate Credit institutions will discount farmers' notes taken by the local banks and will loan on live stock, farm equipment, grain crops and the like. The twelve loan banks can loan a total of six hundred million dollars—an amount of credit which should certainly help the farmers of the country. By means of this, the farmers can hold their crops for better prices and the weaker ones will not be compelled to flood the market at a time when prices are low. The average man in the cities does not appreciate the farmer's difficulties. He finds the cost of food high and he supposes that the farmer must be getting high prices. It would appear that our greatest difficulty is with distributing, that often products pass through too many hands in going from the producer to the consumer. Certainly, we often have more distributing agencies than we need, and somehow the consumer must support all the grocers and all the jobbers and all the other middle men of one and another description who live by taking a profit from the products that go through their hands. Efficient engineering for the whole economic system would probably increase the farmers' receipts decidedly and might lower somewhat the price to us consumers.

THE 18TH AMENDMENT: THE COAL COMMISSION

However disappointing the President's attitude on international questions may be to some of us, his determination to enforce the prohibition law is very satisfactory. In his speech at Denver last week he paid his respects to the folly of New York State in repealing its code for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. That repeal, he said, was the opposite of an assertion of states rights, since if New York's example were generally followed it would lead to the creation of a great Federal police whose activities would tend to decrease the power of the States themselves. As the President sees it, if we do not enforce the Eighteenth Amendment we shall encourage disrespect for many laws.

"It will bring disrepute upon our community, and be pointed to as justifying the charge that we are a nation of hypocrites. There can be no issue in this land paramount to that of enforcement of the law." So the President proceeded in a very just strain. Later in the same day at Cheyenne the President outlined the task confronting the Federal Coal Commission. As a result of its work he expects that we may see a great system of coal storage in order to keep production at a level and to provide for time of special need. He hopes that the Commission may put an end to the maladjustment which allows the miners to work only about half the work days in the year. The President also believes that the Commission's work may lead to some decrease in coal prices.

OUR TAXES

At Salt Lake City the President discussed Federal taxation and expenditure. The President chose the topic for his Salt Lake City speech because Senator Smoot of Utah is the leading authority on taxation in Congress. The figures which the President adduced in his speech at the Mormon Tabernacle are not as familiar to most of us as they might well be. The ten billion dollars which we advanced to the powers associated with us in the World War represent about one-fourth of the total money we spent on the war. That ten billion dollars was just about the cost of the Civil War to the North and South together. We paid a quarter of the cost of the World War at the time. The public debt reached the highest point in its history at the beginning of August, 1919, when it stood at twenty-seven billion five hundred million dollars, about ten times what it came to at the close of the Civil War. Since August, 1919, we have reduced our debt from $27,596,000,000 to $22,400,000,000, on June 30, 1923. The government program provides for extinguishing a half billion of the debt each year. While the expense of running the Federal Government has been decreasing for the last four years, state and local governments have been increasing in cost. The central government in 1915 cost every one of us $6.97 on the average; in 1918 the figures had risen to $36.64; in 1919 to $37.91; and in 1920 to $53.78. The next year saw a reduction of $8.56. This year the President reckons there will be a cut to $26.29. Thirty-five per cent. of the income of our national government goes to paying interest or to cutting down the public debt. Our income taxes are very materially lower than those of corresponding nations. In 1923 a married American citizen with two children and an income of $5,000 paid an income tax of $68. If he had been a citizen of Canada he would have paid $156; of France, $96; of Germany, $292; of Great Britain, $320.76. The same man with an income of $100,000 would have paid $456 income tax in the United States and $1,128.32 in Great Britain. In the face of such figures our insistence that our allies should begin to settle up their debts to us seems callous. At Salt Lake City the President also took occasion to comment on the new budget system. It is a curious commentary on our political mind that it has taken a century and a third for the Federal Government to adopt a budget system. The popular notion about the use of government funds appears in the case of the business head of one of the government's institutions, far from Washington, who in June, 1921, was puzzled how to expend $42,000 which he had in excess of actual needs. The President wired the man a warning not to spend the money and wrote him expressing the hope that every government official with spending authority would aid in reducing the government expenditures. Naturally, the appeal was effective, and this one government agent not only saved most of his $42,000 for that fiscal year, but in 1922 he saved $81,000 more. The President further illustrated the efficiency of the budget system by telling of one department head who would not sanction an eight million dollar cut in his estimates ordered by the budget director. The department head refused even to accede to the President's own request for a reduction. But when the department experts and the budget experts got together, with the threat that if they could not agree, the President himself would decide, the estimate was cut more than twelve million.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE ECLIPSE OF THE NEGRO EMPEROR

A few years ago a little imaginative Jamaican Negro came to New York. His name was Marcus Garvey. He became infected with the notion of social self-determinism. He declared in behalf of Africa for the Negroes, and proceeded to capitalize the idea financially. He organized a number of Negro business ventures, including a more or less successful laundry in the Harlem district of New York City. But his greatest business project was the Black Star Line, which was to run vessels from various ports in the world straight to Africa. Garvey had the black man's genius for pomp and ceremony and titles. He became Knight Commander of the Sublime Order of the Nile and of the Distinguished Service Order of Ethiopia, and one one occasion held a great court in New York when he vested a goodly number of Negroes, some of them men of solid ability, with various titles in his orders. He organized the Liberian Construction Loan, the African Legion, the Black Cross Nurses, and the Negro Factories Corporation. Apparently all these concerns fed money into the Black Star Line. The Line bought a number of unseaworthy vessels. It advertised sailings, but, it seems, none of its vessels completed a voyage. Nevertheless, Garvey continued to sell stock in the company, although he knew it was insolvent. In January, 1922, the Federal Government indicted him for using the mails to defraud. A New York jury found him guilty last week and he was sentenced to five years in the federal prison. It is a pity that an appeal to the pride of race should have been so abused by a charlatan. It is a good thing for any race which has been held inferior to cultivate self-respect and confidence. May the good in Garvey's ideas somehow be perpetuated!

PLANS FOR THE COMPLETION OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE

Some fifty years ago Horatio Potter, Protestant Episcopal bishop of New York, set afoot the project for a great Episcopal cathedral in New York. It was twenty years, however, before the corner stone was laid in 1892. For a goodly number of years only the crypt was completed and services were held there. By 1911, however, the choir, the seven Chapels of Tongues, the crossing and the foundation for the nave had been built. The use of the cathedral has grown until to-day it is full to its capacity of 1,400 at the regular Sunday services and on special occasions thousands of people have been turned away. Because of this need for room the committee in charge of the building has determined to make a public appeal for funds in order to resume building at the earliest practicable moment. To complete the building entirely will cost $15,000,000. The plan is to proceed immediately with the construction of the nave, which will greatly increase the cathedral's seating capacity. When the building is finished it will be 601 feet long and 315 feet wide across the transepts, with an area of 109,082 square feet. Except for St. Paul's in Rome and the Cathedral at Seville, it will be the largest church in the world and will accommodate ten thousand people. Through the amplifiers it will be possible to make the whole congregation hear the voice of the preacher clearly and without distortion. The prevalent style of the cathedral is French Gothic. The portion of the existing choir now built in Romanesque architecture will be slightly altered to make it conform with the rest of the building. The building will have three lofty towers, two at the west front and the central lantern and spire. The cross upon the spire will rise to a height of five hundred feet above the ground. Four firms of architects have helped in designing the building—Heins & LaFarge, Henry Vaughan, Carrere & Hastings and Cram & Ferguson, who are in charge of the work at present.

MOUNT ETNA AND PRAYER

For twenty-four centuries Mount Etna, on the island of Sicily, is known to have ruined its countryside from time to time. Seven hundred and fifty-four years ago it destroyed fifteen thousand people of the little town of Catania, twenty miles south of it. From century to century it has kept up such a record. The present eruption has probably combined the same picturesque elements that have characterized such events in Sicily for millenniums. The country grows dark under clouds of dust; streams of lava flow down the mountainside, sometimes covering more than a mile an hour. In this present eruption the lava has poured out on the northeast side and threatened especially the town of Linquaglossa. Those of the inhabitants who stay in the town have spent their time packing their goods, praying to the saints and organizing religious processions. In Castiglione, a little further from the volcano, the living room in almost every home became a chapel, the candles burning before the statues of the Madonna and the saints and the members of the household kneeling before them in prayer for protection. Victor Emanuel III has come down to the scene of destruction in the democratic fashion of his ancestors. When he learned that the people of Catania were preparing a great reception for him he left the train at Fiume Freddo, a point on the railroad close to Etna, and from there went on into the thick of the disaster. His presence and the coming of Mussolini put new courage into the hearts of those who have lost their fields, their vineyards and their homes. The Fascisti have lived up to their reputation of fine courage in the face of physical danger. Catania, fifteen miles south of Etna, with its two hundred thousand population, is crowded with refugees. The religious manifestations of the people are particularly interesting. They seem to combine a sort of futility with at least the possibility of the creation of courage. Would that those simple-minded peasants might get the quiet strength that comes with the sense that we are in the hands of Providence, the while we do our utmost to meet the situation.

The College President

FOR two weeks, while great national and international problems have been before the world, a difference of opinion between the president of a New England college and the Board of Trustees has occupied the front page of the newspapers day after day and been reported at almost as great length as the daily happenings in the Ruhr. It shows how large a place the college occupies in the present world and how important and outstanding is the office of college president. Sometimes the president of a great American university seems to exert almost as much of an influence as the President of the United States. He is not only the head of a college, but he is instructor at large. The words of Presidents Eliot, Faunce, Hibben and Jordan are printed in many journals. As we write, President Butler's addresses being delivered in Great Britain as exchange lecturer from America are being printed almost in full in all the great dailies of America. The college is the institution of which America is proudest. The college president is our oracle. And he speaks not only for himself, but he is the voice of his college. It is the college that is speaking to the public, to that great body of unenrolled students, to the nation at large, which looks to Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Chicago, Wisconsin, Amherst and a hundred other institutions for instruction and leadership. This is why the misunderstanding between Amherst College and President Meiklejohn has aroused so much attention. Amherst College belongs not simply to a board of trustees, or a faculty, or a group of alumni, but to New England and the nation. Its present problem concerns all of us, not simply those directly related to the college.

This particular problem has been very perplexing to everyone. The public has not been able to grasp the inner significance of it. President Meiklejohn claims that he has been leading the fight of modernism and liberal ideals against conservatism and traditional views, and that he is opposed by the trustees and faculty for this reason. He wishes to move on, they prefer the old. He has one theory of education, they another. The students and young professors of the faculty are with him, he says, the older men are against him. Meantime the trustees deny they asked him to resign on these grounds. They say that they are as desirous of progress as he, and that they have considerable sympathy with his views. They say that they asked him to resign for purely personal reasons, not for those averred by Dr. Meiklejohn or those stated in the daily press. The resignation of several professors, however, upon the president's resignation rather indicate that there is something in this claim that Dr. Meiklejohn's views on education had something to do with it all. Dr. Fitch and others expressly state in their letters of resignation that they leave because Amherst has ceased by this deposition of its president to be a leader in education. It is a great pity that if the trustees did not demand the resignation on these grounds that they did not tell the public the exact reasons for which they asked it. The public is going to believe that it was because the trustees were out of sympathy with Dr. Meiklejohn's ideals of education unless they give other reasons for their actions.

The whole question has become much larger than the case of Amherst. It has pushed to the front the conflict going on in the educational world as to the function of the college in modern society. One group—by far the largest just now—insists that the colleges must become vocational institutions. The colleges formerly stressed culture and the trained mind. They aimed at turning out cultured and scholarly gentlemen. This group is impatient of culture and scholarship. Its watchword is efficiency. It would take out Latin, Greek, philosophy, belles-lettres, the humanities in general and substitute chemistry, economics, commercial law, journalism, French and Spanish. (Spanish because of growing commercial relationship with South America.) The aim of the college should be vocational rather than cultural. Efficiency in action is put above power to think through the problems of modern democracy, and capacity to do some particular thing above that knowledge of the best that has ever been thought and felt, or that companionship with the great souls of the ages which was the aim of the Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Williams and Amherst of the older days. The efficiency group, starting with the educational theories of Herbert Spencer, has been growing in power, until to-day they have got most of the American colleges in their grasp. The halls of philosophy and the classics are empty, the classrooms for economics, commerce and science are crowded.

The other group believes that education is the power to think thoroughly and deeply on all the problems of society, to appreciate and enjoy great thoughts, and to enjoy the beauty of the world. The college exists to make men citizens of all the ages, thoroughly at home with Plato, Sophocles, Horace and Dante, cognizant of the best that the human mind has uttered, members of that great democracy of scholars and gentlemen to which Emerson so prophetically alluded in his great Phi Beta Kappa address. This group believes there is something greater than efficiency, namely, character, and the power to think clearly and feel broadly and deeply. Regardless of whether or not it was because Dr. Meiklejohn holds this latter view and belongs to this group that he was deposed, the fact remains that he has been one of the most outstanding champions of this view and has tried to make Amherst this sort of a college. So finely has Dr. Meiklejohn expressed the aims of this ideal that we would like to quote some passages from his various addresses. First a passage regarding the most urgent task of the college: "The present most urgent task of the college is to make clear and to keep clear the fact that fundamental intelligence is essential to life. On that basis it can go on trying to make knowledge, trying to set young people in the way of making it, and can claim the confidence which properly belongs to those who neither give nor receive favor from any class, but who serve all men in an enterprise upon the accomplishment of which the living of all alike depends."

Again, speaking of the classical curriculum, he says: "The old classical curriculum was based on the belief that if you took certain studies and worked them through you would get out of them the deepest things of human experience. I love the dogmatism, the certainty, the courage of that old curriculum. Whether right or wrong, it had something to give, something to be taken. In the elective system the boy chooses upon some bent, perhaps temporary. And does he get a thorough training? I believe not. The time has come again for the American college to select from the body of knowledge a unified system which shall make sure that its student has learned of human life. It is time for a new dogmatism."

In the following quotation Dr. Meiklejohn touches more directly upon what we have said above. The fundamental position is that to be liberal a college must be essentially and first of all intellectual. "What do our teachers believe to be the aim of college instruction? To be liberal a college must be essentially intellectual. It is a place where a boy, forgetting all things else, may set forth on the enterprise of learning. Whatever light-hearted undergraduates may say, whatever the opinions of solicitous parents, of ambitious friends, of employers in search of workmen, of leaders in church or state or business, the teacher within the college, knowing his mission as no one else can know it, proclaims that mission to be the leading of his pupil into the life intellectual. Against this intellectual interpretation of the college our teachers find two sets of hostile forces constantly at work. Outside the walls there are the practical demands of a busy commercial and social scheme. Within the college there are the trivial and sentimental and irrational misunderstandings of its own friends. As against the practical demands from without the issue is clear and decisive. College teachers know that the world must have trained workmen, clever buyers and sellers, efficient directors, resourceful manufacturers, able lawyers, ministers, physicians and teachers. But the liberal college, in order, to do its own work, must leave the special and technical training for these trades and professions to be done in other schools."

In a famous speech made shortly after the close of the war Dr. Meiklejohn said that the one thing to demand at present was that the colleges "become again institutions of learning." This is what, to a large extent, they have not been. The confused mental condition in which America has found itself since the war Dr. Meiklejohn attributes largely to this lack of training to think clearly which our colleges should have given. "We do not understand, we have not tried to understand. We have not trained ourselves; we do not train our boys in the technique of thought. We blindly think that any man of common wit can think as well as any other man. So we blunder on in stupid arrogance not knowing the world in which we live, not knowing which way we wish to go, not knowing how best to overcome the obstacles that block our path. We just go on keeping our eyes wide open—in the dark. I wonder if our colleges can cure us of this arrogance. They will be hated if they do. And yet the colleges must do this work. They are the teachers and critics of our intellectual life. It is their task to see to it that our people think aright about essential problems." F. L.

"One Thing I Know" "One Thing I Do"

T. E. BROWN, the Manx poet, on one bright spring day in a pleasant valley in Derbyshire, met a little lad and asked him the name of a certain hill, pointing to it. The lad very promptly said: "Tap o' th' hill." "But," said Brown, "hasn't it some other name, such as Kinderscout or Fairbrook Naze?" But with all pressure he could get nothing out of the child except "Tap o' th' hill."

"And O, the weary knowledge,
And O, the heart that swells.
And O, the blessed limit—
Tap o' th' hill, tap o' th' hill."

It reminds one of the story of the man who was born blind to whom Jesus gave sight. The Pharisees might argue whether Jesus was a sinner or not; the man who received his sight had no theory at all, but one thing he knew: that whereas he was blind now he saw. That was his blessed limit. To have a blessed limit corresponding to this in one's life is to have an anchorage in oceans of uncertainty. The one thing we need to know more than any other can only be known from personal experience. The knowledge is not reached by intellectual inquiry, but by the descent into our life of a higher power. An invisible finger has touched the blind eye and opened it—vision followed, and certainty. No theorizing about it can shake our assurance of its value. This is religious knowledge. It is an experience of the redeeming power of God in our life; something that enables a man to say without hesitation, "I know." All sorts of questions may cluster round the experience which a man is unable to answer; he may not be able to analyze or to philosophize or to intellectually formulate, but no power in heaven or in earth, in past or in present, can dislodge the soul from its eternal refuge.

When this kind of certainty arises in the soul it gives intensity to life; it enables one to secure a concentration of endeavor along the higher line of life.

There was one thing which Paul also knew, viz., that he had been apprehended by Christ Jesus. It became the ambition of his life then to know more fully the nature of the power that had arrested him. He would concentrate all his energy upon pressing on to apprehend that for which he was apprehended. This was the one thing he would do.

There has been far too much depreciation of intellectual work in connection with religion and in the study of religious subjects. With none of this depreciation have we the least sympathy. The intensity of our religious life is not in any danger from honest intellectual work. The law of physics, that the greater the extension the less the intension, ought not to hold in this field. It is true that great spiritual strength has often flowed in the channel of narrow intellectual ideas, and it is often thought that large-mindedness and the power to see all sides of a question is fatal to enthusiasm. But what is really fatal to enthusiasm and to concentrated action is not knowledge, not the power to see many sides of a question, but the want of power, having seen all sides, to see which is the more important, and so concentrate upon it. It is not that the man has too much vision, but that he has too little. A mind well informed all round, having come to a definite conclusion, would be a stronger mind for action than the mind that has only seen one side. We must never join in the depreciation of any knowledge whatsoever. All knowledge is useful. And the more knowledge we have the better. Nor can the religious movement afford to do without knowledge. Protestant Christendom owes an immense obligation to Martin Luther, who lit the torches of the Reformation in Germany. But let us not forget that whatever we owe to this movement we owe partly to a body of painstaking scholars who took no part in the movement itself and who even opposed its methods. However much Erasmus disliked Luther's methods, the work of Luther could not have been accomplished without Erasmus. The sickly scholar, by his prodigious industry and indefatigable labor, brought the true contents of the New Testament and much early Christian literature to the reach of the multitudes, and without the work that was done by him and his colleagues in the revival of learning the Protestant Reformation could not have been. At the same time, the revival of learning could never have produced the Reformation. It was a new religious certainty coming to experience in the souls of men that enabled them to throw off the final authority of an ancient church.

Now we have the problem of the sixteenth century on our hands to-day in somewhat new forms. We have had our revival of learning, we have had a resifting of opinion, we have revised many historical judgments, we have seen ancient literature in new light, and in that light we have reconstructed the Bible. Most of this work has been done by the most devoted and painstaking labor. Is it possible that an increase of intellectual honesty is decreasing religious fervor? Our answer is that it may do so, but need not, and should not. There may be a lessening of religious activity for a time while the study is being conducted. No blame should attach to that. One must always give the learner time to learn. When Grocyn and Linacre were teaching Greek at Oxford many parish priests gave up their work and went back to be students again. When John Colet did this many might have complained that the new learning was taking men away from their duties—there were the sick to be attended to and all the parish work to be done, and there was the parish giving all up to go and study Greek. What a curse that learning was! That might have been said then, but history would not allow us to say it now. We know that it was through giving up that work for a time John Colet was qualified to do the best work of his life, work that has taken an honored place in the history of sincere religion. The more thorough our inquiries, the more richly we can store our minds with true knowledge, even though it may hinder activities in other directions for a time, the more fitted we become for lasting and abiding work. A good many ministers would do well to give up the ministry for two or three years and go back to study, provided they study on right lines. There is a great deal of intellectual work to be done in connection with religion, and the more honestly and thoroughly it is done the better.

At the same time, knowledge of this kind and religion are not one and the same thing. The knowledge which is the result of the divine touch upon the blind eye is a different thing from the knowledge which we gather through study and thought. The spiritual arrest which claimed Paul for a new line of life was as different from an intellectual conclusion as sunlight is from moonlight. While many discuss the pros and cons of prayer, there are others who have in their own experience an indubitable proof of its value. And that knowledge is to them a place in the cleft of the rock while the storm of discussion is sweeping past. Within that certainty they shelter, there they feed the religious spirit and maintain trust for the days to come. It is well to know what has been taught on the subject, well to be acquainted with the discussion, but no real certainty comes that way. It can only come in the way of experience. We have seen it often among the lowly ones of the earth. We have seen the lowly and unlearned life made strong and beautiful by its own assurance; there was no more doubt of the value of prayer than of the value of daily bread. The one was as necessary to the spirit as the other to the body. The certainty attained through experience was a light in the eye, a strength in the hand, and a steadiness in the step. There was strong life lived by a soul in undoubted communion with the Source of all power. No arguments of any kind could for a moment affect the unwavering belief that was founded upon experience.

In these days of upheaval and convulsion, when so many things are being dissolved, what are our certainties? Many opinions and theories are being undermined, the type of civilization seems to be dissolving, the faiths of men are being subjected to a severe test, the results of the war are acting as a searchlight not only round the coast, but upon the interiors of our life. What have we that stands and cannot be shaken? Do we know at least one thing that will survive every assault? Do we know a God who, whatever may be taken from us, will not leave us destitute of His mercy and His truth? There are those who know that nothing can pluck them out of their Father's hands; they know that He will keep that which is committed unto Him. They know that no changes in earthly conditions can affect the central spiritual certainty of their life, nor alter the value of the truth and the love which have become to them the bread of their existence. They contemplate the future without fear, saying, "We have received a kingdom that cannot be shaken."

THE interest in Christian Unity continues and grows apace. My readers will be interested in knowing that the Christian Unity Foundation has arranged for a series of lectures on this subject this fall by several distinguished Europeans who are to visit this country which may well turn out to be the most significant utterances on this subject that have appeared for a generation. If the plans already made can be carried out, a series of eight lectures will be given, in which Archbishop Söderblom of Sweden, Professor Deissmann of the University of Berlin, the Bishop of St. Albans, England, and Dr. Thomas Nightingale, the secretary of the Free Church Council of England and Wales, and Dr. Kay, one of the most distinguished preachers in the Anglican Church, will take part. The Archbishop will speak on the general aspects of the subject, while the others will speak of the progress of the movement in their own countries. These lectures are to be given next October in some prominent New York church. They will probably be published in book form after their delivery.

Meantime, the arrangements for the World Conference on Faith and Order are going steadily on under Mr. Robert Gardiner's industrious leadership, and it looks as though some two hundred or more of the most outstanding leaders of all communions would assemble to discuss the problem which lies fundamental to all movements toward unity, i.e., the nature of the church and the question of faith and orders.

This has all been brought more directly to my mind by two books which have just come to me from the publishers, and also by a communication from Dr. Newman Smyth in the nature of "An Open Letter" to the Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, Bishop of Connecticut. That two such important books as these should appear together, coming from two such eminent leaders of the Church, is a sure sign that the interest in Christian Unity is widespread and growing. The first book, which I have just finished with much enjoyment as well as amazement at its grasp upon the movement in all countries, is that by Archbishop Söderblom of Sweden. "Christian Fellowship—The United Life and Work of Christendom" is the title (Fleming H. Revell Company, New York). This book will be reviewed somewhat at length in a future issue of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, but I refer to it as an instance of how the lack of unity in the Christian forces of the world has disturbed our most prophetic minds. No one knows the whole vast problem of Europe better than Archbishop Söderblom. No one sees better than he how the solution of that problem is held back by the divided condition of the Christian forces. The Archbishop devotes a considerable part of his book, almost a third, I should think, to these "Divisions of Christendom," and again and again he laments the fact that the Church is hindered from making forward, redemptive, reconstructed effort by this lack of unity within herself. He pleads for unity upon the basis of Christ's own wish, upon the basis of the nature of the Church itself, but more especially does he yearn for it and plead for it that the Church may be a more effective instrument in the building of the Kingdom of God upon the earth. Again and again Archbishop Söderblom comes back to the conviction that a united church, with its heart set upon establishing the Kingdom and its face set against all iniquity, could banish wars and all other injustices from the earth. It is a very remarkable book and should have a wide reading in America. I refer to it here as an instance of how the thought of unity is foremost in the minds of the European churches as it is in our own.

The other book that has just come into my hands is by Dr. Newman Smyth, known as not only one of the greatest preachers and scholars of the Congregational Church, but as a leader in the movement for Christian Unity. Dr. Smyth has been actively identified with the World Conference on Faith and Order from its beginning and has for many years been chairman of the Commission on Christian Unity of the Congregational Council. Perhaps no one has had more to do than has he with the famous Concordat, which was signed by fifteen or twenty distinguished leaders of the Congregational and Protestant Episcopal churches. Dr. Smyth has just published "A Story of Christian Unity," including the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops and the Congregational-Episcopal Approaches (Yale University Press, New Haven). This book covers the story of the Christian Unity Movement in England and America during the last ten years in fullest detail and has unusual interest because Dr. Smyth has been in the heart of the movement itself. He has attended all the meetings of the various committees and has had much to do with writing the Concordat and the various resolutions which have been passed. This book will also be reviewed in some later issue of this paper, but I refer to it here as another instance of the deepening interest in Christian Unity.

All the things I have mentioned above are encouraging, but at the same time there arises one of those things that deeply discourage all who are working toward the unity of the churches and which sometimes cause us to lose heart and throw up the whole endeavor. As usual, this discouragement comes from our Protestant Episcopal bretheren. After several of them had signed the Concordat with the leaders of the Congregational Church and the General Convention had taken action upon it, it was quite generally understood that should some Congregational clergyman be willing to accept the Episcopal ordination at the same time under the provisions of the Concordat that the Episcopal Church would gladly welcome this opportunity of manifesting its real interest in unity. Ever since the signing of the Concordat, and the action upon it by the General Convention, I have felt, as I think perhaps every other Congregationalist has felt, that it would probably be many years before any Congregational clergyman would present himself for coordinate ordination in the Episcopal communion. In spite of everything that is said by our Episcopalian brethren, it looks very much like a confession that the Congregational ordination was not valid. But in our hearts we have hoped that some day some Congregational clergyman could see it from another point of view. At last such a one has come in God's good time and is ready to present himself for Episcopalian ordination on the ground that he may thus extend his usefulness in the Church of God, and lo and behold, we found our Protestant Episcopal brethren, as it were, running away! Under the date of April 3, Dr. Newman Smyth wrote to the Bishop of Connecticut, the Rt. Rev. Chauncey D. Brewster, to the effect that Professor Bainton, assistant professor of church history in Yale Divinity School, would be willing to accept Episcopal ordination on the ground that there were several Episcopal students in Yale Divinity School and the faculty had intimated that it might be desirable to have someone who might be episcopally ordained so that he would minister to the Episcopal students in the Divinity School in a rather more intimate manner. Dr. Smyth in great enthusiasm communicated with the Bishop of Connecticut, saying that at last a possible application of the canon (generally known as the Congregational-Episcopal Concordat) had just come to his notice, and it seemed to him like a special providence and he hoped that the Bishop might find he could proceed with the ordination of the Professor. He thus would be made a link of union between the Congregational and Episcopal communions. To Dr. Smyth's great disappointment and to the disappointment of everyone who is interested in the movement toward unity the Bishop has refused to proceed with this ordination on grounds which look very much indeed as though they were far-fetched, and the argument given would appear to be somewhat like the hair-splitting arguments of our legal friends. Dr. Smyth has just published his "Open Letter," which appears in full beginning on this page of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. It is a splendidly written document and its tone, while most conciliatory, is brave and challenging.

It was Dr. Smyth's duty to report on this whole situation before the General Convention of Congregational Churches of the State of Connecticut. Copies of Dr. Smyth's report have just come into my hands. It expresses great disappointment, but it also holds the Episcopal Church up to its own—if one may not say "promise," yet to its own previous action in this regard. He says that this offer has now become a test case and that we must ask of the Bishop prompt decision without any further postponement, and again asks, "Is the Episcopal Church, having thus offered to us this Concordat, now ready to deliver the goods?"

I have always been among those who have believed in the sincerity of those leaders in the Episcopal Church, of which there are so many, who have been devoting their lives to this cause of unity—such men as Bishops Anderson, Manning and Lines, and such splendid laymen as Robert H. Gardiner and George Zabriskie, all of these who signed the Concordat and many others—but yet I must confess that now and then I am tempted to lose faith. Nothing is really ever going to happen, if at every moment when some opportunity for concrete action comes our Episcopal friends are going to back down. Of course, personally, I believe, as I think most men outside of the Roman Catholic Church and one of the smaller communions believe, that any ordination in the Christian Church is as good as another and as valid as another. I cannot believe, for instance, that an ordination in the Anglican Church, a relatively small group of Christendom, is not as valid as an ordination in the Roman Catholic church, with its four or five hundred million adherents. I never could believe that the ordination in the Baptist communion was not as valid as that in the Presbyterian. It is impossible for me to believe, no matter to what communion I might belong, that the ministrations of the Great God could ever be confined in His mind to one communion, not even one so great and universal as that of the Roman Catholic Church! I have often said that I am the only real Catholic going about because I can recognize the ordination in all communions including even that of the Protestant Episcopal Church, that I am ready to minister and preach in all the churches and claim my membership in all! Catholicism means universalism, and I am glad that I have this universalism and can recognize the touch of God upon any man by his character and by the fruits of his work. I am both sacramentarian and evangelical. My one allegiance is to the Christian Church—not to any little section of it—but I realize that many of my brethren, especially in the Protestant Episcopal Church, have not been able to move yet out of the narrow sectarianism into this larger catholicism. I have been greatly encouraged that there were some that were endeavoring to rise from denominationalism up to this greater catholicism, but I am afraid I shall lose faith if such an instance as this offered by Dr. Smyth to Professor Bainton is turned down on technical grounds, and on grounds on which there is not even agreement in the Protestant Episcopal Convention itself. I could say with all heartiness, even with eloquence, the words with which Dr. Smyth concluded his fine address before the conference at Hartford: "In our existing state of inherited and sinful schism we would be all the more mindful of our own responsibilities for the Christian welfare and religious education of the people of this commonwealth. We Congregationalists were the first to arrive on these shores. We at first had the sole responsibility for the religious care of the people here. No church is equal now to this great task by itself alone. Only as one church and people of God can we fulfil the work of our forefathers. It is not for us now, like Nero when Rome was burning, to stand idly by, playing our denominational fiddles, when our modern civilization is in flames. Only as one church and congregation of the faithful can we enter all together into the glorious expectation of the people of God."

FREDERICK LYNCH.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE RIGHT REV. CHAUNCEY B. BREWSTER, BISHOP OF CONNECTICUT.

My Dear Bishop Brewster:

I am taking the liberty of addressing an open letter to you on a matter of grave importance to the clergy and people of both our communions. I do so because shortly I shall have to make to the General Conference of our Congregational churches in this State some report concerning the issue now confronting us. Before submitting it I desire to make public the substance of it in order that you and your clergy may have opportunity to correct any possible misunderstandings of your position on my part, or to enable me to present with my own report any communication that you may possibly desire to have laid before them. This I would gladly do.

Allow me first to express my own appreciation of your always sympathetic and earnest co-operation in our common purpose and effort for the reunion of the churches. I can merely present in this brief letter the issues which have now come to a point requiring definite decision. For fuller discussion and statement of my own views I must refer to a book prepared by myself and just issued by the Yale Press, entitled "A Story of Church Unity." As you have kindly permitted me to give to the public any of your letters which I may desire to print, I shall quote from them any statements of determinative significance, passing by any questions of incidental or minor importance.

Under date of April 3, this year, I wrote to you as follows: "A possible application of the canon (generally known as the Congregational-Episcopal Concordat) has just been brought to my notice, which seems to me like a special providence at just this time. . . . Professor R. H. Bainton, whom the late Professor Walker had picked out as his assistant, of the Yale Divinity School, informs me that it has sometimes been said at faculty meetings that it might be desirable to have in their faculty someone who might be episcopally ordained, who would represent the Episcopal students and their interests in the Divinity School. This would be desirable also in looking after the religious interests of Episcopal students generally in other departments of the university. Professor Bainton will accept the obligations stated in the canon, I think, to your satisfaction. His influence will be uplifting and of great service in interpreting the highest values of the Christian faith. As he would have his Sundays largely free from other engagements, you might find him helpful, especially in ministering to mixed congregations throughout the countryside. I need not urge upon you that an immense service might thus be rendered to the cause we both have so much at heart, if such a practical illustration of Church unity might thus by a definite act be given to the people. I should state that this proposal is made with the full concurrence of Dean Brown of the Yale Divinity School."

From a subsequent letter from you I was gratified to learn that in regard to the chief requirement of the canon, after an interview with Professor Bainton you could write, "nothing came up which caused me to have doubt about his doctrinal views."

After you had given it further consideration and had some advices by letter with two other bishops I was disappointed to hear that difficulties had arisen which would prevent you from now taking action without further light—which, allow me to say, I devoutly trust may soon be given to you and to us all, not from the flickering of our ecclesiastical candles, but straight and clear from the heavens above.

You gave as a reason for your present refusal to take action that a legal question of canonical authority had been raised, and "that the bishops are under the law." I quote entirely the following opinion of one of the bishops which you have sent to me. I withheld, however, his name, for, from what I know from his advices to me and his intellectual thoroughness, I should not wish to accept his statement of the difficulty as insuperable until in conference with his chancellor and legal adviser he should decide that there is now no way out of it. This is his statement of the existing condition: "The difficulty in this case arises, however, from the fact that the House of Deputies declined to authorize the changes in the ordination service which action under this canon requires. If no action had been taken by the convention in regard to this I should feel myself at liberty to make the changes which the canon calls for. The fact is, however, that action was taken; as you will remember, the matter was discussed in the House of Bishops, we took action authorizing these changes in the ordination service. Greatly to our surprise, the House of Deputies did not concur in this matter, but rejected it by a very decisive vote. The convention therefore having effectually refused to authorize these changes, I should not feel at liberty to make them, and I do not see how we can proceed under the canon."

There would be no obstacle, however, to prevent acting in accordance with this canon if the legal position taken by the Chancellor of New York is sound—and there is no better authority on the law of your Church than Mr. Zabriskie. When the canon was first proposed and a constitutional objection raised by its opponents, he argued that it was constitutional. The friends of it consented to a delay of three years until the next meeting of your convention, in order to remove any possible doubt of it. And now you inform me that the opponents of it have urged the necessity of still another amendment and delay of three years before this simple measure of working agreement can be carried out between men of good-will in both communions. You write: "This morning I have inquired of members of the House of Deputies and learned an argument which had weight there was that the changes in the ordinal could not constitutionally be completed at one convention."

As I read this argument and lay it down I find myself thinking of the slothful servant and wondering what constitutional difficulties he may have found for putting off what needed to be done in the Lord's household.

Indeed, having been asked recently by a prominent bishop if I could take the promises in the existing form for the ordering of a priest in the Episcopal Church, I replied I could, if it were distinctly said in a prefatory statement that I could conform to these requirements when I was acting within the jurisdiction of the Episcopal Church. He said, "that would be enough."

If we must thus drag down a great onward Christian movement into an entangled overgrowth of legal difficulties, I cannot refrain from expressing my astonishment that such an act had been taken by the House of Deputies so silently and skillfully that it had escaped the notice even of Mr. Zabriskie, who had presented it in the House of Deputies. From his report to me immediately afterwards he did not so much as mention it as among the amendments worth noticing.

A new question is presented to us by this smothering of our covenant of peace under a heap of ecclesiastical and legal objections. I can here merely state it without discussing it. Is this, indeed, as so presented to us, "the historic episcopate"? In the ancient Church monarchical episcopate had power to save the Christian faith, as the crust of the Roman civilization was breaking up; has this episcopate, limited—this episcopate whose distinctive power of conferring holy orders has thus been rendered void—is this in deed and in fact a constitutional episcopate, fitted to survive in an age of democracy? Can it be adapted as a means of common participation for all churches in the fellowship of the whole Church? Providentially, while your convention has thus put you under bonds, which you say you have no power to break, there comes to us from across the sea a call to a united advance of all our Christian forces. In this appeal to us of the whole Anglican episcopate no mention at all is made of the Church of England. Above its established order, above all our existing ecclesiastical limitations, the Anglican bishops saw the vision which led one of them to exclaim, "The great Church arrives."

While now I must regretfully report to our State Convention of Congregational Churches your inability to act in the co-ordination of a professor in the Yale Divinity School, at the coming meeting of our National Council there will be laid before us for further consideration in all our churches the epochal appeal of the whole Anglican episcopate for "a new adventure of faith."

In your last letter to me you intimated that you might possibly bring up Professor Bainton's application for further consideration at a coming meeting of your Synod. On our part we shall be pleased to keep this case open for any further consideration that you may desire. In doing so we would submit it to you, not merely in your limited power to act as a diocesan bishop, but on the basis of the larger liberty and higher law of the universal episcopate, as thus affirmed in the Rules of Order (Nos. 21-22) of the House of Bishops.

"It shall be competent for the House of Bishops to convene as, or being convened to resolve itself into, a Council of Bishops—"

"The body known as the Bishops in Council, as an assemblage of Catholic bishops, and considering and acting upon matters of duty or responsibility resting on them as a portion of the universal episcopate, may be convened at any time, suitable notice being given by the presiding bishop or the chairman of the House of Bishops."

In thus appealing to you as a Catholic bishop I am well aware that the decisive determination of a matter of so far-reaching importance will require of you and of all of us a large measure of the courage and wisdom that comes from love. But the cause of religious education and of our common Christian faith demands of us now its decision. To evade this issue at this time is to decide against it. The readiness of my Congregational brethren to confer with the bishops' representatives of the House of Bishops on this urgent practical issue has been already expressed in this extract from "A Call for a Covenant of Church Unity Put Forth on November 30, 1919, by the Commission on Unity of the National Congregational Council":

"... Such consolidations or combinations of the educational institutions, and their means, of the different churches might be brought about as would prove advantageous for the best education and fellowship in their studies of the ministers of the different churches."

As a member of the Yale Corporation for many years I have been permitted to watch, and sought to promote, the development of Yale College from the limitations of a denominational college to its present undenominational but no less Christian university. It now stands four-square, like the Holy City of the Book of Revelation, with its gates open on every side for the children of light to pass in. In these days when even in some of your own pulpits ill-trained sensationalists confuse the faith of the people, and in other denominations fearful defenders of the faith sound forth false alarms against scientific inquiries and historical researches on sacred soil, it is no light service which Yale would offer to the people of all the churches, when it would thus complete its own teaching comprehensiveness by welcoming to the faculty of the Divinity School one whom you yourself might well trust and consecrate. Surely at this present time in our respective communions should we take earnest heed lest we may do despite to what an early Church father called the Holy Spirit of Education. Sincerely yours,

NEWMAN SMITH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Baccalaureate Address

By John Grier Hibben

President of Princeton University

"And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth."—Luke 24:25-26.

THIS text occurs in Christ's prophecy of the fall of Jerusalem, and He characterizes that period of Jewish national history as the age of fear. A like characterization may be applied to the present day, for as now upon the earth there is "distress of nations, with perplexity, and men's hearts failing them for fear." But the fear that is in our hearts to-day is not that of impending danger or national disaster, as in that time of long ago, but nevertheless there is fear of a very subtle kind abroad in the land and it manifests itself in a two-fold way—the fear of progressive thought and the fear of progressive action.

We are confronted by the fact that there is expressed fear in many quarters of progressive thinking; fear born of a closed mind, the fear that new ideas, because unfamiliar, may contain unknown elements of danger. It is a fear of light, because of suspicion of the source whence it emanates; fear of any new interpretation of truth, because they who fear regard themselves as sole possessors, trustees and defenders of truth.

This type of fear is conspicuously illustrated by a large group in the Christian Church who are pleased to style themselves as "Fundamentalists." They have recently challenged the indisputable facts of science regarding evolution, and have attempted to impose restrictions upon the liberty of research and utterance in the case of teachers of science in our institutions of higher learning which are under the control of the Church. They take the position that if one believes in the facts of evolution he can no longer consistently adhere to belief in the Christian religion. I for one resent such an unwarranted presupposition.

It is a singular thing that there should be in the present-day controversies the fear of recognizing the facts of evolution when applied to the development in time of our physical frame, when it is so clearly evident that the moral and spiritual consciousness of the race has progressed by painfully slow stages. The history of the long years of religious experience contained in the Old Testament is a history of an evolution of the early crude ideas of God, ever taking on more and more of a spiritual nature, from the original idea of a tribal God to that of the God of all races of mankind, until there appears the final consummation in the life and teachings and personality of Jesus Christ, in whom the divine element in man came to its complete development and fully dominated His nature and His life. No one can deny that whatever may be the reason, which we cannot understand, God's ways of manifesting Himself have always been through the slow processes of nature.

It is no concern of ours whether the dust from which we have risen be animate or inanimate—the point is that we have risen. We can never be confused with the dust under our feet, or the animal which follows us to heel, or mocks at us from his cage. It is to me a matter of indifference how slowly the processes of nature may seem to advance from stage to stage of an ever progressive development. Judged as we finite beings must judge of time, the processes seem indeed incredibly slow, but let us not forget that behind the majestic panorama of the evolution of life upon our globe is the Eternal One in whose sight a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is passed and as a watch in the night.

A part of the Christian Church has recently been stampered through fear of a great teacher and prophet of righteousness in New York City because the group which would call him to account does not speak his language or understand his thought. They fail to recognize the fact that for years he has borne loyal witness to the power of Christ's gospel for a sin-stricken world, and has been an interpreter of Christian truth to thousands who have thronged his church, and many thousands more who read his books. What has been his offense? That he dares to think and that he dares to express truth, not in the cold forms of a desiccated dogma, but in the living words that strike to the heart of human doubts, human needs and human aspirations.

It is always because of fear that man fails thus to recognize an ally and treats him as an enemy. To-day more than ever in the history of mankind we need the concerted effort of all allied forces of light in the struggle with the powers of darkness.

In the second place, there is a fear of progressive action, lest the security of established interests be disturbed. It is fear of this kind that to-day is blocking the way of national opportunity. It is conspicuously illustrated in the hesitancy of public opinion to recognize our international obligations. This is a fear that is born of an insular mind. There are always those who shrink from undertaking any responsibilities in life which may disturb the old order of a comfortable existence. It is a mysterious thing to me that there should be a widespread fear throughout our country concerning the United States becoming a member of the International Court of Justice. There was no spirit of fear brooding over our people in 1917. We did not hesitate to pledge our possessions, our sons, and our honor at that time to secure the peace of the world. Our work then nobly begun has not been finished. The great objective which we resolutely set before us has not yet been attained, but now before a great opportunity as well as a grave responsibility we falter; we behold the distress of nations, and yet with perplexity our hearts fail us for fear. We view fancied consequences with alarm, we are afraid to unite with the nations of the earth to set up and maintain a standard of international justice. It is a fear unworthy of our past. We are quite ready to express ourselves volubly concerning our longing for the peace of the world; we preach about it, we pray for it, and yet we must recognize that peace can come and abide only through the maintenance of a law of justice, recognized and revered by all nations of the earth. If justice is assured, then peace will follow. It is the God of justice who hath declared, "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea."

What lies at the root of a fear such as this? It is certainly nothing that is definite and nothing that is in itself fearful, but is due to the fact that we recognize in life a universal law of accumulating responsibility, namely, that any responsibility sincerely undertaken always creates additional responsibilities; and there naturally result commitments and obligations which will certainly prove exacting, and we fear embarrassing. But fear such as this is always short-sighted and fails to see the opportunity that is always hidden in the heart of every responsibility.

It is fear of this kind which menaces the life of every individual and stands in the way of the full-rounded development of his personality. Many lives become narrow, commonplace and unfruitful because of this deep-seated fear of assuming responsibilities which may destroy the even tenor of life and lead one far afield from the comfortable routine of an easy-going existence.

It is fear also of this nature which is the cause of hesitancy on the part of many to respond to the appeals of religion. The great barrier to a life of Christian service is the fear that in committing one's self to such a cause obligations will have to be recognized and responsibilities assumed which will change radically both the mode and the direction of life. To dedicate one's self to a cause instead of following the promptings of self-interest seems a hazardous task, and the impoverished life, free of entangling responsibilities, makes a stronger appeal than a life of sacrifice.

Members of the class of 1923, at the close of your four years in Princeton I look forward into your future with high hope and confident expectation. The only fear which I have for you is lest your own hearts fail you because of fear—the fear of yourselves, the fear of the promptings of your heart, the fear to give purpose to your aspirations, the fear of an adventurous life of sacrifice, which scorns ease and comfort and freedom from responsibility, the fear of long years of self-denial, the fear of high aims and of tasks which now seem to you impossible, the fear also of recognizing the purposes of God for you lest the following of that divine leading may open before you unfamiliar fields of endeavor which are not now in the plan and scope of your present desires and prospects.

There is an old story of a fearless rider to hounds several generations ago in England. When asked how he managed to attempt such dangerous hazards he replied, "I throw my heart over and then I must follow." So if you can throw your heart into the tasks and dangers which may lie before you, you will find that you likewise are bound to follow. But one has to believe mightily in a cause before he is brave enough to venture it. The cause must be great enough to command his whole being, his thought, his feeling and his imagination as well.

I would remind you that in every age God manifests Himself not directly in the affairs of mankind, but indirectly through the moving of His spirit upon the hearts of His sons—chosen men in every generation to do His will and to establish His kingdom upon the earth. Be not afraid to yield yourselves, therefore, to the revelation of His will and the direction of His spirit. Be not afraid of becoming instruments of His power in ministering to the lives of many in this day who yearn for the knowledge of God and yet know not where to find Him.

One of the lessons which you have learned in your Princeton life has been that of courage. It is an essential characteristic of the spirit of the place; but in many respects your courage here has been of the nature of collective courage. Your class has in many emergencies bravely stood for the maintenance of the good name and the honor of Princeton, and wherever you individually have taken a stand for that which is right and honorable and of good report you have felt the substantial support of comrades like-minded with yourselves. You are now to go your separate ways, each in his own place and in his own lot must stand for these ideas upon which we at Princeton have set supreme value. You will not always find yourselves in the majority, you may even be compelled to act as a minority of one, single-handed and with no sympathy or support. This will be the crucial test of your lives. It is then that you must summon from the depth of your convictions that spirit of moral and spiritual courage which proves the man, and bravely face a world of opposition and of scorn.

The National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People reports that in the first six months of this year eleven persons were lynched in America. During the same period last year thirty-three were thus murdered. Florida, with three deaths, has the worst record thus far this year. In Georgia two such murders have been committed, and one each in Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri and Texas. The Association lays the decrease to the agitation for a Federal lynching law and to the northward move of the colored people which has made the South realize the value of Negro labor and the necessity of treating the Negroes more like people.

“Why Not Take Us to America”

By William Willard Howard

THE executive head of a large corporation in Pennsylvania has written to me to suggest that a solution, in part at least, of the Russian refugee situation might be found in a movement to bring some of these educated, cultured gentlefolk to the United States, where they could find congenial and lucrative employment. He says, particularly, that he finds difficulty in obtaining women to work in the half-dozen stores operated by his corporation.

This suggestion is excellent. If it could be carried out it would save the lives of men, women and children now doomed to death by starvation, and at the same time would give to the United States new residents of a highly desirable character. With the exception of educated English and Scotch, I do not know of any possible immigrants who would be of so much actual value to America. I say this, not because I sympathize with the Russians in the tragedy of their exile, but because I have some acquaintance with Russia and with Russian character. Before the war I had traveled across European Russia and the Caucasus region of Asiatic Russia six times—by rail, sledge and wagon, at all seasons of the year.

My own impression of educated Russians is that they are more like Americans than any other of the peoples of Europe. In social gatherings at which Russians, English, Scotch and Americans were present I have had difficulty in identifying the representatives of each race.

If a large number of the exiled Russians could be brought to the United States and provided with employment it would be of incalculable benefit, even though they did not become citizens, for they would return to their old homes at the termination of the scrofula of bolshevism prepared to set up in Russia a republic modeled after the form of government of the United States.

There is only one serious obstacle to the realization of this suggestion. That obstacle is the cost of transportation. If the refugees came singly, without reduction in steamship fares, the cost would be about $210 on a cabin-class steamer, or $360 on a first-class steamer. A steerage passage for these gentlefolk is out of the question. These prices include passport costs. If the refugees came in groups special rates could be arranged with the steamship lines. If my own vessels were fitted to carry passengers the transportation problem would be easier of solution.

The cost of a cabin-class passage would not mean much to the average American, perhaps, but to the members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia now in exile in eastern Europe it has the proportions of dreams of avarice. If a gentlewoman has not eaten food for two days the possibility of an escape to that fairy land that is called “America” is as remote as Arcturus.

The longing of the refugees to emigrate to America is a thing of indescribable pathos. I asked a Russian lady of title what work she would be willing to do to earn a living in America. She answered, quite simply, that she would do anything that an honest woman could do. She would teach French and German, if she could find pupils; she would work in a store; she would work in a factory; she would cook, bake, wash, iron; she would scrub floors; she would till the fields; she would sweep streets. She meant every word. The patent of nobility in this lady’s family was in existence before the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Cape Cod. The original parchment, with its seal and ribbon, has been handed down, generation after generation, as something almost sacred. It was smuggled out of Bolshevik Russia at the time of the revolution as an article more perilous to carry than a can of nitro-glycerine. The original document is in a beautiful state of preservation. The writing on the parchment is clear and distinct, probably because better ink was made three or four centuries ago than is made now. I had the document in my possession for several days while, at odd moments, I studied its Latin inscriptions. The present holder of this title would scrub floors or sweep streets if, by so doing, she could earn a living in America.

It may be asked why I did not bring some of these refugees home with me. I could have filled the Leviathan, the Majestic and the Berengaria ten times over. I could have put into active use every idle steamship owned by the United States Government. One of the women who make the exquisitely fine embroidery in the relief industry that Anne Louise Howard has put into operation for the refugees now existing in indescribable poverty in eastern Europe said to me:

“Why not take us to America and let us work there?”

“I could take a score or two with me, with the same money that now gives employment to two hundred,” I answered. “Which is the better thing to do?”

“The two hundred, of course,” she said.

The same problem arose when a Russian baron came to me to sell the pitiful remnants of his grandmother’s rare old lace that had been in the family for generations.

“Shall I invest my money in beautiful old lace or shall I use it to give employment to destitute women?” I asked.

The baron went away sorrowfully, for he was much in need. An elderly gentlewoman came offering for sale odds and ends of past opulence. That she might not go away hungry I bought a sofa cushion cover on which leisurely fingers had embroidered the family monogram, surmounted by a coronet. I asked the same question that I had asked the baron. The elderly woman, with a lingering look at the monogram and coronet, bowed her head and withdrew sadly. After that no one came to offer things for sale. It was known that the money was exclusively for destitute women, to whom rare old lace exists only in dreams of yesterday.

It may be suggested that I could have bought the old lace, brought it home, sold it and sent the money back to be used in the purchase of more lace. That would have been easy; but it would not have helped those persons whose need is most acute—the utterly destitute gentlewomen who, in frayed garments and broken shoes, face a future black with tragic possibilities. My desire to buy the old lace was strong within me. I wanted to send out word to the refugees that I would buy everything that they had left of their personal possessions. But what real good could I have done? The refugees who parted with the last remnants of their small possessions would have been benefited for a brief time only; then they would have been no better off than before, while the destitute women who should have had the money in the form of payment for work would have had nothing.

There is not much of the old lace left—a few yards here and there for which purchasers have not yet been found—but if any reader of this would rather buy it than send in a contribution to the working fund of Anne Louise Howard's relief industry I shall be glad to assist in the purchase. Moreover, if anyone would like to provide employment in the United States for any of the refugees and pay the costs of transportation I shall be ready at any time to make the necessary arrangements. The money advanced for transportation could be repaid out of the refugees' earnings.

The desire to get to America is as keen among the men as among the women. I have talked with former army officers who would be grateful for a chance to work as chauffeurs, garage helpers or at any honest employment if they could get to America. The mother of a naval officer who was navigator of one of the Tsar's battleships has asked me to give her son a place on one of my ships. I have promised that he shall have the first vacancy that the law permits me to fill with a man who is not a citizen of the United States. The mother is a member of one of Anne Louise Howard's committees of refugees.

The reader probably will infer from what I have written that I regard the giving of employment to destitute gentlewomen of more importance than the purchase of remnants of old lace or the bringing of refugees into the United States. I do so regard it. A dollar used in giving employment to destitute gentlewomen will do as much good as ten dollars used in any other way. The one pressing, urgent need is food for starving women and children. The peasants of Bolshevik Russia have been fed at a cost to America of scores of millions of dollars, while the educated, cultured Russian gentlefolk in exile in eastern Europe have been passed by uncared for and left to die of hunger and neglect. If you who read this believe that the children of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia are as well worth saving as the peasant children of Bolshevik Russia, I ask your help in extending the relief work that Anne Louise Howard is carrying on, single-handed and alone, in eastern Europe. Contributions may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. A forty-page illustrated booklet, describing the beginnings of the relief work and the plan of its operation, will be sent to any address if asked for.

The Modern Attitude Toward the Bible

By Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, D.D.

Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City

THE modern attitude toward the Bible is paradoxical. It is open to the charge of being self-contradictory. At one and the same time the Bible is being more carefully studied and more generally neglected than for several hundred years.

On the one hand, the modern attitude toward the Bible is an attitude of absorbed interest. The Bible is being studied with greater care, with more sedulous attention, and with more acute and penetrating intelligence than at any time since the Canon of its sacred books was closed. Textual criticism, the effort to ascertain the text of the lost original documents, has attained the proportions of a science. It has chapters of romantic adventure, such as that which tells of Tischendorf's discovery of the famous codex Sinaiticus and the rescue of leaves of it from the hands of a sleepy monk who was about to use them to kindle a fire. It has longer chapters of laborious investigation; the microscopic examination of thousands of variant readings; the comparison of Syriac, Ethiopic, and other ancient versions; the diligent study of quotations in the writings of the Fathers. As a result of its multifarious researches it has given us a text in which modern scholarship can take just pride, a text closer to the original than would have been considered possible of attainment when the work was begun.

What is called higher criticism has been carried on with the same painstaking care. Higher criticism concerns itself with the time, the place, the occasion, the authorship of the sacred writings. It has busied itself with the difficult but fascinating problems involved in approaching the Bible in the historical spirit. It has found its patient way through layer upon layer of composite authorship in the case of some of the books of the Old Testament, and then re-arranged them in a way which for the first time makes clear the progressive character of God's revelation of Himself to the Hebrew people. As a result of its study of the New Testament, especially of the first three Gospels and of the four major Epistles of St. Paul, it has authenticated the Christian tradition in all its main features and provided for Christian faith sounder bases of informed, intelligent, scholarly certainty than it has ever before enjoyed.

Then, as though to crown the work, the study of comparative religions has subjected the Bible to critical comparison with the sacred books of other religions, the great Indian epics, the Chinese classics, the Arabian Koran, with the result that the Bible has emerged invested with unique authority and moral grandeur. We are warranted by the facts in saying that in so far as the religious destinies of the human race depend upon any revelation of Himself which God has made to man, they depend upon the revelation recorded in the Bible. As for what we call modern civilization, few will venture to question the assertion that in all its loftier ideals, in all its nobler aims and aspects, it is the creation of the view of life which Christianity has taken from its sacred book. A severed branch soon withers, and what is best in our civilization could not long survive if it were to cease to draw nourishment from its deep-rootedness in the Christian Scriptures.

So much for the scholarly side of the modern attitude toward the Bible. Modern scholarship has subjected it to ultimate tests in the very crucible of criticism. It has given it back to us with its greatness as literature fully recognized, with the nature of the Divine revelation which it contains understood as never before, and with its moral authority enhanced. But the paradox is this, that the public is indifferent. It is probable that at no time since the Protestant Reformation placed the Bible in the hands of the people and bade them find in it the charter of their political as well as their religious liberties—at no time during the past four hundred years has the Bible been so generally neglected by Christian people as it is to-day.

By way of illustration, think of the familiarity with it shown in the writings of our great authors. Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Browning, Ruskin, Carlyle, to mention names almost at random, were steeped in the thought and language of the Christian Scriptures. Compare with that thought and diction most of the vers libre that in our day passes for poetry: it is stepping from the sublime to the banal. Or study the speeches of men in public life. There are notable exceptions, which it would be invidious to mention, but when one thinks what the Bible meant in the speech of Daniel Webster, of Rufus Choate, of Abraham Lincoln, one is conscious that the painful lack of nobility of diction and of sustained elevation of thought which is apparent nowadays in public speaking has as its main cause ignorance of the Bible. From one university comes the complaint that in ten years no student has taken advantage of permission to offer knowledge of the Bible for entrance credit; from another, the complaint that students do not know the Bible well enough to understand the constant allusions to it in English literature. In days when family worship and home training in the Bible have become almost obsolete, hosts of our young people are growing up in complete and classic ignorance of the fact, firmly established by modern scholarship, that the Bible is the most important because the most influential book that the world contains.

The paradox requires explanation, and the reason is not far to seek. We are in a period of transition. It takes time for the vigorous and original thought of scholars to filter through and become the property of the rank and file. Neglect of the Bible must be attributed chiefly to the fact that the results of Biblical criticism are not widely known, that the candid and historical spirit in which it is now being studied is not generally appreciated, and that the Bible is handicapped by being associated with a false and discredited theory concerning the nature of its inspiration. In placing it in the hands of the people the Protestant Reformation accomplished incalculable and epoch-making good, but it accomplished incidental, and as we now see, very serious harm by proclaiming its infallibility as a dogma, and by interpreting this to mean a verbal inerrancy which the Bible nowhere claims for itself. This was a pernicious error. It dehumanized the human authors. It reduced the conception of inspiration from a vital to a mechanical process. Worst of all, it obliterated ethical distinctions, put itself to strange shifts and evasions in the endeavor to reconcile lower with higher standards of morality, and blinded men to the progressive nature of the Divine revelation. The Anglican Church is fortunate in never having committed itself to the dogma of the verbal inerrancy of the Scriptures, and is in a position to press for a right attitude toward them. Nothing is more destructive of their just claims than a false theory of inspiration, and the modern world, which knows that the old theory of inspiration is false, does not yet know how completely the responsible scholarship of the Christian Church has abandoned it.

For this failure the Church is itself largely to blame. The clergy have done too much preaching from proof-texts, using them in a way which often does violence to the real meaning; they have neglected their great teaching function, being given to overmuch preaching; the selection of lessons is often unintelligible; and there has been timidity, the fear of upsetting old people by calling into question traditional opinions, when the real and grave danger was of upsetting young people by not telling them enough of the truth. But the fault is not confined to the Church. The colleges share in it. It is an astonishing fact that many university professors, supposedly educated men, are in dense ignorance of the present attitude of the Church toward the Bible, and indulge in slurring references to both which deeply prejudice the young. This ignorance on the part of men whose business is to teach has had, and is still having, disastrous consequences. It has gone far toward alienating those to whom the Bible, rightly understood and studied in the historical spirit, is calculated to make its strongest and most moving appeal, the young, the eager, the intelligent, the truth-seeking, the great body of college trained men and women of whom it is only too deplorably true that neglect of the Bible is resulting in irreligion and causing thousands of them to lose hold of the conception of a personal God.

There is one straight way back, that is fearless, reverent, candid study of the Bible in the historical spirit, as of a progressive revelation of God which requires for its understanding every gift of mind as well as of heart. Approached in this spirit, difficulties remain, but they are not insurmountable. For instance, in the case of miracles, the first requirement is discrimination. The evidence must be weighed. When we read in the Old Testament of iron ax heads rising to the surface of a pool, of serpents and animals gifted with speech, and similar instances of the miraculous, we know that we are in the familiar realm of ancient folk lore and fable. On the other hand, the miraculous elements in the New Testament, and especially those associated with the life of Christ, are of a very different character. The Incarnation is the central event in history, as even our secular calendar indicates. It was attended by a great assertion of the supremacy of the spiritual over the material. What are laws of nature? We mean by them nothing more than the sum total of our experience. But a Sinless Being, utterly devoted to the will of God, and giving that will free play, is unique in human experience, therefore the effects of such a life are bound to be unique. The whole course of Christian history gives evidence of a new, regenerating and wonder-working power at work in the world since the coming of Christ, changing men's natures, and no one can define with certainty the field of its possible operation. Even when final judgment must be held in suspense, awaiting further evidence, dogmatic disbelief on a priori grounds is not rational. It betrays weakness of imagination; mental as well as moral lack.

We must use our best powers of mind and spirit in the study of the Bible. We must approach it in the historical spirit, seeking nothing except the simple truth. So, and so only, the Book which is central in our religion, which contains all that we know historically of the Divine Founder of our religion, shall become again for an eager and truth-loving age the guide of its thought, the definer of its ideals, and the inspiration of its conduct.

The Sincerity of the Minister

By Rev. John R. Scotford

SINCERITY—so some people insinuate—is impossible to both politician and minister. In order to win votes, the politician must assume an impossible patriotism, and in order to impress his parishioners, the minister must go through the forms of an impossible piety. Such is the argument of the sophisticated. But is the piety of the preacher of a sort with the patriotism of the politician? Can a man serve an ordinary church successfully and save his soul from hypocrisy?

This is a more pressing question than might at first appear. The temptations of the minister are subtle, but powerful. And the greatest of his temptations is that of insincerity.

He must face this temptation in his preaching. There are certain people sitting in the pews who expect him to say certain things. It may be a certain standard of orthodoxy or a certain breed of heterodoxy for which their ears are itching, or it may be a certain social or political philosophy which they desire to see upheld. The ordinary congregation does not want to be disturbed. The path of least resistance for the preacher is to give the people what they want. In this he may be guilty of only a negative insincerity. A good many men manage to preach the truth and nothing but the truth without preaching all of the truth. They believe what they say, but they do not say all that they believe. Usually it is their more burning convictions which are soft-pedalled. The result of this negative insincerity is harmlessness. The world does not take such men seriously. Their fulminations are tolerated rather than heeded.

Then there is also the temptation to emotional insincerity in preaching. The common run of men are impressed by the semblance of sincerity. They desire the preacher to be fearfully in earnest about what he has to say. This demand varies with different sections of the country and various grades of society, but in one form or another it confronts every preacher sooner or later. It is an easy matter for a minister to feign an excitement which he does not truly feel. Men's moods vary. An address given with a natural fervor upon one occasion may be nothing more than a bit of acting when given in the same way at a later date. Especially is this likely to be the case when an address is repeated many times. But the minister who assumes an emotion which he does not feel may gain a hearing for a season, but he ultimately descends to the level of the over-excited side-show spieler.

The task of church administration often leads a minister into insincerity. He is head of a complicated organization carrying on many good works. He desires to see the work go forward with the least possible amount of friction. He is tempted to take Paul's admonition to heart and to seek to be "all things to all men" if by any means he may get a little support out of them. Quite a few ministers know how to sympathize with the employer when in need of funds, and with the union man when in need of popular support.

Rarely does a true prophet try to run an institutional church, for the very genius of a prophet consists in a certain facility in "spilling the beans"—and spilt beans do not help the budget any. But just as soon as a man allows his institutional connections to stifle his convictions a certain spirit of distrust is awakened in the hearts of the people. Without giving a reason, they intuitively discount the words of the minister.

Pastoral work also has its temptations, especially in the smaller churches. The pathway to success for the minister of the smaller church is that of personal popularity. Hosts of personal friends will get him further than powerful sermons. In order to please he adopts a conciliatory attitude towards all creation. Some pastors could give Uriah Heap lessons in humility of the gushing sort. This air of cordiality is pleasing—at first. It flatters for a time, but when the discovery is made that everyone receives the same sort of gush pleasure turns to disgust. Frequently ministers are criticized for being "too nice." Such men are tolerated but not esteemed. No one takes them seriously. For passing favor they have bartered the sincerity of their tongues.

Yet another form of ministerial insincerity is a reaction from those already described. Behold the ministerial sport! Desiring to demonstrate for all time his personal sincerity, he affects an air of utter independence towards creation in general and his critics in particular. Down the street he swaggers with a cigar in front of him. He takes singular delight in using the word "damn" in other than its Scriptural sense, yet "damn" is not a convincing word on the lips of either clergy or laity. The ministerial sport mistakes the smell of tobacco for the savor of sincerity, and the slang of the street corner for the language of the heart. Ministerial unconventionality attracts some people for a little while. Especially is it popular in the ante-room of the lodge. But in the end it creates disgust because of its cheap insincerity.

Maintaining one's sincerity in the ministry is no easy task. It is not a matter of an external manner, but an inner attitude. Sincerity is more than a hand-shake—it is a certain outlook on life. It is not born of a polished manner, but of a burnished soul.

Self-respect is the fountain-head of sincerity in every vocation, and especially in the ministry. Every true man in the ministry has his own particular contribution to make to the life of the church. He should take pride in doing his own work in his own way. Neither the showy eloquence of his neighbor across the road nor the personal popularity of the preacher down the street should tempt him into the slippery path of imitation, for imitation is the seed from which insincerity always germinates. We best serve the church when we are true to our own genius. The parable of the mountain and the squirrel has a deal of application to the ministry. Some great preachers would be about as handy adjusting a family squabble as a mountain trying to crack a nut. Crowds undoubtedly need to be preached to, but multitudes of suffering souls need the ministrations of a wise pastor. God has given to us various talents. We honor our Maker and ourselves when we use them honestly.

Another bulwark of ministerial sincerity is a definite goal before one's church. The man who is running his church without any definite program before him is bound to be a time server and a politician. He must needs keep his job by pleasing certain people—and that is not good for his soul. But the man who has a vision which he is seeking to translate into reality does not need to assume a false earnestness. There will be a fire in his heart which will not need any artificial fanning. He will not be seeking to please the few, but to serve the many. Sincerity will be as natural to him as breathing. After all, sincerity is little more than living for a definite purpose.

As the years go by and the illusions of youth vanish, the problem of maintaining a sincere attitude of good-will towards individuals is certain to arise. The temptation is to regard people simply as names in a card catalogue or pawns in an ecclesiastical game. Yet the minister who does not feel the needs of his people had better sell real estate. But how can the human touch be maintained? By investing one's heart in particular people. No pastor can solve the personal problems of all the people who come within his range. Even to attempt to do this would land him in the madhouse. But for the sake of his own sincerity every minister needs to have two or three people whose troubles he is truly taking upon his heart. There are always boys to be reclaimed from sin, young couples to be watched over, widows to be counseled in their struggles with circumstances. Taking such opportunities for service seriously will deplete the time and tax the strength of the minister—and yet he needs just such tasks for the sake of his own soul. Only thus can he fortify his own sincerity. Experiments in regeneration cannot be reported in the year book, but they are recorded on the pastor's soul. Such service gives point to one's preaching and power to one's prayers. Only by humble, often unseen, service to human need can the minister gain that savor of sincerity with out which his preaching, his church administration, and his pastoral work are utterly vain.

Religious Plays in Switzerland

By Marie Widmer

PASSION PLAY performances are not confined to Oberammergau, for the theme is of such wonderful character and has so many uplifting qualities, both for the performers and the audience, that the very spiritual inspiration derived from the great drama has led other peoples in various parts of the universe to attempt portrayals of the same. For instance, the performances in Selzach, Switzerland, which attracted worldwide attention during seven previous seasons before the war, cannot be designated as merely a copy of the Bavarian Passion Play, for historic records indicate that the German-speaking part of Switzerland took an important part in the rise and development of religious plays in the Middle Ages, and Selzach was already religiously active in 1457 A.D.

The oldest religious play known, called the Easter Play, was founded upon the Easter Gospel. In those early days it was the custom in certain monasteries on Good Friday to place a crucifix in a grave erected in the choir and then on Easter Eve to lift it out, which action was intended to symbolize the Lord's Resurrection. At the early mass on Easter Sunday the subsequent events after the Resurrection were represented to the congregation. Priests, in long robes, personifying the three Marys, approached and asked: "Who shall roll away the stone for us from the door of the Sepulchre?" The angel thereupon asked: "Whom seek ye?" "We seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified," was their reply, and the angel answered: "He is risen, He is not here. Go your way and tell His disciples." Thereupon the priests, taking up their functions, cried out, "He is risen!"

It has been ascertained that the Easter plays of that period, reaching back as far as the tenth century, were chiefly composed of four or five scenes, founded on the texts of St.

Mark 16, 3, 6 and 7, and St. Matthew 28, 6 and 7. The remainder of the performance was filled in by hymns. Further details from the Bible history were gradually added to this original play, until it was finally enlarged and extended to the suffering of the Saviour. Then the descent into Hades was added and therewith arose the greater Easter or Passion Play.

At first the text of the play was entirely in Latin and the players were consequently all of the clergy. Later, however, in the fourteenth century, it was decided by the Church that it was not befitting for a priest to appear as actor; the text was translated into German and the play thus fell into the hands of the laity.

Performances of Easter, Christmas and other religious plays were in particular favor between 1500 and 1627 A.D., when, according to historic records, there were more than two hundred of them in German Switzerland, particularly at Lucerne, Zurich, Basel, Berne, Soleure and Bienne. The plays in these mediaeval days were given out of doors in public squares, where the surrounding houses provided seating accommodation for the spectators. So greatly did the actors—and there were often over three hundred of them—appreciate the honor of taking part in the play, that they actually paid a certain fee, the same being rated higher or lower, in proportion to the importance of the rôle. Music and song were combined with the representations, so that at Lucerne, for instance, in 1583 a band of 156 musicians was employed.

Selzach, a picturesque little village nestling at the foot of the Jura hills, in closest vicinity to the aforementioned cities of Soleure and Bienne, where religious plays were given in the Middle Ages, is the home of a peaceful and pious population of peasants and watch-makers, and the owner of the foremost establishment in this industry, Mr. Adolf Schlaefli, is at the same time beloved by all the inhabitants as the founder and intellectual leader of the Selzach Passion Play.

Mr. Schlaefli is a man who has widely traveled, but of all his visits to foreign lands, none made as tremendous an impression on him as that one in 1890 when, in company of four other inhabitants of Selzach, he witnessed a Passion Play performance at Oberammergau. Inasmuch as it had been the custom of the inhabitants of Selzach to devote the long winter evenings to the study and presentation of various religious plays, Mr. Schlaefli and his friends decided that the people of their village could without difficulty be successfully trained for this greater task.

In 1892 the local Choral Society performed the splendid Christmas Oratorio by Hering with such marked success that the members could easily be persuaded to undertake the study of the great Passion Oratorio by the Rev. H. F. Müller of Fulda. This beautiful work was accordingly adapted by the village school master. Prologues, declamatory text, etc., were added and the first performance took place in the village concert hall in the winter of 1893. The results surpassed all expectations and the Oratorio was now developed into a dramatic reproduction which, as such, was for the first time given in 1895 in a specially erected playhouse of modern type, seating at first twelve hundred persons and later enlarged to accommodate sixteen hundred.

Since that time performances were given in 1896, 1898, 1901, 1905, 1909 and 1913, with such success that Selzach has become internationally known. More than four hundred persons, all inhabitants of the locality, take part in the drama which is divided into morning and afternoon parts. The morning performance contains twenty-one tableaux vivants and scenes, beginning, with "The Creation" and ending with the colorful "Entry into Jerusalem," and the afternoon performance opens with the tableaux "The Designs of the High Council" and has its end and glorious climax in "The Ascension."

Encouraged by their previous successes the Selzach players, young and old, and particularly also those who have been entrusted with a rôle for the first time, have been preparing themselves for their respective parts for many months already. Each and everyone has made his special rôle a veritable part of himself, and this undoubtedly accounts for the many former comments which emphasize that: "A profound devotion, life, power and naturalness breathe through the entire play." It is, of course, understood that only persons of the highest moral standing can partake in the play, but since every member of the native population hopes to act at least once in his life in the play, it would indeed be difficult to find an unworthy individual.

It has been announced that the tableaux this year will be to a greater extent than ever before copies of famous old masters and critics of pre-war performances laid already special stress on this artistic feature of the Selzach play. Thus the "Angelic Salutation" is a replica of Fra Angelico da Fiesole's work, the "Appearance of the Angel to the Shepherds" is a duplicate of Thoma's painting and "The Last Supper" is a reproduction of Leonardo da Vinci's famous picture.

The Selzach drama is entirely artistic and the music is therefore treated as of paramount importance. The orchestra has for the coming season been re-enforced by several artists, so that the large, carefully trained choir will receive every support.

While but a few members remain in the present cast who acted in the seven seasons of performances since 1895, there are many players who have had parts in the play for several periods. Some remain ever faithful to their first rôle, others, however, have in the course of time, acted in different parts, but all treasure the privilege of participating in the play.

Robert Kocher, the Christ of six-play seasons, whose noble portrayal of the Lord has won him universal praise, will now be replaced by a younger force, the son of the mayor of the village. He is a cooper and farmer in private life. Miss Julia Amiet, who represented Mary twice has been married since 1913 and her successor is a daughter of a well-to-do farmer who busies herself at a watchmaking bench during week-days; her brother will have the part of John, the favorite disciple.

Peter is a peasant; Judas—in former performances James the Less—is a combination of farmer and fisherman. The other apostles and male players are mostly farmers, fishermen or watchmakers, and practically all own their own homes. The girls in the cast are generally helpful on their parents' farms, in watchmaking establishments or offices. Pilate is a business man and is also in charge of the business direction of the Passion Play.

Selzach is in excellent railroad communication with all parts of Switzerland, and can be conveniently reached in time for the morning performance, which starts at eleven o'clock, from many important tourist centers. A few plain, but absolutely good hotels and inns cater to the influx of visitors during the mid-day intermission, and accommodate overnight guests in a very limited number.

Reservations for any of the performances which are given every Sunday from June 10 to September 30, also July 16, August 15 and September 3, can be secured directly from the Passion Play Society at the modest figures of ten, eight, five, four and three Swiss francs per seat, according to the location of the same, and to judge from the large number of orders which have already been received, the Passion Play will, as it fully deserves, be visited by tourists of many races and various creeds, for the play in itself is not to be considered a work specially suited to Roman Catholic worship. It is, as critics have said long ago, one great act of union, forming a real and practical step towards an aim so many strive at—the Unity of Christendom—and with its soul-inspiring music it reflects the feeling of every devout Christian soul.

Dr. Lyman P. Powell reports that the story still persists in Philadelphia concerning the woman who wanted to be buried in St. Peter's Church yard there so that on the Judgment Day she could rise with her own set.

The London "Evening News" recently printed a description of America based on what one might learn about it from American moving picture films shown in England. "It is inhabited in the East," ran the sheet, "by unscrupulous but enormously successful business men, who devote their nights to squandering in cabarets their ill-gotten gains of the day before. In the West 'bad men' rob stage coaches and banks and shoot sheriffs and their partners in crime and spend a good deal of time rolling on the ground in attempts to gouge each other's eyes out. The North is peopled by bearded scoundrels who go there to escape from the law, to steal mining claims and to menace lonely girls snowbound in log cabins. The South is notable for cacti and half-breeds. The last named have no particular vice; they are just bad." The justest argument against the average movie is the average movie itself.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

A Survey of Recent Sermon Literature

THE HEALING SHADOW

By BISHOP WILLIAM A. QUAYLE. The Abingdon Press, New York. $2.

Every once in a while some one speaks of the decline of interest in sermons. We are told that no one cares to hear them any more and that no one reads them. As a matter of fact, millions do go to hear them, and there must be many thousands of people who read them because several volumes are published every month. For instance, about twenty-five volumes came to us this spring. It is our purpose to call attention to a few of these. It is impossible to give an extended review of each, but this is not necessary as most all of the preachers are widely known and the announcement that a volume of sermons has come from them is enough. The first on our table is "The Healing Shadow," by Bishop Quayle. These sermons touch upon every phase of the Christian life, and are pervaded with that glowing imagination and insight into things of the spirit that characterize Bishop Quayle's preaching. He is a poet as well as a prophet. The multitudes everywhere hang upon his words. Many will find great satisfaction in this book.

THE POT OF GOLD

By GEORGE CLARKE PECK. The Abingdon Press, New York. $1.25.

This is not really a volume of sermons but is a collection of essays. Dr. Peck, while making his reputation as one of the most distinguished preachers in the Methodist Episcopal Church, took up the habit of writing essays. His volume "Cross-Lots," has become a classic and "Side-Stepping Saints" is being almost as widely read. So, while Dr. Peck started essay writing as an avocation now that has become the vocation and preaching almost the avocation. The essays are on such subjects as, "Worry as an Asset" (a very original essay by the way, with lots of truth in it), "My Cake," "Dusting the Chair," "The Light in the Window" and "That Old Chimney of Mine."

A MONEYLESS MAGNATE, AND OTHER ESSAYS

By FREDERICK F. SHANNON. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50.

Dr. Shannon has come to be one of the most outstanding preachers in the country. A large regular congregation hears him every Sunday in his church in Chicago and hundreds of visitors to the city seek him out. He has been publishing his sermons regularly and one volume which comes to our desk just as we are writing called "The Country Faith" is a collection of summer sermons evidently preached in some rural church during vacation time, on the teachings of nature. It is a collection of beautiful sermons and is as full of poetry as it is of prophecy. "A Moneyless Magnate" is a collection of essays rather departing from the usual sermon style; and yet all of them deal with the greatest phases of religious experience, although some are in lighter vein. There are also biographical sketches of Phillips Brooks, Henry Ward Beecher and Mr. Bryan which are rather interesting.

NIGHT SCENES OF SCRIPTURE

By REV. NORMAN MACLEOD CAIE. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

This volume of sermons introduces a new preacher to America. Mr. Caie is becoming one of the most popular preachers in the Church of Scotland. Professor James Moffatt considers him a man of a great deal of power, imagination and effectiveness as a preacher. These sermons deal with the famous and dramatic night scenes of the Bible, such as Jacob wrestling with the angel, and Nicodemus coming to Christ by night. There are fourteen of these sermons. They are very rich in literary allusion and contain some beautiful and rather unknown poems. Accompanying this volume comes another smaller volume of sermons "Seven Deadly Sins," also from the Doran Company (price $1), which deal with what one might call the cardinal sins, Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Anger, Gluttony, Sensuality. They are really studies of how great men have met these sins and overcome them.

THE RELIGION OF MAIN STREET

By REV. PERCY STICKNEY GRANT. American Library Service, New York. $1.50.

Everybody has been interested in the case of Dr. Percy Stickney Grant ever since his famous sermon in which he referred to the relation of Christ to God and for a time his sermons have been reported in full in the New York papers. This volume contains ten of these sermons including the one mentioned above. The others are "Shall We Consecrate the Churches?" "Beneath the Surfaces," "Old and Young," "Should Liberalism be Generally Taught?" "The Religion of Main Street," "A Firmer Foundation of Christianity," and "Do We Need a New Religion?" The book also contains the Bishop's two letters to Dr. Grant and Dr. Grant's famous reply. It is good to have these sermons bound together, not only are they interesting as revealing a trend of thought pervading in the Church to-day, but also it is valuable as a sort of history of a movement which has excited more interest than almost any accusations of heresy for many years.

THE ARMOR OF YOUTH

By WALTER RUSSELL BOWIE, D.D. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

Although this is a volume of sermons for young folks, a great many older people will like to read them, not only because of their acquaintance with Dr. Bowie, and their recognition of his charm in speaking to children, but because he has been called to the rectorship of the old, famous Grace Church, New York City. These talks to children are really of a very high order, full of imagination—beautiful things for the mother to read to the children at evening time.

THE REVIVAL OF WONDER, AND OTHER ADDRESSES

By REV. MALCOLM JAMES McLEOD, D.D. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

Dr. McLeod has also departed from his usual volume of sermons and has given us a collection of sixteen addresses that he has delivered on many occasions in many places. Under such topics as "The Revival of Wonder," "The Funeral of God," "Millionaires," "The Devil of Fear," "The Religion That Everybody Believes," and "Because I Love America," we have a fervid plea for lifting the whole of our social and national life onto a much higher plane and also a plea for a return to some of the old simplicity of living which usually accompanies high thinking, which we seem to have lost to a certain degree in our day.

JACK-IN-THE-PULPIT

By AVERY A. SHAW. The Judson Press, Philadelphia. $1.

Here is another volume of children's sermons by one who has made a great reputation in preaching to youngsters. They are short, and each one is a living picture. The older people in the congregation were so interested in these sermons that they insisted that Dr. Shaw collect them in book form and here they are as interesting as any of the best sellers.

THE BUSINESS OF LIVING

By L. D. ANDERSON. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.60.

These sermons and essays deal with the every-day business of living. There are such topics as "Life Capital," "Life Conservation," "Insurance for the Next World and This," and each one is suggestive and interesting.

TO START THE DAY

By REV. JOHN TIMOTHY STONE. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50.

This is not a volume of sermons, but is it a devotional book containing for each day, a Scripture verse and a short poem. The book is edited by Dr. Stone and the captions which sum up the verse in one sentence are of course, his. A good companion to take with one to the seashore. It is a fine thing to begin each day with this one word with God.

CLARION CALLS FROM CAPITOL HILL

By HON. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50.

Congressman Upshaw has gone up and down the United States attracting great crowds everywhere, pleading for a sober nation, but not only has he been one of the prophets of the new temperance movement, but he has been a preacher of Americanism and of justice to the oppressed. There has been a large demand for these various addresses and the Revell Company have rendered a real service in bringing twenty of them together. There is much valuable information as to certain conditions in the United States and above all there is a real passion for pure, honorable manhood.

THE FIFTH HORSEMAN, AND OTHER SERMONS

By ROBERT HUGH MORRIS. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

These sermons are particularly notable for their emphasis upon the old words of grace, sin, judgment, repentance, incarnation, atonement, redemption, sacrifice, faith and the eternal life. They are a call to the old gospel, but the old gospel brought into close contact in a most helpful way with our most modern deeds.

GOD'S WILL FOR THE WORLD

By HENRY B. WILSON, B.D. E. P. Dutton Company, New York. $1.50.

This is a refutation of the popular interpretation of the phrase, "Thy will be done." Mr. Wilson contends that this phrase has too often meant a despairing resignation to whatever comes to one in life. He shows that it does not mean this at all. That it is a glad, vigorous enthusiastic enrolment of one's self on the side of God in the great work he has in hand and is really a shout of triumphant victory because one is linked to the will of God.

LEARN TO LIVE

By REV. DANIEL A. POLING. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50.

This is a volume of sixteen short talks, many of which we judge have been given before great groups of Christian Endeavorers to whom Dr. Poling has been a leader for many years. It is interesting to remember that Dr. Poling has just been made full pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church in New York City in association with Dr. Burrell. This arrangement probably means that Dr. Poling will continue to be pastor when Dr. Burrell retires from the pulpit. The talks are very direct and suggestive.

PROSPERITY, HOW TO ATTRACT IT

By ORISON SWETT MARDEN. Success Magazine Corporation, New York. $1.75.

Mr. Marden's list of books for young people has become so long that they are numbered by his years. One picks the last book up, feeling that he cannot have said anything new and yet he always seems to. This little book on prosperity is really very fresh and stimulating, dealing with such subjects as "The Law of Attraction," and "Establishing the Creative Consciousness," and "How to Increase Your Ability." It is a good book for any boy to read and ponder, or any man for that matter.

Some Religious Problems

RELIGIOUS PERPLEXITIES

By L. P. JACKS, D.D., LL.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.

This interesting and stimulating book is the substance of three lectures given by invitation of the Hibbert Trustees in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham and other cities. The three topics treated as The Source of Perplexity; Religious Perplexity in General; Perplexity in the Christian Religion. The book starts with the origin of all perplexity, namely that of self. We are more perplexed about ourselves, what we are, what are we here for anyhow, what is the meaning of our life, than we are about God. If we can answer this question we will be ready to believe in God. The first question is: Why does God need man? If He does not need him why did He create him. The way to get rid of religious perplexity is to test the universe in every direction. There is a distinct resemblance to James's doctrine of the will to believe here, of Christ's teaching, for that matter, the oldest pragmatic doctrine of them all: He that will do the will of God shall know of the doctrine. The final conclusion is that Jesus seems universally to have led all who have yielded themselves to Him into light, that the best thing the perplexed Christian can do is to cease worrying about his doctrinal, philosophical and metaphysical perplexities and follow Jesus. But following Christ is more than accepting his teachings. It is a superb loyalty to Him as Lord and Master of one's life. It is a very stimulating little book.

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

LIBERALISM, MODERNISM AND TRADITION

By REV. O. C. QUICK, M.A. Longman's, Green and Company, New York. $2.50.

The Canon of Newcastle in these Bishop Paddock lectures for 1922 begins by describing Liberal Protestantism, Catholic and Evolutionary Modernism and Traditionalism and then turns "to essay that much more presumptuous and difficult task of determining . . . in what consists . . . the really permanent element in the Christian revelation which ought to be recognized as the one basis for every structure of Christian theology.

Here he makes two assumptions: "(1) That the Gospel according to St. Mark and the passages common to Matthew and Luke present on the whole an authentic account of our Lord's life and teaching; (2) that in the Acts and Epistles we have on the whole a true picture of the beliefs and practices of the first and, in part, of the second generation of Christians."

On this basis he comes to the conclusion "that the primary datum of Christianity is not just the life of Jesus taken by itself, nor the mere genesis of a new religious idea embodied in a society, but essentially the effect of the historic life of Jesus on the life of the Christian community, which effect is inseparable from the continued life and Spiritual presence of Jesus himself as the Church's head." And further that the doctrine of the two natures of Christ as defined at Chalcedon "is just a form or mould for Christology. Up to a point it is a permanent and necessary form."

Canon Quick believes that the critical work on the documents of the Bible is complete in the main issues and declares: "The historical problem of the Bible must give way to the doctrinal problem of the creeds as the center of gravity in Christian thought."

"Origin and tradition must make their full contributions to the whole no less than the latest discoveries of the contemporary mind. And having taken our stand on this fundamental Catholicism we can then admit also the principle of Protestantism as a subordinate element which we are bound to preserve." A little later Canon Quick describes the basis on which this union is possible: "The union of Catholicism and Protestantism can only be found in the religion of the Resurrection through the Cross, and that again is the religion of Him who died on Calvary and rose again to give His Spirit to His Church. We must be loyal to the sacramental gospel of the resurrection. There is not, nor ever can be, any other hope for mankind.

Within its limits which are very clearly stated ("neither to restate or state any Christology, but to define the empirical data of Christianity from which all Christologies should start"), the book performs a genuine service in the present crisis of the Church.

Canon Quick is just and fair in his appraisals. The sketch of Liberal Protestantism with which he begins is a valuable appreciation both of its limitations and its great services to the cause of modern Christianity.

Social Studies

THE MEANING OF CHILD LABOR

By RAYMOND D. FULLER. The A. C. McClurg Company, Chicago. $1.

Mr. Fuller has previously written on child labor, having been identified with the National Child Labor Committee and being one of the authors of their recent volume, "Rural Child Labor." This volume is a comprehensive statement which touches on the important phases of child labor, giving two chapters to the influence of child labor on schools, one excellent chapter on some costs of child labor, and a chapter each to Federal and State legislation on the topic.

THE RUSSIAN IMMIGRANT

By JEROME DAVIS. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

Mr. Davis, who is now Assistant Professor of Sociology at Dartmouth College, has given recent years to a thorough study of the Russians in America. He has assembled a vast amount of interesting data. In the main Mr. Davis's presentation shows the lack of assimilation, that the melting pot has not been melting. Studies of other immigrant groups come to the same conclusion. America is only a crude melting pot, at best. The whole matter is put squarely before us in a quotation from an unpublished address by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise: "I would have America either shut out foreigners or take them in, not leave them dangling in spirit at our doors, physically admitted to, but spiritually excluded from, the life of the Republic."

PACEMAKERS IN FARMERS' CO-OPERATION

By BENSON Y. LANDIS, with a foreword by DR. WARREN H. WILSON. From Home Lands, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York. 15 cents.

This monograph presents a bird's-eye picture of the extent to which farmers' co-operation is developing throughout the United States. In the words of the author the purposes of this study "are to give a comprehensive account of the present extent of farmers' co-operative enterprise, to explain various types of organizations and methods used; to tell the stories of successful local and federated co-operatives, to estimate the full significance of this important and rapidly growing movement. It includes the first extensive survey of local co-operatives covering organizations in 202 representative counties in forty-four States. It is a narrative of some of the very recent efforts as well as the older tested organizations. Interest is solely in co-operation among farmers in buying, selling and other steps, the distribution of supplies and produce."

This pamphlet is of particular importance at this time. For the last two or three years the farm problem has been one of the most acute economic and industrial questions in America. Because of the unprecedented decline in the price of farm products, the purchasing power of the farmer was cut in half. To-day business men all over the country are asking themselves, "When will the farmer come back into the market as a large buyer of farm implements, fertilizers, automobiles, tractors and other merchandise?" Indeed it is a question whether the real prosperity of the United States does not wait upon such a revival in purchasing power on the part of our agricultural population. Mr. Landis' monograph shows not only the rapid strides which have been made in co-operative marketing during these last few years, but points to possibilities of further developments along these same lines. At present farming appears to be an extra hazardous occupation. The farmers' co-operative movement should be a stabilizing influence which should tend to make the nation's economic machinery run more smoothly. Nowhere else in as compact shape is there a better summary of the development and present status of the co-operative movement.

Religious Education

THE CHILD IN HIS WORLD

By PAUL PATTON FARIS and J. GERTRUDE HUTTON. The Presbyterian Board of Publication. $1.25.

This is the Board's Junior Department course for Vacation Schools for 1923, and shows an advance towards securing participation of the pupils in school organization and activities. An interesting plan for school organization is suggested on page thirty-one. Hand-work lessons, prepared by Miss Hutton, correlated with the Bible work, and aim to be "ways by which the pupils may be led to express the principles they are acquiring in the daily life of the school." About the Bible material a skilled teacher makes the following suggestions: "There seem to be no definite directions as to steps in a well-organized lesson plan. For that reason a splendid book may prove to be uninteresting if an unskilled teacher attempts to give over the lessons just as written. The book would have been stronger, also, had more provision been made for reviews and drills." Sometimes a too literal and non-symbolical rendering of Old Testament stories, as for example, the story of Samson's hair, would leave a doubt in the mind of the thinking pupil. The point about Samson's hair, of course, is that it was the sign of the purity and self-control in which as a Nazarite he had been brought up. The themes for each week are in general well chosen.

THE CHILD AND AMERICA'S FUTURE

By JAY S. STOWELL. The Council of Women for Home Missions and the Missionary Education Movement. Cloth 75 cents; paper 50 cents.

The two subjects for mission study for the autumn and winter of 1923-4 are Japan and the home, as for 1924-5 they are to be China and race relationships. This book is the more popular of the two on the home for seniors, Dr. Finley's being slightly more advanced. Mr. Stowell brings to the task of preparing it unusual qualifications, for he has been board secretary, church school worker, and teacher in the public schools. This is an excellent book to read to find out what leaders among the public school teachers are thinking. It is also a good one to put into the hands of public school teachers to show what church leaders are thinking. The first chapter is based on Kidd's well-known sentence about the possibility of altering human life throughout the world in a single generation by reaching the young. This statement the author illustrates by Falk's new Germany, the new Japan, the sudden rise of prohibition feeling in America, the cigarette drive in the war, and the corn-club movement in the South. In his last chapter the author picks out seven ways in which America in the future is to be different, and it would be an interesting task to make one's own list first and then compare it with his. Young people's societies will find this volume of even more interest than most mission study books, because it is so closely connected with the public schools, which they know well. The Missionary Education Movement is doing the churches rare service in providing books of this kind and training leaders to teach them.

Novels

THE LAST OF THE VIKINGS

By JOHAN BOJER. The Century Company, New York. $2.

ONE OF OURS

By WILLA CATHER. Alfred A. Knopf, New York. $1.75.

UNDER A THOUSAND EYES

By FLORENCE LIVINGSTON. The Cosmopolitan Book Corporation, New York. $2.

THE WOODS RIDER

By FRANK POLLOCK. The Century Company, New York. $1.75.

ROBIN

By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $2.

Among this group of recent novels the outstanding one, we think, is the first by the great Scandinavian novelist, Johan Bojer. He himself went with the "Lofoten" boats to fish and he brings to the writing of this novel about Lofoten fishermen, as to his others, great experiences to enforce his vivid descriptions. The people of a Scandinavian fishing village, with their trials and adventures, really make up the story of this book, which is much more a tale of adventure than of romance.

"One of Ours," by Willa Cather, is a story of the Middle West during war time. Particularly interesting is the graphic portrayal of home life on the farm. The theme is an unhappy marriage and the book throws a good deal of light on incompatibility which is undoubtedly emerging as an ever-present cause of marital unhappiness.

"Under a Thousand Eyes" is a conventional but fairly interesting story with the setting in a Vermont village. It plays up the traditional heartless mortgage holder, and has a deep human appeal in some of the incidents.

"The Woods Rider" is a narrative of adventure mainly dealing with the pine country of the South. It may be read for entertainment only.

"Robin" is a dramatic war story with a clever plot, which may make many weep, but which we can only describe as in general rather sentimental.

Miscellaneous

MEMORIES OF TRAVEL

By JAMES BRYCE. The Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50.

This is the last book written by James Bryce. The author was a great traveler and had the habit of making extensive notes. The observations herein recorded remind one of the painstaking and striking pages of the best of Darwin's travel sketches. The comparative grandeur of Iceland, Poland, Hungary, the Southern Pacific Islands, the Altai Mountains and North America is set forth in charming style. Lord Bryce is known in this country as the author of "The American Commonwealth"—the best book on American institutions ever written. He is known and loved as well on account of the work he did in fostering friendship between Great Britain and America while Ambassador to this country. Few are the people here, however, who know him as one of the great lovers of nature. To a multitude this posthumous work will proclaim the author as a mountain-climber for the first time. There are surprises awaiting American readers. The famous Pike's Peak in Colorado, he says, is "a singularly tame and featureless object." But, on the other hand, it is his judgment that "neither Europe nor Asia nor South America has a prospect in which sea and woods and snow mountains are so united in a landscape as in the view from Puget Sound of the great peaks that rise like white towers above the dark green forests of the Cascade Range, nor any valley gorges wilder than those of the Rockies, more beautiful than those of the Sierra Nevada. And in richness of colors, whether we think of the autumn woods of Maine or the rocks of the Western Canyons, America is pre-eminent."

THE LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

ROOSEVELT AS THE POETS SAW HIM

Edited by CHARLES HANSON TOWNE, assisted by CLARA THACKERAY HILLMAN. Introduction by MRS. CORINNE ROOSEVELT ROBINSON. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50.

No man in America since Lincoln has had a stronger personal hold on public opinion than Roosevelt. Nor has any man had just the same claim to almost universal popularity which Roosevelt has. It was therefore an inspired thought for two poets, Charles Hanson Towne and Roosevelt's sister, Mrs. Corinne Roosevelt Robinson, to assemble this volume of poetry concerning that great American. And it was a further sign of their good judgment that they should include in this book not only elegiac poems, but verses of all sorts, upon every aspect of Roosevelt's career. Mrs. Robinson's introduction tells the truth simply: "If one should read this collection, and nothing more, one could still get a comprehensive idea of the love of the people for this man of manifold and generous activities." All kinds of verses are here, from the solemn and weighty word of serious poetry, to the flashing, ragged anonymous ballad. Here are glimpses of Roosevelt and America in the Spanish War, in the World War, when Roosevelt was President, when he made that triumphal journey around the world so like and so unlike to Grant's famous world journey. Here is Katherine Lee Bates's fine poem on "Roosevelt's Guest," referring to Booker T. Washington's lunching with the President at the White House; and Wallace Irwin's exuberant "Ballad of Sagamore Hill;" and Jefferson Toombs's whimsically pathetic "Missing:"

"I lay down my fresh morning paper,
I drop it at once from my hand;
No thrilling account of his caper
Appears there to stir up the land,
There's nothing on roses or rabies,
There's nothing on taxes or teeth,
There's nothing on ballots or babies,
No sword is a-clank in its sheath—
It makes me feel terribly solemn;
No longer he fills the first column."

Amelia Josephine Burr has written a magnificently simple poem in "Mr. Valiant Passes Over." It is most moving to observe how closely the memory of Roosevelt is entwined with the thought of great religious characters in the Bible and elsewhere. Rudyard Kipling's noble tribute "Great-Heart" is included:

"Concerning brave Captains
Our age hath made known
For all men to honor,
One standeth alone,
Of whom, o'er both oceans

Both peoples may say:
'Our realm is diminished
With Great-Heart away.'"

The heat of his spirit
Struck warm through all lands;
For he loved such as showed
'Emselves men of their hands;
In love, as in hate,
Paying home to the last . . .
But our world is none the kinder
Now Great-Heart hath passed!"

The book fittingly closes with Mrs. Robinson's lyric memorial "Sagamore." Read this volume and feel again the surging strength of this revered and beloved personality.

MATTER AND SPIRIT

By JAMES BISSETT PRATT, Professor of Philosophy at Williams College. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

This volume consists of an elaboration of lectures delivered at the Yale Divinity School in 1922. There is hardly space to enter into an extended discussion of most of the interesting material in the book. We confine ourselves to indicating some of Professor Pratt's contentions and conclusions in his last chapter on "The Consequences of Dualism in Morality and Religion." In the course of it he contends that the times call for a philosophy which shall be "frankly and thoroughly dualistic, a recognition of the fact to which unspoiled experience seems so plainly to point, that the world of matter and the world of spirit are not made of the same stuff." (Italics ours). Turning to the teachings of the religions of the world, Islam, Professor Pratt claims, is frankly and cruelly dualistic. It is at the heart of Zoroastrianism. "Wherever you find Buddhism you will find a recognition of the struggle between the spirit and the flesh." In Hinduism he finds elements to make somewhat the same claim. "The religion of Ancient Israel is frankly and naively dualistic." And "the dualistic view was as a matter of course taken over into Christianity." The book is very interesting and stimulating, especially this last chapter which contends, for instance, that "if we accept the dualistic philosophy, this much at least we know: that the supernatural realm exists, because you and I are members of it." "Beloved, now are we the sons of God."

JESUS OF NAZARETH

A Biography by JOHN MARK. D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.

The unknown editor of this book takes the author of the second gospel as the "John whose surname was Mark" (Acts 15:37), the companion of Barnabas when he sailed for Cyprus on his second missionary journey. With this title, the editor then presents the Gospel according to Mark as he thinks it would be written for the twentieth century instead of the first.

THE POET'S LIFE OF CHRIST

Compiled, arranged and decorated by NORMAN AULT. The Oxford University Press, New York City. $3.25.

This is an exceedingly valuable collection of almost seven hundred poems about Jesus. It is an anthology of poems ranging over almost seven centuries, between the years 1350 and 1922. The arrangement is first chronological and then topical. Some of the divisions are: The Birth, Childhood, He that Should Come, The Sermon on the Mount, In Galilee, In Divers Places, and He Taught Them, Despised and Rejected, etc. In going through the book one is impressed by the number of authors and by the great value of a book containing this large number of carefully classified poems. Through a book like this one learns how many of the great poets of England wrote about some phase of the life of Jesus.

COMPLETE CONCORDANCE TO THE AMERICAN STANDARD BIBLE

By M. C. HAZARD, Ph. D. Thomas Nelson and Sons, New York. $5.

This is the first complete concordance to the American Standard Bible that has been made and as such it is an indispensable tool for the library of the preacher and Sunday-school teacher. The book is carefully and simply printed on thin paper, so that it is not so bulky as the old concordances. It has also many other advantages, as, for example, the pronunciation and meaning of proper names of persons and places, and brief notes of biographical and geographical information. Other features of the book include the omission of certain prepositions and other unimportant words (a list of which is given at the beginning of the volume), and the use of simple and obvious abbreviations, all of which perform the valuable service of making the book convenient in size. Again, when a number of individuals have the same name (as so often occurs in the Bible), the references are grouped under the separate individuals, so that the searcher is saved the job of turning up all the Bible references to find out which refer to the particular individual in whom he is interested. The use of sub-divisions is another great labor-saving device for the Bible student. Thus time and patience in wading through a mass of unrelated items are saved and the reference desired may be found with the greatest possible degree of promptness. We are glad to recommend this excellently prepared concordance, for we are certain that its use will make for a more accurate and a more interesting use of the Bible by both preachers and teachers.

CONTACTS WITH NON-CHRISTIAN CULTURES

By DANIEL JOHNSON FLEMING. George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.

This is one of the most fascinating books on the foreign missionary problem we have read for a long time. It does indeed "give an insight into certain features of the missionary task which are not ordinarily found in missionary literature."

Under eight headings are gathered together an extraordinary variety of missionary problems succinctly stated and with a brief and suggestive outline of discussion following the statement of each group of "cases." Evidently Professor Fleming believes in the Socratic method of education. The first heading includes "Matters of Doubtful Expediency" and begins with a section of "Survivals of Superstition among Christians."

If any one thinks that missionaries do not need all the mind power, the tactfulness, the devotion and conviction that is possible let him read this book! Here, for example, is the Oriental dread of the "evil eye" made vivid: "One young missionary, just out from America, passed his cook's boy in the compound, stroked his head in an affectionate way, and said some word of praise. The next day the child took smallpox, and it was years before that missionary lived down the effects of that innocent mistake."

Here are the perplexity arising over the dislike of many peoples for western ways, the problems of the Christian family, difficulties concerning the use of idols as ornaments, the complications of polygamy, the puzzles in regard to the administration of baptism—all illustrated by instance after instance taken directly from missionary records. "In many instances," says Professor Fleming, "there is no absolutely right or absolutely wrong answer."

Such a book as this sheds a flood of light on what Christianity really is, not only for those going to the foreign field, but for those working in our own country. Most of us do not realize what creatures of habit we are and how doubtful many of our own ways must appear when fearlessly faced in the light of the universal Gospel.

An index and an arrangement of the matters treated under the headings of "economic," "law," "sociology," etc., and again under the various countries discussed makes the book available for study from every angle.

THE REDMAN IN THE UNITED STATES: AN INTIMATE STUDY OF THE SOCIAL, ECONOMIC AND RELIGIOUS LIFE OF THE AMERICAN INDIAN

Made under the direction of G. E. E. LINDQUIST. George H. Doran Company, New York City, for the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys. $3.50.

The work of making this exhaustive survey of the American Indian has been throughout under the direction of G. E. E. Lindquist, who for years has been prominent in Y. M. C. A. work among the Indians and who was released for this study by the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. The survey and the presentation of its results have taken, all told, the better part of three years. In the course of the work all of the 161 reservations of the United States received a personal visit from one or another of the group of Indian experts who assisted in making the survey, while the study has also covered innumerable scattered bands of Indians dotted here and there about the country. The result is a handsome volume of 464 pages with some sixty illustrations and maps. The book is divided into two parts. The first part, dealing in general terms with the Indian problem in the United States, particularly from the point of view of missionary and educational endeavor, gives sufficient background to enable the general reader to obtain a fair grasp of the situation. The second part deals specifically with the results of the surveys. The chapters are divided geographically and each reservation or Indian band receives individual treatment. In the appendices is found such information as, for instance, complete statistics of all Protestant missions to Indians in the United States, tabulations of Roman Catholic and other work among the Indians, synopses of educational institutions and a very complete bibliography.

Thirty-four members of a Negro theatrical company took passage for England on the Cunarder Albania not long ago. Certain of the white passengers protested to the captain against eating in the same room with the Negroes. He compromised by putting up screens in the dining room between the two races. But after two days on board, the Negro performers had made themselves so popular by their part in the ship's concert that their white fellow passengers changed their attitude, and some of them even apologized for their previous conduct. After all, even the colored man ultimately is going to be rated everywhere by what he can do and what he is and not by his complexion.

Prodigal Daughters*

INSTALLMENT XVII.

When Miss Honeywood left, however, the girl found herself in a very unsettled frame of mind. Miss Statham's words haunted her. Of what use, after all, was the freedom she had gained? It was not as though she had no home and was obliged to live as she was doing. Had that been the case she thought she could have been tolerably content; but in spite of everything, the thought of home made a strong appeal to her. She could not help remembering what Miss Statham had said about her father. Yes, in a way she was proud of him. He might be a little puritanical, but he was a gentleman still, a gentleman of the highest order. He was lovable, too. In her antagonism to his restrictions she had declared she had not a particle of affection for him, but as she sat thinking about him that morning something seemed to rise up in her heart, something which she could not understand.

Not that she intended to go back. Her pride, if nothing else, forbade that. She could not conceive herself confessing that she had made a mistake. And yet, and yet—Where was Rod Ravenscroft? she wondered. Since that morning after the awful night which she still shuddered to think about she had never seen him, never heard of him. Of course, he had forgotten her. Probably he had become engaged to that girl she had seen him with on Hampstead Heath, or if not her, another. Oh, what a fool, what a blind fool she had been! Her heart ached at the thought of living her life without him, and yet she would have to.

Suppose she should succeed even as Miss Statham had succeeded, and suppose she were to receive a salary sufficient to enable her to live amidst such surroundings as Miss Statham lived—what then?

Then the other side rose up before her. After all, marriage was a sordid, miserable thing, and men in the main were brutes. Peggy had married the man she said she loved—yet think of her spending her life with such a creature as Barnes! Think of the intimate associations which a wife must have with such a husband! The thought was nauseous. And all men were essentially the same. Mean, selfish, mere animals, who looked upon women as their playthings. No, on the whole, she was glad of what she had done. She, Eleanor Trelawney, could never become the orthodox wife. She could never submit to a lifetime association with any man, even although her heart were at that moment aching for Rod Ravenscroft.

She took a book from a shelf and tried to read, but the thing would not hold her attention; she found her mind wandering. What was Peggy doing? she wondered. The child's misery had saddened her, and she instinctively felt how Peggy loathed the thought of going back to Primrose Terrace. She herself became heavy-hearted and miserable at the thought of it.

She threw aside the book. She could not stay indoors. But where could she go? The day was a wild and stormy one, and the dark clouds which had swept across the sky were in accord with her feelings.

Yes, she felt anxious about Peggy. Somehow or another she was possessed with the idea that all was not right, that something more than ordinary had happened. She remembered, half with a laugh of amusement and half with a feeling of disgust, her experiences at Primrose Terrace, and she could not think of going there again. All the same, when afternoon came she made her way towards the tube that would take her to Camden Town. Yes, she felt she must go. She wanted to assure herself that no harm had happened to her sister.

A little later she stood at the door of 13 Primrose Terrace, and knocked. There was no reply. She knocked again and again, still there was no answer. The house was empty. What could it mean? She was about to turn away when the door of the adjoining house was opened.

"You want to see Mrs. Barnes?" asked a slatternly woman.

"I want to see young Mrs. Barnes, yes."

"Well, she ain't here. Mrs. Barnes and the girls are gone away for a bit of an 'oliday. Where Jim Barnes is I don't know. Are you the sister of the young lady what married Jim Barnes?"

"Yes."

"Well, then you can't see 'er," and the woman laughed meaningly.

"I don't understand," said Eleanor. "Is there anything wrong?"

"It is not for me to say nothink, although I am a next door neighbor; but perhaps I ought to tell you. Young Mrs. Barnes went out yesterday about 'alf-past one, and no sooner 'ad she gone than Mrs. Barnes and the girls left the 'ouse. Mrs. Barnes says to me, 'Mrs. Simpkins,' she says, 'me and the girls are going off for a bit of an 'oliday, and we shan't be back for a few days, while Jim is off on his 'own. If that young minx of a wife of his comes here knocking, as I expect she will, you can give her this letter. It will give her full explanation,' she says."

"But—but—What do you mean?" asked Eleanor.

"I'm telling you as fast as I can. I went out to the movies last night. Went out about eight and didn't come back until after ten. I 'adn't been back long when I 'eard the knocker of No. 13 going like anythink, so I just opened the door and there was your sister. It would seem that she didn't know anything about Mrs. Barnes and the girls going away, for when I told her she seemed all stunned like. I giv her the note which Mrs. Barnes had left, and that's all; at least that's all I know for certain, although I've me thoughts. I ain't lived here for nothink. Mrs. Barnes 'ave told me a lot, she 'ave. More than once she says to me, 'Jim's wife may be a lady,' she says, 'and 'ave a lot of aristocratic connections,' she says, 'but she don't bring a penny with 'er, and Jim ain't going to stand 'er tantrums.' When she came 'ere first Mrs. Barnes kind of crowed it over me, and made out that she was superior to me, and was going to be invited to the general's 'ouse and all tht sort of thing; but I told 'er what I thought then, I did, and when I sees 'ow things were going on, and 'eard what the girls said, I was able to put two and two together, I was."

"But you gave my sister a note?"

"Yes, I give it to 'er just as it was giv to me. I'm a respectable woman, I am, and didn't open it, nor nothink."

"And she? What did she say?"

"She didn't say nothink. She seemed all stunned like, and as she 'ad never been friendly with me I just closed the door as soon as I give 'er the letter."

"Is that all you know?" asked Eleanor.

"Well, it is and it isn't. Just out of curiosity like, I opened the door again and watched 'er and I see 'er go down the steps and walk away by 'erself. She didn't seem to know where she was going or what she was doing. Then I see 'er stand under that lamp-post and read the letter I giv 'er. I watched 'er for two or three minutes while she stood there, and then she kind of staggered away."

"And is that all you know?"

"That's all I know. It wasn't my business, and she never even condescended to speak to me, so why should I trouble? But I 'ave me thoughts all the same."

Eleanor left Primrose Terrace almost frenzied with anxiety. She had heard enough to tell her the whole miserable story. What had happened was evident. But what had become of Peggy? Where had she gone? She had a few shillings in her pocket, she knew. She had given her some money herself. But where had she gone? What had she done? If the Barnes' door was closed against her, where could she go? Where had she passed the night?

The thought of Peggy wandering through the miserable streets of Camden Town late at night, homeless and friendless, was horrible to contemplate; and yet that was what must have happened to her!

Almost unconsciously she made her way back to St. Hildebrand's Mansions. She wanted to be alone. She wanted to think out the whole situation.

The thought was maddening. Peggy, her sister, to be placed in such an awful predicament! She, a young girl, to be homeless, friendless, deserted. She thought she saw the reason why Peggy had not come to her. She was too proud, too ashamed to confess the ghastly truth.

She dismissed the thought that Peggy had gone home to Hampstead with scarcely a moment's consideration. She remembered that her sister had said, only the previous night, that she could never go home again. But where was she? That was the thought which haunted her with ghastly persistency.

She made herself a cup of tea, and then, having hurriedly swallowed it, went out again. The room seemed to stifle her. Presently she found herself in Holborn. Sunday evening though it was, 'buses rushed thither and thither, while pedestrians thronged the sidewalks. Unheeding whither she went, she turned her face eastward and presently found herself in the city. She had no reason for going there; she simply followed a blind impulse. The traffic was much thinner here and she was able to think more calmly. As she walked the church bells began to ring. They were calling the people to worship. She had told herself again and again that that kind of thing had no meaning to her, that it had gone with a hundred other effete institutions; and yet these church bells had a meaning. All over the land they would be ringing, calling the people to prayer. There was something beautiful in the thought, in spite of everything. Why should one pray? And why was it that what people called religion still appealed to people when intellectually they had given up the creeds of their fathers? Of course, too, religion was associated with some ethical code, and after all, the best and the most thoughtful people in the world had declared their need of it. She, Eleanor Trelawney, was a living being, with all sorts of hopes and longings and desires. What was life after all? What did it mean? Was there anything after death?

Of what she saw and heard during her walk back to St. Hildebrand's Mansions she knew nothing, cared nothing. When she saw the great block of buildings, of which her little rooms formed a tiny part, she almost shuddered. It might be hours before Miss Honeywood would return. How could she bear to pass the time alone? She entered the vestibule with a heartache such as she thought she had never felt before, and then suddenly she started back like one afraid. The place was dimly lit and the man who attended the lift did not appear to be near, but she had a kind of consciousness that she was being watched.

"Eleanor! It is you, isn't it?"

It was Peggy's voice.

"Peggy!" the word was a gasp. "Is—is it you?"

"Yes!—can't you see?"

Then the flood-gates of Eleanor's heart were opened, and throwing her arms round her sister's neck she sobbed convulsively.

"Oh, thank God! Thank God!" she cried; but why she said it she did not know.

PEGGY PLEADS WITH ELEANOR.

THEY were seated alone in Eleanor's room. Peggy had thrown off her hat and jacket, while Eleanor looked at her again and again as if to assure herself that it was really her sister.

Perhaps she had not yet recovered from the experiences of the day, but she could not understand the look in Peggy's eyes. She had feared that some awful calamity had befallen her. Even now she was afraid of the revelations which might be made to her. That was why she wondered at the look of joy which she saw.

"Peggy, tell me!" she cried. "I don't know why it was, but I went up to that awful place to see you this afternoon, and the door was locked, and the woman in the next house told me such a horrible story! Tell me, where have you been? What has happened? What is the meaning of it all?"

"Don't you know?" cried Peggy. "But of course you don't—how could you? I forgot!"

And then the child poured out the miserable story of the past few months; told of the things about which she had, in the past, been silent; showed her sister her heart.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Week-Day Religious Instruction in a Rural Community

By Rev. George H. Hobart

MORTON, in Monroe County, New York, is a distinctively rural community in the fruit belt of the western part of the State. This community has one church, Baptist, which has adapted itself to serve the religious needs of the entire community. The constituency to which it ministers in membership and congregation consists of nearly one hundred and twenty-five families. These are scattered over a territory of from ten to twelve square miles. In this territory there are six rural schools, one of which is a modern two-room building in the village of Morton. This general statement is given that it may be seen that we are thoroughly rural.

To serve its constituency the church has emphasized the need of religious education for the children, feeling that its greatest asset is the developing child life. In addition to the Sunday-school, week-day religious instruction is given in the district school in the village. Because of the difficulties involved work has not been attempted in any of the other schools.

This instruction is given to all the children in the school, those from the first to the third grade having a separate room and teacher, receiving it through stories told and read by the instructor; those in the fourth to the seventh grade receiving one hour of instruction each week with the pastor as teacher. All this instruction is given on school time, and owing to the fuel shortage is given at the school house this year, where last year the upper grades were at the church. Relative to the place of instruction, experience shows that all things considered the church is the more satisfactory place.

The method of procedure in opening the school was first to secure the co-operation of the teachers. This was gladly given, the schedule of studies being arranged to make an hour available for the older children. With this co-operation secured, the trustees were approached, and also the district superintendent, and here again a glad response was given. Teachers, trustees and superintendent saw the extreme value of such study and were ready at once to make it available for the children.

When the children were approached the response was spontaneous and hearty. It could not have been more hearty had they been invited to a picnic or a movie, and best of all, their enthusiasm has not abated in the least. So eager are they for the class period that they gladly give up recess periods and remain after school hours if for any reason the regular schedule of studies crowds into the religious instruction hour.

The last step was securing the consent of the parents. This was readily given with but two exceptions when we began our work a year ago, but this fall, with a better understanding of the work, we secured one hundred per cent. consent. The value of the work has been recognized by all the parents. They have seen that it is strictly undenominational, thoroughly educational, and best of all, evangelical, giving the children a training in Christian principles, life and conduct and in Christian patriotism.

The solution of the problem of text books for the upper grades was not an easy matter. The teacher of the class felt that first of all the class ought to have a general working knowledge of the Bible and its early stories. No adequate text books for children from ten to thirteen covering the making of the Bible and the interpretation of its early stories could be found, so it was necessary to take standard texts in these fields and by reduction and combination suit the weekly lessons to the comprehension of the children. These lessons were copied into note books by the children, and after a study period recitations were heard. All through this course there was the keenest interest and the teacher was surprised to see the response of the children and their reaction relative to the facts imparted.

This course was given with the idea in mind of presenting the modern view of the Bible, i.e., that it is the record of the developing religious life and comprehension of the Jewish race from its earliest traditions to the final and full revelation by Jesus, and then of its interpretation by the apostolic church. The purpose was to give the children a sure ground of faith in the Bible and its teachings so that when they pass on to high school and college they will have an intelligent faith in the Word of God that will find modern science and the Bible hand-maidens rather than antagonists.

This year we are studying the life of Christ and have found Course VI—The Great Leader—of the Keystone Graded Series, published by the Judson Press, an admirable text book. The book is easily adapted to the week-day work and is proving of exceeding interest to the children. A Bible has been provided for each child and all references given in the text are found by them. They take pride in finding and reading the verses and are at the same time becoming familiar with the books of the Bible and their location.

This is virgin soil for rural churches and pastors. Its cultivation will yield abundant harvests in the future. It not only makes possible the religious instruction, but gives the pastor an intimate week-day contact with the children that is invaluable, and it increases the respect of the children and their parents for the pastor and the church. Of course, this takes time, practically a day for the preparation and teaching, but to what greater task could a day be given?

Of necessity, the numbers in such a school will be small as compared with town and city, but numbers are not the consideration. The small group a rural pastor has is for him the best group in the world. Out of such groups come the nation's great leaders and thrice blessed is the rural pastor who will devote himself to a class of ten or twenty children, giving the best of his mind and heart.

Matthew, the Publican

MATTHEW 9:9-13; LUKE 5:27-32.

"I came not to call the righteous, but sinners."—Matt.9:13.

HOW can Jesus seem here to put the righteous so far away? The question is worth thinking about, not only that we may understand one of the sayings of our Lord, but also because to understand it we shall have to look at some of the most important aspects of the Christian life.

The first response that has been made to the problem is to say that he does not call the righteous because they have no need. "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick." The restorative work cannot be done for those who need no restoration. But this does not get us very far. The testimony of Scripture and the experience of men agree that there are so such people. "None doeth good, no, not one." "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God." "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." The higher the attainment of a man, the greater is his awareness that the goal is not yet reached, that he needs assistance—a physician, if you will.

The second attempt to arrive at an understanding of this saying assumes that by the righteous Jesus means those who seem to themselves to be righteous, those who pride themselves on being righteous. There is very high authority for this translation, and here at least we are dealing with moral realities. If it is certain none is so good as not to need to be called, it is equally certain that those who seem to themselves to be righteous and are proud about it cannot be called. They are incapable of hearing, and if they did hear they could not understand. Those who think they know it all are the worst kind of people. Those who think they can do it precisely as it should be done are the worst possible co-workers.

With people of that kind Jesus had small success. It was not because he did not want to help them. It was because they were so hedged round with a barrier of pride that they did not let him get at them to help them. But with the opposite type Jesus has always been successful. Many of the historic formulations of the doctrines of the atonement may seem inadequate to you, but there is one fact that no intelligent person can escape—the immense power for good that Jesus has had for humble, conscious sinners. Looking into his face as he teaches of God and man and life, following Him as He goes about doing good, standing and gazing at His cross, hearing His words of mercy and of hope, feeling the greatness of His heart, ten thousand times ten thousand have been roused from their evil ways and moved out of sin into righteousness.

All this raises extremely important questions for our times. If the opportunity of Jesus to help depends so much on our being free from pride and having a consciousness of need, are there not ways in which we moderns are moving away from Him? The back-breaking burden of personal guilt so common a hundred years ago is not very common now. The typical attitude of our times may not be to thank God that we are not as other men, but it certainly is not to stand afar off and beat our breasts and cry, "Be merciful to me, a sinner." The sense of personal abasement so common in Christian biography is hardly intelligible to the youth of to-day.

And there is a reason back of all this mood. With great conviction we moderns approach men not to tell them how bad they are, but how good they were meant to be. We are fond of pointing out that the first step in the return of the prodigal was when he "came to himself." Our emphasis is not on original sin, but on original goodness. All this, true and wholesome and Christlike as I believe it to be, has betrayed too many of us into the self-righteousness which condemns religious hope to be still-born.

There is, however, yet a third angle from which this saying of our Lord is to be viewed. Remember. He had just been talking with the scribes and Pharisees, and that they used the terms "righteous" and "sinners" in a sense almost technical. They wanted to limit the use of the word "righteous" to their own cult. They thought of religion as a thing of rules—line upon line and precept upon precept. Its core was the Mosaic morality, but to this tradition had added inconceivable complexities until all details of dress and diet and manner were prescribed. Keep these rules and you are righteous. But those who do not or cannot keep them are sinners.

Now, when Jesus said, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners," I think He meant more than that the self-complacent were folk with whom He could do nothing. I think He meant that the scribes and Pharisees were altogether on the wrong track. He meant that religion is not a matter of outward rules and precepts, but of inward disposition, and that until people feel this He is helpless to aid them. These legalists who reduce religion to mere good form, mere propriety, and to whom the expression, "It simply is not done, don't you know," is the worst condemnation that can be passed on any conduct, are so far off on a tangent that Jesus cannot do much but scold them. He cannot call them. They do not listen. They cannot understand.

So, when the social dictators of the city criticized Him for His genial, human ways that made Him break bread and be friends with publicans and sinners, He replied to them, or about them, "People don't take medicine unless they are sick. They don't take it unless they know that they are sick. I can't do anything for you very 'correct' people who think outward from a substitute for a chastened and sympathetic heart and are so interested in saving your own precious souls that you are quite willing the rest of my brethren be damned." But for those to whom religion was an inward attitude working outward to the control of all the life, a matter of walking humbly with God, of doing justice, of loving mercy, He had a glad call of sympathy and of divine assistance. For the man who had broken all the Mosaic law, but still hungered and thirsted after a real righteousness fed on a divine companionship, He had more hope than for the most correct member of Jerusalem's best society who was cold and untroubled at heart. If He walked our streets again His fellowship would not be for the self-righteous, the merely proper, who gather the garments of their respectability about them lest they touch some of the less fortunate, but for the troubled in spirit and in conscience, the yearners, the home-sick for larger and more useful ways of living, for He came "not to call the righteous, but sinners."

FILMS A VITAL FACTOR IN WORCESTER CHURCH.

Motion pictures play an important part in the activities of the People's Church, Worcester, Massachusetts. Rev. J. L. Thomas has instituted a series of programs for young people every Monday afternoon. The children come directly from school to the church, where a balanced exhibition is arranged for their benefit. Films on athletics, animals, outdoor life and comedies are presented. A story teller and singing are introduced between reels. A charge of five cents is made which amply covers the actual cost of film rentals. The children are keenly in favor of the programs and the average attendance is approximately one hundred and fifty.

Sunday evening services are also made attractive for the young people by using either a part or all of a Biblical narrative or lesson story. Typical films used on Sunday evenings are "From Manger to Cross," "The Story of Joseph" and "The Church with the Overshot Wheel." Post cards are sent out weekly, illustrated by cuts borrowed from the United Projector and Film Corporation, which also supplies the films.

Rev. Thomas says, "One of the happy results in this church of such services is the fact that in the last year over thirty young people have pledged themselves as followers of Jesus Christ and were received into membership in the church on Easter Sunday."

AN UNUSUAL GIFT

Mr. James H. Causey, of Denver, a prominent liberal churchman who is known to readers of Research Department publications as a leader of the church investigation of the tramway strike of 1920, has given a piece of property which, when all encumbrances are removed, will be worth $1,500,000 to the University of Denver. The present equity represented in the gift is over three-quarters of a million. Its purpose is "to create international, social and industrial goodwill." It is announced that a department of social research is to be established which will attract students from other parts of the country. Mr. Causey has deeded the property outright to the university, and has specified only in a general way the purposes for which the gift is to be used. In addition to resident instruction, it is planned to create research fellowships to enable Colorado students to study abroad. The plan also includes extension teaching by American and European professors. Mr. Causey, who is a member of the board of trustees of the university, and Chancellor Harper will work out the details of the plan during the coming months. Mr. Causey's gift is not merely an overflowing of great wealth, but appears rather to be in line with a purpose on his part not to accumulate a fortune. It is the result of his own business enterprise of the last few years.

CATHOLIC INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE

A bulletin of the National Catholic Welfare Council announces the second Industrial Conference under Catholic auspices to be held in Milwaukee this month. Several speakers of note are on the program, which is to represent a "cross section of all Catholics concerned with industrial problems, actively or theoretically." The bulletin says concerning the meeting: "This conference was instituted last winter for the purpose of bringing the simple principles of Christianity into industrial life—for the purpose of making practical application of Pope Leo's 'Encyclical on the Condition of Labor.' . . . Although this is a new venture in the United States, it has many counterparts in European countries. American Catholics are backward in this field where they should, and with the co-operation of this new and much needed organization, may yet perhaps lead."

WOMEN DO HAVE MORE SENSE.

It is in weather like this that men have reason to admit and to envy the superior courage and wisdom of women in dressing themselves in accordance with the season. Nothing could be more absurd, in Summer, than the masculine habit of swatching the neck and its blood vessels in high and impervious collars. Men do it because they are the slaves of custom, while the sauer women wear no collars at all and cut away their dresses until their necks are exposed to such cooling breezes as the gods are kind enough to provide.

To be sure, a good many men, nowadays, have ignored the ancient proprieties to the extent of replacing the hard-boiled variety of shirts with those unstarched, but an imagined decree of respectability forces them, they think, still to wear collars and neckties, though both are as detrimental to health as to comfort. Some men do venture to wear "soft" collars, yet they have a sense of sin when they do it, and are ready to apologize at request.—New York Times.

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

The discussion of the theme "Is Our Democracy Stagnant," by Frank I. Cobb, editor of the "New York World," in "Harper's" (New York), for June, is valuable as a candid critique of American government by an eminent journalist. Mr. Cobb observes that none of the nations that reorganized its government (or became self-governing) after the war followed the American plan of congressional government; rather they followed the British system of parliamentary government. The framers of the Constitution, he says, did not believe in democracy and endeavored to apportion the power so that no branch of the government should have too great influence, and each branch could act practically independently of the others. The principle of democracy was recognized only in the method of election to the House of Representatives. The Senate is "a constitutional manifestation of a rotten borough system." The method of election to the Senate so that the terms of only one-third expire at the same time as those of the House, and the fact that representation in the Senate has no relation to population have made government by minorities possible. Constitution has become a "fetish" because for a long time the American government was the only "responsible expression of the principle of free institutions"; because it was the only government that claimed to rest on the consent of the governed and the only one in which average men had a chance to share. But actually the people have been trying to free themselves from the "shackles" of the Constitution. The nominating convention without constitutional authority has made the President's election a matter of popular vote, "established party government, and made the President ex-officio leader of his party in Congress," and is, in fact, "a government within a government." Very little has been done to improve Congress. The direct primary has made Congress irresponsible as well as unresponsive (which it always was), and has helped the growth of minority power. When the President and a majority of Congress are of different parties there is a deadlock and very little can be done. Under parliamentary government the responsibility cannot be thus shifted from one branch of government to another. A popular vote can always be secured on a single issue, and a parliamentary government can settle only one question at a time. The United States "in its mechanism of government holds fast to the eighteenth century. More than that, it refuses to concede that anything of general importance has been learned about the science of government since the eighteenth century, and prior to the French Revolution."

AMERICAN PROHIBITION ABROAD

By William C. Allen

The following appeared in "The Mercury," of Durban, South Africa, under date of May 23, 1923. It is a leading newspaper of that country. Evidently this dispatch has been broadcasted:

RESULT OF PROHIBITION

Capetown, May 22 (Reuter).—The Hon. George Holden Tinkham, member of the Appropriation Committee of the American House of Representatives, who is making a special tour of outlying American Consular posts, interviewed by the "Argus" to-day regarding prohibition in the United States said: "Prohibition was adopted in the United States as a great moral reform, but it has resulted in a widespread disregard for law by all classes of citizens, paralysis of the administration of justice and gigantic official corruption. Murders and major crimes have increased greatly, and false statements of prohibitionists are being exposed and shown incorrect by official Government figures. Lynchings have not decreased and divorces are more prevalent. Arrests for drunkenness in the large cities have reached the figures of normal years before prohibition was adopted. There has been an appalling increase in drug addictions, as disclosed by the recent Government report. What, however, is most disturbing is that the American people are coming to the knowledge at last that prohibition was imposed upon them by the expenditure of vast sums of money, much of which was raised by sectarian churches, who in this action have violated the first principles of the American social compact, which has always forbidden any direct interference with the State by the Church. In conclusion, I predict that there will be a return to sanity and reason upon this question by my country."

Such talk is quite typical of what we get abroad from some Americans. To illustrate: When in Australia on this trip I met the mayor of a certain city who immediately after introduction said to me: "Mr. Allen, can you tell me the real facts about prohibition in the United States? A representative of the Heart papers was through here recently and said it was a failure. On the other hand I hear that it is a success. What are we to believe?"

So while certain foreign church papers and temperance magazines abroad offer facts from official sources, and protest even to the extent of speaking of "the shame" of British rum-running, we find some Americans currying favor with the wet countries when touring them by making statements reflecting on the integrity of our people.

There is much open or covert criticism of America abroad, a great deal of which is based on unhappy misunderstanding relating to our commercial, social and political conditions. Our foreign critics eagerly grasp any statements made by Americans that lead to the support of their convictions that we are a corrupt, insincere or foolish generation. They do not realize the lofty aims and honesty of purpose of the vast majority of the population of the United States. They are prejudiced against us and their better people are alienated in friendship toward us by such extraordinary statements as are alleged to have been made by this wet member of the American Congress.

THE MONDAY CLUB SERMONS

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

PRESIDENT HARDING'S FATAL CHANGE ON WORLD COURT

President Harding's original proposition that we should enter the World Court through sharing in the work of the League of Nations whenever it was concerned with the Court was assured an overwhelming majority in the Senate.

A poll of that body last May showed thirty-six Democrats in favor of it, two against it and six doubtful; thirty-seven Republicans favored it, seven were against it and seven were doubtful. Even if all those who were doubtful had voted against President Harding's original proposition, the United States would have become a member of the World Court. In the next Congress forty-three Democrats will hold seats in the Senate. Even if all the Republicans should support the President's new proposition, eleven Democratic votes would be needed in order to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority. But a poll of the Democratic Senators on the President's St. Louis plan, made by "The New York Times," indicates that the Democrats would practically be a unit against any self-perpetuating court. Swanson of Virginia, one of their leaders, put his objections in these words:

It is the most absurd and reactionary proposition ever submitted to the consideration of a people. A self-perpetuating court is the very essence of folly and reaction. No one would give serious consideration to a proposition that the courts of America should be self-perpetuating, and anyone who proposed such a thing would be the subject of ridicule on the part of his fellow-citizens. To give a World Court such power would, of course, be a much more glaring error than to confer such authority on our own courts.

This absurd proposition, brought forward at St. Louis, would indicate that the President is either the greatest reactionary in America or that he has practically abandoned his effort to have the United States become a member of the Court.

That is a pretty fair sample of the sentiment of the Democrats in regard to the self-perpetuating feature. Simmons of North Carolina considers that the President's St. Louis suggestion is "just a clever way of dropping the World Court question." Senator King of Utah, who has stood pre-eminent in the Senate in behalf of America's dealing with Turkey on a Christian basis, considers that the President's St. Louis plan "conclusively proves the author to be hostile to any fair and intelligent international co-operation or to the establishment of international tribunals, judicial or arbitral." George of Georgia, a new Senator, thinks that "abandonment of the World Court is better than the President's suggested impracticable and impossible compromise." Only two Democratic Senators of the eighteen who answered the "Times" questions would be willing to support the President's St.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Louis suggestion. A considerable proportion of the Senators are abroad and could not be reached. Even some of the Republicans are strongly against the President's new plans. Senator Edge, who has been one of the leading supporters of the Administration, says: "I am not so certain as to the advisability of self-perpetuation;" and Senator Harreld of Oklahoma answered, "As for a self-perpetuating court, such a proposition is, in my opinion, inimical to American traditions." We can only hope that the President will drop his strange suggestion.

A HOPEFUL SUGGESTION BY THE PRESIDENT

At Idaho Falls the President delivered what may prove to be the most important speech ever made by him. In it he made a very guarded but evidently pretty well considered suggestion that we ought to shorten the gap between the producer and consumer and that such a shortening might be accomplished through the aid of government credits in the same way that the government is providing credits for the farmers. The President summed up the problem in these words: "We realize that the real producer, under our elaborate and costly system of distribution, is not permitted a fair share of his product for his own use and enjoyment. We have become convinced that somehow our system of distribution has grown too cumbersome, too costly, too complex, too indirect, too unrelated to the interests of real producers and legitimate consumers. We must find methods to take up as much as possible of the slack in the long line between producer and consumer to give the producer a better share in that which he furnishes to the community, and to enable the consumer to meet his requirements at a reasonable cost." The President has been impressed by the success of the co-operative movement among American farmers and by the still greater co-operative developments in Europe. We ought, he said, to have among the consuming communities of the cities and towns co-operative organizations which were as effective as the co-operative associations of producers in the country. He hopes to be able to recommend to Congress measures which shall represent a beginning along this line. He anticipates that the development of such a general program into a sound working business scheme would probably be chiefly an affair of the State government, but one in which the national government might give aid. If the President means what he said, his suggestion should in due time at least help to bring down prices for some articles of general consumption. He is convinced that the discussion of the project which he is suggesting would be "a reminder to some who are disposed to take tolls from both the consuming and the producing public that this public has the right, the power and the ability to devise means to protect itself." No doubt very great pressure will be brought on the President to let his suggestion be quietly forgotten. The President has shown more than once, both during his candidacy and in his term of office, that he is inclined to surrender altogether too much for the sake of party harmony. His advocacy of consumers' co-operative organizations, if persisted in, might close the coffers of many large interests to the treasury of the Republican campaign committee in 1924. May that fact carry no weight with him. But may he nail his flag to the mast this time and continue to work "for the fullest measure of economic and social justice."

THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR

President Harding's speeches have been in part a report to the people of this country in regard to what the government has accomplished and in part a suggestion of what he has in mind for the future. Some of the policies which he announced may figure in the presidential campaign in 1924. His trip across the country served to bring him in closer touch with the people. Not only have his speeches been broadcast, but the sound magnifying inventions of the last year or two have enabled him to come into direct touch with great numbers of people in a way impossible to any of his predecessors. On the rear end of his train was an amplifier. As the President's special would approach a station a group of people might be seen by the track. The President and Mrs. Harding would step to the rear platform and greet the people as they went flying by, and the amplifier would make their words clearly heard by the whole group. Indeed, farmers working in their fields near the railroad could hear what the President said from his train. In giving his set addresses the President has apparently felt somewhat hampered by the presence of the amplifier on the platform in front of him. He has felt that he could not get away from the instrument and let himself out and has read his speeches with his head bent over his notes. His audiences have listened generally without any show of enthusiasm to what he has read to them, but when he has thrown in extemporaneous paragraphs or in his peroration advocated the World Court he has reached his listeners. His expression of a desire for world peace has raised more enthusiasm among his hearers than any other topic. People have seemed more or less indifferent to the particular way in which we should become related to the World Court, but they have evidenced interest and ardent desire for a world in which war shall no longer be known. When, as at Spokane, Washington, Mr. Harding has brought into his addresses a note of moral and religious earnestness, it has been greeted with cheers. At Spokane he ended his speech thus: "I do not believe, my countrymen, we are living up to the highest interest of God, the Creator, unless we give our influence and power to the furtherance of peace among nations and confidence and brotherhood, among men." What is that but the essence of true internationalism? One gets the feeling that if the President only could go out crusading in behalf of our adhesion to the League of Nations he would receive a similar enthusiastic response. People want great things brought before them; they are not content merely with congratulations on material prosperity. Americans do want to play the part of brothers in the world. If the whole topic of our relation to other nations could be freed from partisanship we have small doubt but that an overwhelming majority of the American people would be glad to have us do the unselfish thing—to undertake like genuine men our share of responsibility in a world that is so small that it is one.

THE CONFUSED STORY OF THE PATRIARCH TIKHON

For a year or so the great Archbishop Tikhon, Patriarch of the Russian Church, has languished in prison, charged with resisting the requisitioning of church treasures for famine relief in 1922. No one knows, of course, what the Soviet government planned to do with him, but it would seem that the general protest from outside nations against the execution of Vicar General Butchkavitch made the Moscow authorities hesitate to sentence Tikhon to death. The Anglican Church and, as we recall, the British government itself made representations to the Russian government against any unbecoming treatment of the head of the Church in Russia. Now the Soviet government gives out the following document as coming from Tikhon:

I consider it a duty of conscience as a priest to state the following:

Having been educated in monarchist surroundings and finding myself until the time of my arrest under the influence of anti-Soviet persons, I was really opposed to the Soviet government, and this animosity from time to time passed from a passive state to open manifestation. For instance, my proclamation about the Brest-Litovsk peace in 1918, my anathema upon the Government in the same year and, finally, my proclamation against the decree requisitioning Church treasures in 1922. All my anti-Soviet actions, with the exception of a few inaccuracies, have been set forth in the act of accusation of the Supreme court.

Recognizing the justice of the decision of the court in holding me responsible, according to the criminal code, as stated in the act of accusation, for anti-Soviet activity, I repent of all these misdemeanors against the state's régime and beg the Supreme Court to release me from custody. At the same time I state to the Supreme Court that henceforth I will not be an enemy of the Soviet government. I finally and decisively sever myself from the external and internal monarchistic White Guard counter-revolution.

"ACCIDENTS" IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Our State Department has received invitations for the American members of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, Messrs. Elihu Root, Oscar S. Straus, Judge George Gray and Judge John Bassett Moore, to nominate a new member for the World Court to succeed the late Judge Barbosa, and has passed them on to the gentlemen in question. The incident recalls a very entertaining tale of the failure of this State Department of ours to send these same gentlemen their invitation from the League of Nations to nominate members of the World Court at the time of its institution. Sir Eric Drummond, Secretary General of the League, at that time waited patiently for the American nominations. None came. It proved that Mr. Root and the other Americans had not received their notices from Washington. So finally Sir Eric sent the invitations direct. Only after these had reached them did our State Department forward the originals. The State Department explains now that these invitations were overlooked "by accident." There are a great many things apparently overlooked "by accident" in the State Department. When a prominent American, a personal friend of the Secretary of State, was thrown out of Germany nearly two years ago, the Department scarcely deigned to notice the affair. It merely sent the complainant two long delayed routine letters and never so much as lifted its voice in protest. The German government itself, scared by the publicity, was far more concerned than were the men at Washington who are supposed to be our public servants. The Germans actually made amends, but not because our State Department lifted a finger. When American citizens were expelled without adequate reason from Marsevan that same State Department, through its representatives, was too supine to make Turkey honor the fundamental rights of foreigners. A British citizen, who during the war had expressed most freely his opinion of the Kaiser and German militarism, can visit Germany to-day and be received with the respect accorded any Britisher. But our State Department, which mislays things "by accident," leaves Americans to be treated with contumely and acts the boor toward its own employees, the American people, as well to toward the League of Nations.

THE ONTARIO ELECTION

The recent election in the Province of Ontario was won by the Conservatives, who will hold at least sixty-eight of the 111 seats in the Legislature. For the last four years the Farmer Party, or in reality the Farmer-Labor Party, has been in control. When the last Legislature adjourned its membership stood: United Farmers, 45; Labor, 9; Conservatives, 25; Liberals, 28; Independents, 3; vacant (Conservative), 1. In the campaign four years ago the farmers promised to give efficient and economical government. As a matter of fact, however, the Province's debt increased under their administration from $97,000,000 to $240,000,000, and the indirect debt of the Province grew from $19,000,000 to $46,000,000. To be sure, the Drury government is not all to blame for such a financial record. It inherited some of its troubles. The Farmer Premier, Ernest Charles Drury, was a successful farmer and an earnest advocate of a low tariff. But he and most of his Cabinet were without experience in administration. The Ontario Farmers had no very radical social program. Their party fall seems to have been due only to their comparative failure in running the government. The Farmer Party won the election in Alberta in 1921 and in Saskatchewan and Manitoba in 1922. It remains to be seen whether it will disappear as did the American Populists.

GREECE MUST HAVE RELIEF

More than three months ago the American Red Cross announced that it would give up its relief work in Greece by the thirtieth of June at any rate. For some time the Red Cross fed more than five hundred thousand Greek refugees. The Greek government is simply unable financially to care for these people. The refugees on Greek soil to-day number twenty per cent. of the permanent population of the entire country. They present an international problem. As head of the Federal Council of Churches, Dr. Robert E. Speer has written to the President urging our government to make an appropriation for relief work that might result in the permanent re-establishment of refugees in self-support, even if the other powers are unwilling to co-operate. The Federal Council's inquiry among church leaders showed them agreed in advocating such a policy. Our government did approve an appropriation of $20,000,000 for the Russian famine sufferers and the whole people approved that action. America recognizes as great a responsibility in the distress of these war refugees as in the case of the Russian famine sufferers. Even if Greece receives the loan through the International Commission whose formation is now being discussed in Geneva there will still be necessity for funds for the rehabilitation of the Armenian refugees. The sum needed in their behalf will not be large. The people of our country will support the administration in any efforts to place the refugees where they will be able to take care of themselves. To return to the matter of funds for the Greek refugees, the United States signed an agreement with Greece near the end of the war to supply her approximately $50,000,000 in credits. We actually paid over only a small fraction of this sum. There is some $20,000,000 in the U. S. Treasury to which Greece has every moral claim. It is true that we are not in diplomatic relations with the present Greek government on account of a chain of circumstances. But that does not vitiate the Greeks' moral right to this money. If we had made a similar agreement with a great power it is hard to believe that we would not have carried it out in good faith. We ought to deal with small nations even more scrupulously than with great ones. The government needs no action by Congress in order to supply Greece with funds which would go far toward the permanent settlement of the refugee problem which she faces.

AUSTRALIAN VISITOR SAYS "PROHIBITION PROHIBITS"

Charles W. Furner, of Goulburn, New South Wales, Australia, retired drygoods merchant, alderman for the municipality and founder of the Chamber of Commerce, has been in this country five weeks and nobody has offered to buy him, sell him or treat him to a drink! Mr. Furner, who is stopping in New York on his way to Canada, was not complaining of this condition. On the contrary, he was delighted because he said the impression that Australians are getting through wet correspondents and liquor propagandists is that the country is oozing alcoholic drinks, and that foreign visitors have them thrust upon them at every turn. "I have been treated with the utmost hospitality and courtesy everywhere," he said. "My wife and I have been entertained at dinners and asked out to all sorts of affairs, but I have never seen any drinking or been offered a single drink." In Philadelphia, the center of the textile industry, Mr. Furner was told by members of the Manufacturers' Club that prohibition has proved a tremendous aid to business, that it has increased sales, promoted efficiency, made for the welfare of employees and decreased accidents. "One of the most interesting things to me is the absence of disorderly conduct and drunkenness on your streets," he said. "I have been in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Colorado Springs, Chicago, Washington and New York City and I have seen no disorderly persons. The public parks in American cities are a marvel—full of happy, sober, prosperous looking people. They impress the visitor immediately and I think offer conclusive evidence of the success of prohibition."

COMPETITION IN AIR FLEETS

Why is it so hard for us to practise common sense? The French have built 124 squadrons of military airplanes. That means approximately fourteen hundred machines. By the end of 1925, they plan to have two hundred and twenty squadrons, with about two thousand machines. The British propose to more than double their present air strength by the same time. They expect to increase their defensive air strength from eighteen squadrons to fifty-two, and to enroll a territorial air force. Last March Great Britain only had thirty-five altogether, of which but six and one-half were at home. The rest were distributed in Egypt, Palestine, Mesopotamia and India. But why should Great Britain and France set out to build airplanes against each other? Why cannot they save a few million pounds by sitting down together at the council table or better by going to Geneva and there making a quiet, sensible agreement as to the relative strength of their air forces and as to the absolute size of them? Such a feeling is very general. A section of the British Labor Party has prepared the following resolution:

That the proposed increase of the British Air Force in competition with France is the preface to a new era of war and the Labor Party calls upon the Parliamentary Labor Party to offer every resistance; declares that it is a crime against humanity to promote this new race of armaments within five years of the end of the last war, which the peoples of the world hoped was the beginning of an era of peace, and demands that an international conference should at once be called by Great Britain for the purpose of reducing and eventually abolishing by international agreement all air armaments.

We hope the Labor Party will adopt the resolution and that Great Britain may call such a conference.

SENATOR PEPPER ON THE SACRAMENTO PRISONERS

When the President released more than half of the political prisoners in our Federal jails last month, he refused to release twenty of the men convicted at Sacramento. To be sure, he did release two of that group who were foreign citizens. Apparently the foreigner is more fortunate in some respects than is the citizen in this country. As is well known Senator Pepper is one of the two lawyers outside of those engaged in the trial who has gone over all the testimony in the cases of political prisoners. In the St. Louis "Post-Dispatch," Senator Pepper summed up the evidence in regard to the Sacramento case as follows:

"The Sacramento case like the others, was appealed, but court sustained all the counts. This fact has been cited by Department of Justice officials as cancelling the claim that the Sacramento prisoners are 'political' prisoners confined only for expression of opinion. They have sometimes been referred to vaguely as 'murderers' and 'dynamiters,' though neither the charge of murder nor dynamiting figures in the 'overt acts' alleged against them. To say merely that the Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction of the Sacramento defendants leaves out the equally important fact that the court, owing to a delay in the filing of the bill of exceptions, did not have the evidence before it. The decision, therefore, was merely on the validity of the indictment. . . . It is Senator Pepper's opinion that, when the appellate courts in the Wichita and Chicago cases, in the latter of which the full trial record was reviewed, reversed the conviction of the defendants on the 'sabotage' counts, they established a 'controlling precedent' which would have governed in the Sacramento case if the evidence had been reviewed. The 'sabotage' charge was the same in all three cases. Pepper holds, therefore, that, while there is a technical difference between the legal status of the Wichita and Chicago cases on the one hand and the Sacramento cases on the other, there is no moral difference."

People of good-will should continue to bring all the pressure possible on the President to secure the release of all the political prisoners. Two of them are very ill with tuberculosis. To release them is therefore doubly urgent. All the Sacramento prisoners are serving ten years. Two war-opinion prisoners who were not members of the I. W. W. are still in Federal prisons, Nicholas Zogg, serving ten years in At-from one circle in life to another, constantly enlarging the area of his interests and finding everywhere that the onward movement within him was never satisfied at any particular point. When the earth had done all it could for him he felt himself to be a citizen of the higher and the eternal life, and found satisfaction only in the knowledge of his life in God and union there.

Now, when our human life is truly lived, this is the kind of life it is. It is constantly being called out, called to transcend the sphere of immediate occupation, and to take possession of new lands; when it gets to a new land the same thing happens, the same inward urging to a forward movement is felt. Nor does there seem to be any end to the process; the soul comes to have an infinite look, the spell of the undiscovered is upon it still, and nothing but the spiritual inexhaustible can be its home. True living is a constant going-out and unceasing movement.

Physically, we are forever changing; so far as the body is concerned we are certainly dwelling in tents. We occupy a good many bodies during a life-time, in the sense that the material contents are continually changing. It is even more so with the mind. No discovery is a terminus; it always turns out to be a station on an onward road. The healthy mind turns from the known to the unknown, leaves the father's house and the kindred, and the old country, in order to explore in the new. This is true even in regard to thoughts about religion and in regard to the realizations of religious experience. The movement is the divine thing, the man who obeys the divine voice, and understands the divine promise always dwells in tents. His system of theology, if he has one, his forms and creeds are temporary. He is never quite satisfied, and he cannot be. We do not mean that he is unhappy or doubtful, but only that he has the zest of going on, the feeling of youth, and glorious anticipation. This does not mean that there are no permanent elements in his life, no stability, no feeling that he has got hold of the eternal. Through all the changes of the body the body remains the same, always different yet the same. So of the ego; the contents of the mind and of the emotions change many times, and yet there survives the consciousness of identity. So it is with man's higher life. He may have changed his theology many times; he certainly has, if he is a wise man and a growing one; but through all the changes of theology he still has the same God. However often he may change his creed, he can always retain his faith. When we say that he is never satisfied, we mean that he is never satisfied to stop; he is always satisfied in going on. The streams from which he drinks do satisfy him, because they refresh him on the journey, but the journey does not come to an end; the very blessedness of life is that it continues. The divine always assumes the form of a promise—it promises something not yet fully actualized, and where there is promise there is movement. The Son of man hath not where to lay His head, not because He is poor and miserable, but because He is the Son of man. The fox of to-day is not wiser than the fox of long ago. The birds to-day cannot sing more sweetly or build better nests than birds could centuries ago; they only feel the pressure of the past in the shape of instincts, not the pressure of the future in the shape of an ideal. But the true son of man who has heard the divine call of his own nature has not where to lay his head—there is no intellectual or spiritual stopping place for him. He is only content when he is discontent; he can only rest when

The Call to the Unknown

THE call that came to Abraham comes to all of us; it is a call into the unknown, to leave the familiar for the unfamiliar, the intimate for the adventurous. The power by which Abraham obeyed the call was faith. There is always in faith an element of venture; it is a power that makes possible an obedience the exact consequences of which are not known. He obeyed, went out not knowing whither he went. When he reached the Land of Promise which was to be given him for an inheritance he found himself still a sojourner in a land not his own, and dwelling in tents. The God who had called him out of his father's house gave him a tent! Was this the land of promise? It seemed utterly disappointing, that instead of a permanent home he was still a pilgrim. Yet it was a land of promise in a finer and fuller sense than was expected, a land that promised him something still better, and kept him on the move. Faith is man's answer to the call of the future. This is why faith always makes its possessor a sojourner. The real land of promise is a land that does not offer us a finality. It would cease to be a promise if it were a finality. Abraham in the old home felt that he was destined for something greater; Abraham in the new home felt precisely the same. Abraham, as idealized in the Epistle to the Hebrews, looked for a city which had foundations, whose builder and maker is God. He presents us with a picture of a man going out he is moving. At the very heart of humanity there is this disturbance of divinity. Souls with a divine outlook are ever on the march. The reason why we must not build tabernacles on any mount of vision is not merely that there is work for us to be done in the valleys below, but also that there are higher mountains yet to climb.

The natural enlargements of the area of human life are part of this divine process and should help us to see its meaning, should lead us into the heart of its truth. Out of the first stages of childhood the child is called into the larger life of the family, the father's house. This is the first training ground out of self, the training ground of the truer life, the self that is to be realized in relation. But the call soon comes to transcend the family life in sympathy and in thought and intelligent activity. Where there is healthy development this wider world comes to mean the country, comes to include the national life. This is realized in various degrees, a great many, however, realizing it far too little. Their interests and sympathies stop with their own class, instead of flowing freely out to the whole nation. The divine call is a call to go out beyond family, beyond class, to get life thoroughly fused with the life of one's people. It is a grand thing to realize our oneness with our nation. We heard a good deal about national service during the war, but there is need of national service now, and a divine call to it. Dr. Rufus Jones has told us of a new movement among young Quakers in America, some who joined the American army and some pacifists who refused to do so, but volunteered for service in various fields. Both sections are now joining in a movement to give a year's service at the end of their college career to voluntary work for humanity before taking up a career of their own. One may be sure that the spirit of that one year will pervade the after life. One may thank God for men whose greatest interest is to organize that kind of service. Compare it with the idea of some high personage in this country—some duke—who was lamenting that young men were not showing themselves ready to join the army, and who said that his great hope for the country was in the boys of the present day who had not known the horrors of war themselves and who would join up when they were a little older. Mr. G. Ward Price has told us how Marshal Foch was impressed with Poland as the land of sturdy children, and how he rejoiced that France had made an ally of such a prolific and martial nation, which in fifteen years' time would be able, if necessary to put a million men in the field to hold Russia or Germany in check. What an appalling outlook upon humanity! Think of the Marshal seeing everywhere in Poland happy-looking children from six to sixteen, and indulging as his main thought the thought of how these would one day be on the battlefield. This is the sort of thing that curses the world. Better not try to characterize it; better turn from it to the Quaker youth of America and see there young life with an outlook on a better future, with a mind and a heart for real national service, the service that helps to build up a nation in health and happiness, in integrity and virtue, and fit it for the Kingdom of God.

But the divine call to go out does not stop at this point. We are called also out of our country. This does not mean, of course, that we have to leave our country to go to some other, but that we have to transcend our country in interest, in sympathy, if we are to live the divine life. Interest that stops with one's country shows an arrested growth. Just as we have transcended the home and the class, we must transcend the nation. The soul that obeys God and realizes the divine process of enlargement takes in the world.

But even this is not the end. Even when a man realizes world citizenship, it is too little for him; he has a look beyond the boundaries of time and space; the city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God is his only home. That city has no dimensions and no boundaries. Life there is "that perfect disenthralment which is God." What a wonderful thing this human soul of ours is! Here it comes to the tabernacle a little while in a body of flesh. It seems to bring with it infinite yearnings from the eternal sphere. And here it is forever agitating to enlarge; it swells out from self into a family love, but it soon transcends it. It realizes a national life, is eager and enthusiastic for it, but that, too, becomes too small; it realizes a great human world, but even that is not enough; it breaks all bounds of time and space, and claims its home in the eternal. When it lays down the human body, the best thing we can say of it is, "It is gone to be forever with God." T. R. W.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

Adolf Keller in America

THOSE who were present at the dinner given by the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches to Dr. Adolf Keller, Friday, June 29th, on the eve of his sailing home, will not soon forget his words about America. He had come to America to lay the conditions of European Protestantism before the American churches. He had visited the various national assemblies of the churches and told his story; he had traveled over the length and breadth of the country; he had met hundreds of Americans of every walk in life and stayed in many American homes. He found, he said, two things: First of all, an amazing ignorance of anything outside of the United States and a strange apathy concerning the rest of the world. Very few people knew anything about Europe, very few cared anything about the conditions of their Christian brethren there. The ignorance concerning Protestantism in Europe was universal. Hardly anyone knew anything about it. It was difficult to get anyone interested in it at first. After hearing his story people became interested—knowledge begets interest. But it was an almost weird experience to Dr. Keller, coming from a continent where every country is interested in every other, and where the thought habit is international, to find a great people so absolutely and utterly self-contained, provincial and ignorant of anything outside their own national boundaries. On the other hand, Dr. Keller was greatly impressed by the bigness of all our thinking on home matters, the greatness of our idealism, the boundlessness of our hopes, and by the prevalence of what he called "dynamic imagination" in boundless degree. Nothing was too big for us to plan, too big for us to undertake. His own little country of Switzerland was far ahead of ours in world-wide vision and international understanding. With nothing particular to gain by it herself, she had insisted that the League of Nations set up its headquarters in Geneva, because she saw that by the way of the community life was the only salvation of nations as it has been the salvation of individuals from strife and tumult. America has not the vision to see that, but she surpassed Switzerland and all other countries in her capacity to do big things, when once she had seen the vision and set her hands to the consequent task. Dr. Keller felt that when once America saw that selfish individualism was as false a way of life for nations as for individuals, and that the true way of life for nations as for men was the community life, then she would work wonders in making a really Christian civilization to prevail in the earth and in establishing the Kingdom of God.

Another thing to which Dr. Keller drew attention was this: The American people, even those who knew something of Protestantism in Europe, have no conception of the struggle it must continually wage to preserve itself, grow and exert its influence. Here we have only, say, twenty million Roman Catholics in a population of over a hundred million. And there were vast areas of rural America where Roman Catholics were hardly to be found. In Europe, Protestantism was everywhere right up against a vast and highly organized Roman Catholicism. It was all about it, pressing in on every side. Some surrounding nations, as Italy, France, Spain and Bavarian Germany, were solidly Catholic. Half Germany was Catholic and Protestantism in France comprised only a small fraction of the population. This Roman Catholicism was not only overwhelming in numbers, but was astute, aggressive, highly organized. It was always watching and waiting. The moment a chance came to strengthen itself it was ready to seize it. It was one, and its highly organized machinery was under control of the most alert and the wisest men in Europe. The bureau of propaganda at Rome had agents in every land. Even now it was doing everything it could to establish friendly relations with the Eastern Church, especially in Russia. Protestantism in Europe, on the other hand, was all without solidity or unity. It existed in fragments, some fragments having hardly anything to do with other fragments. There was a Swedish church, several churches in Germany, several communions in Britain and the Protestant groups in Holland, Switzerland and other countries. Not only had these various European groups had practically nothing to do with one another, but until lately they had been unfederated even in their own lands. Dr. Keller felt that some new and speedy unity must come among these Protestant groups if they were to show any strength at all comparable to that of the Roman Catholic Church. He felt that one of the things the Central Bureau at Zurich would do would be to solidify European Protestantism as it felt the common help and sympathy of the American churches acting as one in their work of relief in Europe.

Dr. Keller thought that Protestantism had far surpassed Catholicism in cultivating the vigorous, outstanding individual. The average Protestant was a much more forceful individual, much more pronounced in personality than the average Catholic. Most of the powerful individuals in Europe were Protestants. On the other hand, Catholicism had welded great masses together in a solidarity, a Christian family, a beloved community, as Protestantism had never done. What was needed now was that Catholicism should emphasize individuality more and Protestantism pay more attention to developing the sense of oneness in the Christian community. All Protestants should be as solidly one, at least in their work for the Kingdom, as are the Catholics. Also, Protestantism should emphasize the social side of the gospel more, the redemption of institutions and human relationships as well as individuals. The hope was expressed by many at the gathering that Dr. Keller might arrange to spend next year in America educating the American people as to European Protestantism. He has a great church in Zurich; he is identified with the University; he is a noted psychologist and scholar; he is sought after continually by all the churches of Europe, but I believe that if Europe would give him to America for a year he could, with his striking personality, virile mind and eloquence even in English, so interest the American Protestants in their European brethren that it would be worth any sacrifice on their part.

THE OBSERVER

A Visit to Winona

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

AFTER a visit to the Winona Assembly and Bible Conference last week I am inclined to believe that the philosopher who said that "man is incurably religious" was right. Here are several thousand people spending two months in doing practically nothing but hearing sermons and singing hymns. They start in at eight in the morning by attending a daily exposition of the Bible and then divide up into groups for more specific Bible study. In the afternoon and evening they attend lectures on some phase of religion or religious activity, or attend the sessions of various conferences which hold their meetings here during the summer months. Meantime, under the leadership of Mr. Rodeheaver or Mr. Heaton they sing hymns for half an hour before each sermon or lecture. On Sunday there are always three services and often four. Seemingly all these various meetings and services are always crowded. The auditorium must seat two or three thousand people, and it was well filled at every service I attended.

Winona Lake is a beautiful spot, lying between Fort Wayne and Chicago, on the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is about an hour from Fort Wayne and four hours from Chicago. It is a smaller Chatauqua. On the wooded hillsides on the eastern shore of the lake several hundred cottages have been built and there are three or four hotels.

There are also several denominational houses and large buildings known as the Bethany Girls' Camp. High up on the hill, above the cottages, are the large buildings of the Winona Summer School. For many years Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was its leading spirit and it owed much of its growth and development to him. There are two auditoriums, the one referred to above, where most of the meetings are held; the other the vast structure built for Billy Sunday, which is now used only on great occasions, such as when Mr. Bryan speaks or some famous singer comes to Winona. The floor is still covered two inches deep with sawdust and shavings as in the days when Mr. Sunday performed there, somebody had sense and courage enough to erect a structure which is not at all unsightly, but fits very well into the grove of overarching trees. Mr. Sunday lives at Winona, coming there occasionally to rest from his arduous engagements and occasionally takes part in the summer services. For a while Dr. Campbell Morgan made Winona Lake his home, and was very popular with the community. Mr. Bryan is at present the most popular visitor. I was told that on the day of his visit last year eighteen thousand automobiles were parked outside the grounds. Practically everybody within a radius of one hundred miles who owned a car drove in to Lake Winona. He is still the most popular speaker, so far as the Middle West is concerned. As one man said to me, "He belongs to us, and voices the thought and feelings of the people. They will sit and listen to him all night."

While Winona Lake is primarily a place for Bible study, worship and discussion of missions, evangelism and the application of the gospel to the various social problems, nevertheless a good many conferences of various organizations are held there during the summer. There are good hotels and a fine auditorium, and a large and sympathetic audience is assured. There is very good newspaper publicity also, as the journals of the surrounding large cities are interested in the prosperity of the place. Thus this summer such conferences as those of the Reformed Presbyterian Church Synod, the Presbyterian Young People, the International Christian Citizenship Conference, the Interdenominational Evangelistic Association, the Y. W. C. A. Industrial Conference, and the Northern Indiana Child Health Council are being held there. Various State conferences of the communions in Indiana find this a most convenient place for their annual sessions.

While the whole atmosphere of the regular meetings and Bible schools at Winona is evangelical, yet there seems to be no trace of intolerance or bitterness, and the fundamentalist controversy has not yet manifested itself. The broad spirit of tolerance which Dr. Chapman imparted to it lingers and men holding various views on the questions which are vexing some of the brethren in the Church are welcomed to its platform and to its schools. I was very much interested in seeing the list of speakers for the Bible Conference in August. While some of the lecturers are among those generally classed with the conservative school, Drs. Erdman, Goodchild and Griffith Thomas, for instance, others belong to the liberal school, Drs. John Hutton, Wishart (the new Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly) and Bishop Hughes. Some of the lecturers are fundamentalists, others of the liberal group—but all are evangelical in their temper and outlook. The program of the Bible Conference this year is being prepared with the needs of the ministry especially in view. The Bible will be studied with emphasis upon exposition and exegesis and a good deal of attention will be given to missions. A large enrollment of pastors is expected. There are two views held by ministers about vacations. One type of man wants to get away from everything that has the slightest relation to his work and bury himself in the wilds for a month, basking in the healing rays of nature. Another type of man wants to spend his vacation replenishing the reservoirs from which his sermons are drawn. These are the men who attend Northfield, Winona and Chatauqua. Especially refreshing are the opportunities to rural ministers, who here come into that contact with both famous teachers and fellow preachers that is largely denied them during the year.

I went to Winona to take part in the large Christian Citizenship Conference held under the auspices of the National Reform Association. Rev. James S. Martin, of Pittsburgh, is the director, and he did a really remarkable piece of work at this conference. He brought together during the week a group of most eminent speakers and experts; assembled large and representative groups, numbering many clergymen of all denominations; and, best of all, secured a real conference on the most important problems facing the nation. I never heard more interesting or lively discussions than those which followed some of the addresses. The conference lasted one week, from Sunday July 1st, to Sunday, July 8th. The general theme was the application of the Christian principle to national and international life. Some of the most outstanding addresses were these: "Religion in National Life," Bishop W. F. Anderson; "Christianity and Democracy," Bishop Bell; "The Moral Accountability of Nations," Dr. James A. Francis; "The Source of Authority in Government," Dr. W. I. Wishart; "Why Christian Public Education?" Moderator Wishart; "America's Part in World Education," President Edmunds of Canton Christian College; "A Divine Challenge to Forgetful Nations," ex-Senator Cannon; "Loyalty to Country and Country's Lord," Hon. William Jennings Bryan; "The Patriot and Peace," Senator Fess; "The Family an Integral Factor in National Life," Judge Thomas; "Prohibition—National and International," Dr. E. C. Dinwiddie; "The Problem of Immigration," Senator Sterling; "America and the World Court," Hon. Clyde M. Kelly; "The Cause and Cure of Social Unrest," Dr. Charles Stelzle; "Institutional Conversion," Bishop McConnell; "The Law of God in Civic Life," Senator Steppard. I have chosen but a few addresses and speakers at random; there were as many more fully as interesting and inspiring. The addresses were, most of them, on a very high level, direct and attempting real solutions of the problems facing the nation. There was practically no indulgence in rhetoric and no sailing about among the rosy clouds. As was to be expected at just this time, most of the speakers got on to the international problems and, on the whole, talked very helpfully and sensibly about them. I am sure that no one could fail to get the impression that the large and representative audiences were heartily in favor of our nation's participation in world affairs, and by direct association. The words that drew the most applause in my own address on Monday night on "Christian Internationalism" were "The League of Nations." It is so everywhere I go, and yet I am told the people are no longer interested in the League and the President says the issue is as dead as slavery.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

The first celebration in connection with the three hundredth anniversary of the coming of the Huguenots to America consisted of the laying of a corner stone of the Huguenot church at Huguenot Park, Staten Island, last month. The church, designed by Ernest Flagg, is to be in the Norman style and built of Dongan Hills flagstone, quarried near the site of the building. The tercentary takes place next year.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Authority in Religion

By Canon E. W. Barnes

[The following sermon was preached recently in St. Aldate's, Oxford.]

I HAVE undertaken to speak to-night on the interesting and particularly important question of authority. Not, of course, on authority in relation to social organization—which is a singularly complex problem of political science—but on the place of authority in the Christian religion. What is the authoritative basis of our faith? Is it the Bible, as some say, or the Church, or some particular branch of it, as others would contend. Can we be content with the idea of an infallible book or an infallible formula or an infallible institution? If not, how can we find religious certainty amid the modern chaos of religious opinion? What, moreover, are the permanent elements in Christianity, sufficient for our needs and sufficient to preserve the Christian tradition which has largely moulded our civilization? These are big questions—to many as perplexing as they are vital.

We need to inquire at the outset, What is religion? Some would answer, with Matthew Arnold, that it is "morality tinged by emotion." Others would say that it is a view of the nature of the universe, and a consequent valuation of human life, that can be expressed by certain dogmas. We should all probably agree that, when religion is divorced from right conduct, it is dangerous, if not valueless. But many emphasize the emotional aspect of religion, and say that the thrill of worship, the ecstasy of pious devotion, reveal its true nature most completely. None of these statements is wholly false; all represent different sides of the truth. Religion, I should be inclined to say, with Professor Peake, is essentially fellowship with the Unseen. Such fellowship is the mystical basis of all religions. It appears, in an ugly, primitive form, in savage animism. At a later stage of human development it is the impulse which leads to idolatry and animal sacrifices. It takes a pantheistic setting in Hindu contemplation, and occasionally in medieval Christian mysticism the same tendency was manifest. In Judaism the moral obligations of such fellowship were emphasized by the great prophets. Christianity inherited from Judaism this sense of moral obligation and combined it with reverence for the teaching of Christ and devotion to His person. It is, I think, fair to say that, if we test Christianity by the standards of conduct and aspiration by which it seeks to inspire men, it is supreme among the religions of the world. It is the finest product of the religious evolution of the human race. But the mere suggestion of religious evolution raises the inquiry as to whether Christianity can be rightly regarded as a special revelation of God to men. Are there elements in it which are definite and final? If so, what are they, and how are they guaranteed? We are confronted by the problem of authority.

Now I should like to say at once that, to me, Christianity is dynamic, not static. Any conception which eliminates the notion of progressive development is unsatisfactory. Further, as I survey the history of Christian thought and Christian morals I cannot accept the idea that progress is uniform. We cannot liken our faith to a building in which a brick once laid remains for all time an imperishable part of the structure. It is rather like a great cathedral, always in process of decay and repair. One age builds a magnificent chapel; another allows it to fall into ruins. The decoration of the edifice changes dramatically. Its foundations are underpinned afresh. A great tower may fall and not be rebuilt. But it remains, with an individuality of its own, which through all changes responds to the needs of those who use it. Christianity, as Hort finely said, is not a uniform and monotonous tradition, but to be learnt only by successive steps of life. In Christian dogma and in Christian practice there has in the past been change—change for the worse and change for the better.

Take the theory of the Atonement. Augustine countenanced the idea that it was a ransom paid by Christ to the devil. The belief dominated Western theology for nearly a thousand years. To those who accept Christ's teaching as to the love and power of God such a notion is intolerable, repugnant alike to reason and common sense. Yet Abelard was condemned by a council and a pope for refusing to accept such a distortion of Christianity; and they condemned also his singularly beautiful teaching with regard to the Incarnation. "The purpose and cause of the Incarnation were that God might illuminate men by His wisdom and excite them to the love of Himself." Such is a truth which nowadays inspires us all. Unfortunately, in other respects the great influence of Augustine was harmful to Christian doctrine and morality. We cannot read his "Confessions" without admitting that he had spiritual insight in a rare degree, but because it was corroded by asceticism and ecclesiasticism he contaminated the Gospel.

If we seek another example of change for the worse in Christian thought we can find it in developments connected with the Sacraments. To St. Paul sacramental worship was a spiritual reality, the expression of the truth, "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them." The Sacrament works, not through some magic in itself, but through faith on the part of those who come in love and repentance to the table of the Lord. Such teaching harmonizes well with what we know of the psychology of religion. But there is a sad decline to theories which pretend that by some miracle a priest can use the power of God to bring the Divine Presence to reside in the consecrated elements, that he can thereby renew the sacrifice of Christ and offer Him for the living or the dead, to procure remission of pain and guilt. Such theories belong to the type of unethical sacramentalism which flourished among the Mediterranean races before the rise of Christianity. They are typical of the paganism which entered into Catholic Christianity and still flourishes there.

With regard to the decline in standards of Christian conduct I need do no more than remind you of the contrast between the barbarous religious persecution of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and the virtues by which Christians in the second century proved stronger than the imperial government which sought to suppress them. A study of history confirms our expectation that the expression of Christianity has always been influenced by what we vaguely call the spirit of the age. It has been barbarized when surrounded by barbarism. When war has made men brutal and violent, it has been coarsened. When ignorance has disposed men to superstition, superstitions have sheltered themselves within it. After the late war we must anticipate a revival of the lower types of religion; the better will have to struggle hard to maintain themselves. But, though the expression of Christianity has thus yielded to surrounding influences, the spirit of Christ, which Christian institutions have never wholly failed to preserve, has not been ineffective. There has been a process of action and reaction. Christianity has shown a signal power to produce men and women inspired by Christ. Though often enough they have been disliked, thwarted or persecuted by official ecclesiastics, they have been the salt of the Church invisible. Through them men have gained, and continue to gain, an even richer understanding of, and loyalty to, Christ.

Perhaps now I have said enough to indicate why I cannot find in the visible Church, or in any branch of it, the authoritative basis of Christianity. Can we find it in the Bible? There I would answer, "Yes, and No." It seems to me that men seek a false "short cut" to authority when they postulate an infallible, inerrant Bible. As a text book of science or history the Bible is defective. Its story of Creation cannot be accepted in the light of our present knowledge. The Book of Daniel contains inaccurate history: we can find no place in secular records for "Darius the Mede." In the Gospels there are contradictions. When did the Last Supper take place, on the Feast of Passover or on the night before? The accounts differ. Let us admit these facts. Science and scholarship are a gift of the Holy Spirit of truth. It is not for us, of all people, to quarrel with His revelation. But, none the less, on the Bible we base our faith. As we study the sacred record, in the fullest light which our age can give, we see the slow growth of religious understanding among the Jews, and its culmination in the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. We find in Him a beauty of character unequalled in human history, a spiritual certainty which transcends and yet uniquely illuminates our search for fellowship with the Unseen. We find a revelation of God's nature and purpose which is the most reasonable that we can conceive. We find standards of conduct which are the finest ever reached by human aspiration. Moreover, there is a unity in Christ's teaching as to God's purpose and man's duty; it has intellectual coherence and strength. Above all, Christ was true to His spiritual understanding. He, alone of all men, managed to live on earth in perfect loyalty to the Father's will. It is false to imagine that modern critical scholarship has made it impossible for us to advance these claims for Christ. It has enabled us to know Him and His influence more clearly than ever before. Nowadays we see the Bible in a new light, but from that light there emerges, brilliant in majesty, Jesus the Eternal Christ.

Is, then, Jesus our infallible authority? In reply I ask the question, "What do you mean by an infallible authority?" Do you mean that Jesus was omniscient, and therefore not truly a man? Do you wish me to assert that He was an apparent man with a divine mind? No. He lived a truly human life in complete communion with God. He grew up as a Jewish boy, was educated to accept the secular knowledge of His time. He had human limitations. For us men He was truly the Way and the Life because, in spite of His moral and spiritual insight, the future was clouded by uncertainty, as for all of us. "Father, if it be Thy will, let this cup pass from Me." For no theory of omniscience can we abandon that sharing of our own darkness which such words express. The idea that Jesus was inerrant with regard to secular knowledge is the product of mistaken reverence. It is on His perfection of moral and spiritual understanding that we base our faith.

And yet we must not take Jesus as a purely external authority, even in this realm. It is right to say, "Thus He said. Thus He was. Go thou and do, or be, likewise." But such teaching is not the finest that can be set forth. Christ must be an authority within yourself. You must seek to make your own spirit respond to the divine spirit of truth and righteousness. You must bring all knowledge you can get, the finest emotions of your being, to your search for fellowship with the Unseen. Then you will find that the spirit within you is a witness to God, as He was revealed in Jesus the Christ. Faith is not submission to authority; it is the result of consecrating thought, will and feeling. It is the product of yourself at your best. Yet, because you cannot live alone, or solely in fellowship with God, your faith must express itself in relations with your fellow-men. You cannot escape their influence, try as you may; it is, as the psychologists tell us, most powerful when unperceived. So you must allow spiritual leaders of the past and the present to teach you, to correct errors of insight and mistakes of judgment. We are members one of another; faith is strengthened and purified as we make this spiritual unity effective. Faith begins in the response of your nature to the all-pervading Spirit of God. He witnesses to Christ. But you find Christ's influence reflected whenever men inspire you with enthusiasm and love for wisdom and goodness. Learn of them with all humility. So you will find authority sufficient for your needs. It will be the authority of Jesus Christ, no coercive mechanism of formula and system, but a living power to which you freely give allegiance. When men talk about authority they usually turn from spiritual reality to some external claim: they argue for a book, a formula, an institution. So intolerant disputation arises. Put spiritual things first. The true life of the spirit is life in Christ. Find that life, and you will satisfy your needs, as St. Paul satisfied his own.

Smith Riley of the United States Bureau of Biological Survey reckons that there are only nine or ten thousand antelope left in the United States. These few are widely scattered through seventeen States. They range for the most part in semi-desert plains in herds of from five to two hundred or more. He believes that only the creation of further game preserves with effective patrols will save the antelope from extinction. Let western legislatures attend.

Nothing succeeds like success. Leghorn used to be a Socialist and Communist stronghold, but at the Italian municipal elections last week the Fascisti received an overwhelming majority of the votes, with seventy per cent. of the electors casting their ballots. In many parts of Italy the Socialists, the Clericals and the Liberals abstained from voting.

The Italian Revolution

By Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.

ON our present journey around the world we found the birth of a new liberal movement in Japan; Korea had made her declaration of freedom in 1919; the Philippines are now clamoring for "immediate unconditional independence"; India is passing through a great silent revolution of passive resistance; Egypt is under martial law and insisting on complete independence; Palestine is seething with unrest with nine-tenths of the population, and especially the Arab majority, resenting the alien rule of the Jewish minority supported by British arms; Mesopotamia is demanding self-determination and freedom from an alien ruler. Italy has just passed through a revolution of Fascism, and after six months of the new movement we may be able to estimate something of its significance.

The cause of the revolution was found in the patriotic reaction from the anti-national movement of destructive international communism. Italy emerged from the war discouraged, bankrupt and embittered, with over half a million men killed and a foreign debt of four and a half billion dollars on which she could not even pay the interest. She felt that she had lost more in proportion to her resources and gained less of the spoils of victory than almost any other allied nation. She complained that Great Britain has demanded the lion's share of the colonies and mandates, while France and Belgium had taken most of the reparations. She was particularly bitter against France because of the denial of her claim to Fiume and now strongly condemns her militaristic action in the Ruhr, which is paralyzing the trade and threatening the peace of Europe. The war left Italy almost in despair, because she felt she had been betrayed. Her own government under Nitti and Facta was nerveless and pessimistic.

In this hour of the nation's extremity two movements were born. There was first a materialistic movement led by international Socialists and Communists who endeavored to discredit not only militarism but nationalism and to seize the factories, take control of industry and agriculture and repeat the Russian program. On the other hand, there began an idealistic movement among the students and intellectuals which at times has taken the form of an after-Renaissance revival. It was the former revolutionary program of communism that led directly to the reaction of Fascism. It was the excesses of the international Socialists that led to the meeting of force by force, violence by violence, terror by terror. Finally the Fascisti seized the reins of power from a weak government to establish a dictatorship over distracted and war-torn Italy.

As we have endeavored to study the political situation in Rome and Florence and the industrial situation in Milan and Turin we have interviewed Fascists, Socialists, employers, labor leaders and men of all classes. We are expressing the opinion of no organization or party, but endeavoring to sum up the situation as it appears to many representative Italians. All were agreed that the destructive excesses of the Communists and Socialists led directly to Fascism, and that the workers' effort to run the factories had proved a pathetic failure.

On September 2, 1920, the metal workers of Italy demanded an increase of wages. Their "striking on the job" caused the employers to declare a lockout. The workers answered by refusing to have the factories closed and seized them in order to operate them themselves. They were occupied night and day and the workers endeavored to run them for several weeks. Two hundred and eighty metallurgical establishments in the neighborhood of Milan were seized. Factories in the textile and other trades were also taken over in northern Italy. For three weeks the workers slept in the factories and by strict discipline and continuous work under three eight hour shifts endeavored to increase production. The government refused the employers' request for troops, fearing bloodshed and a national revolution. They allowed the workers a free hand to carry out their experiment. Giolitti, the Premier, supported the workers' demands and forced the employers to appoint a commission to prepare for a measure of industrial democracy, with a large share of workers' control. He said, "We are face to face with a real change in the social order. . . . These movements are dangerous to regulate and cannot be arrested." He frankly stated that the government aimed to change the very structure of industry by "a bill aimed at the organization of industry on the principle of the workers' intervention in technical, financial and working administration. . . . In this way the worker will take his place as an associate, and not as an enemy, of the employer."

The sweeping success of labor in the elections of 1919 had placed the Socialist Party in control of Parliament with 156 seats, or about one-third of the entire number in the Chamber of Deputies, which was divided into thirteen different parties or ineffective groups. They had polled a vote of some three millions, or a third of the total vote. The Anarchists and Communists were now emboldened to demand the destruction of the existing system of government and industry in order to build an ideal structure such as they pictured in Russia.

While the industrial workers were seizing the factories the farmers began a revolutionary movement to occupy the land. In Sicily one-sixth of the land was owned by 173 persons out of a population of four millions, while 725,000 agricultural workers possessed practically nothing. The peasants, fleeced by high rents and by the middlemen, were often reduced to poverty. During the revolt a third of the land of Sicily was occupied by the landless peasants. The government had promised to provide for them after the war. They took the government at its word and took possession of the land of the absentee, feudal landlords. This movement was often led by priests and monks who were inspired by a genuine sympathy for the discouraged and impoverished peasants.

The National Council of the Socialist Party approved by a large majority the seizure of lands by the agricultural workers and the establishment of workers councils to control the industrial plants. Their heads were soon turned by the sudden rise to power. In Milan a bomb was placed in a theater which killed many. In Bologna when the Communists in the City Council could not have their way they began to shoot. In one city two workers who did not agree to their policy were sentenced to be thrown into the furnace of the factory, but instead they were finally shot. In the meantime the Socialist Party was divided in factions. One wished immediately to seize the government, while the majority insisted that they were not ready, but must proceed with caution. The left wing of the party was using violence and bringing the movement into discredit. The right wing was hesitating and divided.

As a result the workers succeeded neither in revolution nor in reform. All now admit that the occupation of the factories proved a dismal failure. Without possessing the power of government they had no credit, no means of exchange, and none of the necessary machinery of finance or of commerce, of the procuring of raw material or the sale of manufactured goods. Within three weeks the workers knew that they had failed. Many agree that it was due to lack of preparation, lack of education and experience and the use of wrong means and methods.

The country had been drifting rapidly towards anarchy, chaos and bolshevism. The weak and nerveless government did nothing. Believing that the workers were the most powerful faction, they let them have their way. It was in this state of chaos that Fascism was born. Its leader is Mussolini, now the idol of Italy.

Mussolini had been a revolutionary Socialist. For a time he was editor of the principal Socialist organ, "Avanti." He had been compelled to leave Italy, and owing to his revolutionary methods was later expelled from Switzerland. Eleven times he had been arrested or imprisoned. He is a materialistic Socialist who believes in the use of force and control by the workers. When the war came his militant revolutionary disposition could not remain neutral. The Socialists opposed the war and stood for internationalism. He favored Italy's entering the war and advocated patriotic nationalism. He saw a chance by uniting with the Allies to break the last great empires of Germany and Austria and win power for the proletariat.

The first groups of the Fascisti were revolutionary syndicalists who desired to eventually overthrow the government themselves, but they were opposed to the international Communists, whom they believed were betraying Italy and robbing her of the small fruits of victory. The Fascisti began violently to attack the destructive Communists. New recruits were enlisted until the bulk of the Fascisti were composed of students, ex-soldiers and officers who were out of work and looking for excitement, and all the adventurous, idealistic elements in the middle and upper classes. They were joined later by some of the peasants and industrial workers. The daring of the Fascisti gave them a power out of all proportion to their numbers: As an anti-Bolshevist movement it soon rallied all the forces of a reviving patriotism and nationalism in the hour of the nation's despondency and despair. Its gathering momentum soon had behind it the power of public opinion. Even the majority of the workers now turned against the small minority of revolutionary Communists.

The Italian Socialist delegation to Russia had returned with a terrible indictment of Bolshevik rule. They said: "There is nothing left but a brute mass, incapable of organic conception, hating work, resigned to misery, to obedience and to death! There is no liberty of the press or personal liberty, but terrorism holds subject more than a hundred million people. . . . The ignorant masses are grouped in peasant labor armies which do little work, and do that little badly."

Realizing that Italy was dangerously near the verge of bolshevism, Mussolini began to organize his first bands of Fascisti in January, 1919. The movement soon became an uprising of the idealistic youth of Italy. They took the symbol of the old Roman victors' rods as a sign of stern authority and discipline for the punishment of criminals. Mussolini had the fifteen thousand Fascisti of Piacenza take the following oath: "By the blood of our two thousand martyrs, whom we invoke as witnesses and judges of our action, we, the Black Shirts of Piacenza, swear that for one year we will not wear on our persons any gold, silver or other precious metals or stones. We will work ardently without pay for the good of our country. We will give all superfluous ornaments to a fund for supporting enterprises having goodness, civilization, beauty and civic improvement as their objects."

Fascism now became a definite military organization. The bands of black shirts entered large industrial cities in defiance of the lax governmental authorities and attacked the communist strongholds. More than five hundred mayors who had been put in power in the former elections were forced to resign within a few weeks by violence or intimidation. Some two hundred and fifty labor temples and places of meeting of the workers, newspaper offices and headquarters were wrecked or burned. The Fascisti were more violent in their reaction than the Communists had been before them.

A congress of the Fascisti was held at Naples in October, 1922, and the leaders decided to seize the government. Mussolini declared, "I take the solemn oath that either the government of the country must be given peacefully to the Fascisti, or we will take it by force." When their demand was not immediately met an army of one hundred thousand Fascisti moved toward Rome. Premier Facta asked the King to sign an edict proclaiming martial law which would enable the Premier to use the military forces against the oncoming Fascisti. The King, however, refused to sign the edict, and instead telephoned to Mussolini inviting him to come to Rome.

For seven hours the Black Shirts of the Fascisti marched through the streets of the city. After three and a half years of struggle Mussolini had now taken the dictatorship of Italy. He had been placed in power by a revolutionary movement of violence. He immediately proclaimed a reign of law and order under stern discipline. He called some of the leading men of Italy to his cabinet. He moved swiftly and captured the imagination of the people. They recognized their need of unity and discipline and welcomed the coming of a strong man who dared to proclaim himself dictator and to have the self-confidence to assure them that he could save the country. He is the popular idol to-day.

Mussolini has accomplished already several noteworthy reforms. He is striving heroically to balance the budget and to cut down expenses. He is reforming the public services and dismissing hundreds of lazy supernumeraries. He is trying to put the railways, telegraphs and telephones upon a paying basis, proposing to transfer these and a number of other unprofitable governmental monopolies to private hands. He plans to build up a strong army and navy. He is subjecting Italy to a stern discipline with its loose and excessive individualism which has never been able to combine or unite effectively. This may be a valuable preparation for the future.

The future, however, is all uncertain. The Italian labor movement had increased in membership from 972,000 in 1913 to 3,100,000 in 1920. Valuable labor legislation had been passed with the unchallenged right of collective bargaining, a bill of rights for labor and the steady growth of progressive constitutionalism in industry. But radical revolutionary communism roused the indignation of public opinion and brought on a destructive reaction. Italy and Russia may each teach a lesson to those who have eyes to see.

Destructive radicalism and blind reaction both cause the pendulum to swing to the two extremes. The patient, constructive policy of the British labor movement is slowly winning its way to power in government and industry; seeking not the vindictive hatred of a class, but the welfare of a united co-operating community. It is finding that constructive evolution is in the end swifter than destructive revolution.

First National Conference of Community Church Workers

By David R. Piper

NO one will gainsay that the First National Conference of the Community Church Workers of America was a success. Men and women came from twenty States. A Negro worker reported for a number of Negro churches. A Chinaman delivered an address, a missionary from Porto Rico sat through the sessions, and a Hindu from New York spoke. Many of the great Christian organizations sent their secretaries. We are all under a great debt to the Federal Council of Churches, the Y. M. C. A., the Disciples' Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, the University of Illinois, the Massachusetts Federation of Churches, the Anti-Saloon League, and the "Christian Century" for the loan of their prophets. Pastors and lay workers came from Arizona, California, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. No one would think of denying that the conference was a truly representative national gathering.

The very first session came off just as was announced in the program. Mr. Charles E. Coleman, of Chicago, called the meeting to order. The following officers were elected for the 1923 conference: President, Rev. O. F. Jordan, of Park Ridge, Ill.; vice presidents, Mrs. E. Sibley, of Palisade, N. J., and Rev. J. A. McGaughey, of Imperial, Calif.; secretary, Rev. W. J. Malzard, of Wyoming, N.J.; treasurer, Mr. Charles E. Coleman.

It was not in the nature of things that a large amount of legislation should be considered. For the most part, the conference was made up of addresses and discussion. Mr. Coleman, knowing well the vice of many preachers, had installed for the use of the conference a mechanism by which red and green lights could be flashed in the eyes of the speakers. This device helped greatly in keeping the program right up to time.

The hospitality of the local church was matchless. Some delegates were housed in Beverly Hills, though this courtesy had not been promised. The meals served in the local church were a great convenience for fellowship. The church stenographer was at the service of the conference leaders. Mr. James H. Rook, a prominent layman of the local church, printed the list of delegates and distributed the list. A chorus and a local boys' band enriched the music for the services. Was anything left undone? If so, no delegate was heard to mention it.

While other national religious meetings were engaged in controversy during this same week, the Chicago conference was a love feast. This in spite of the widest divergence in personal opinion. The ministers present were mostly in active relationship with the Presbyterian, Congregational, Disciples, Baptist and Methodist organizations. Smaller denominations were represented. This diversity made no friction, but rather enhanced the interest. These men had learned the community church fundamental of toleration in matters of opinion.

"The terms of membership," said Rev. W. C. Miles, of Corning, Iowa, "must be those of Christ and His apostles. They are various in statement, indicating that there can be no set formula, but that which carries the heart and life into complete allegiance to Jesus opens wide the door of the true church of Christ. That, and that alone, will qualify for membership in the churches of our order."

At the present time a secretary dealing with sociological and reform issues, Prof. Alva W. Taylor, spoke on "The Salvation of the Rural Church," and stressed the great difficulty of getting rid of over-churching.

"The better way out," he contended, "would seem to be for the rural churches to co-operate on the basis of community needs and for the sake of a common service. Such co-operation need not compromise the convictions of any one of any creed or faith that is evangelical. The co-operation will be on the basis of the things held in common. Full liberty will be allowed on all personal differences. All worship the same Father and follow the same Christ. Let each practice the ordinances and keep other items of faith as his conscience dictates, just as is now done. It is quite as easy for neighbors to do that under one roof as under three or four. This co-operation may take the form of a federation of local churches or of a union of individuals of many communions. Neighbors simply work together in church as they do in school and other types of community life. In that way they can have a pastor, a Sunday-school of worth, a church program that reaches the young people and a Christianity that unites instead of divides."

Rev. C. W. Longman, of Chicago, spoke on "Educational Tasks for the Community Church." "Any intelligent approach to this problem must be in terms of two qualifying attitudes. We must determine what phases we may expect to introduce, in the first place; and then we must do our work in the face of the particular task our community places before us. Everything I say is colored by the fact that I hold certain theories as to education, and that I am in a congested, rapidly changing situation in Chicago. Two things every community church must do: (1) Make some sort of survey of the field; (2) educate the community to be willing to be educated. This involves making them aware of certain conditions in their community and showing possible remedies. Anything effective, educationally, must be a mutual concern.'

Triennial Convention of the Norwegian Lutheran Church in America

By Rev. G. T. Lee

Editor of the "Lutheran Church Herald"

THE second triennial convention of the Norwegian Lutheran Church of America was held at the Auditorium in St. Paul, Minn., June 8th to 15th. Six years ago this Church was organized by a union of three former church bodies and now has a membership of 500,000. The number of pastors is 1,301; congregations, 2,783; confirmed members, 293,675. The members of the Church are found chiefly in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Illinois and along the Pacific Coast, but a few are found in nearly every State in the Union and quite a large number in Canada. The original stock of members were emigrants from Norway, who came over as early as 1825, and will therefore celebrate their centenary in 1925. The Church is still to a great extent bi-lingual, but at the present time the home mission work is almost entirely English. The third generation of the immigrants speaks almost exclusively the English language.

The Church has a theological seminary in St. Paul; four colleges—Luther College, Decorah, Iowa; St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minn.; Concordia College, Moorhead, Minn., and Augustana College, Sioux Falls, South Dakota—three junior colleges, three normal schools and nine academies. It conducts foreign missions in China, Madagascar and South Africa, supporting 110 missionaries and 721 native workers. It conducts an extensive home mission and has twenty institutions of charity.

On June 7th the well-known and nationally famous St. Olaf choir, from Northfield, Minn., gave a concert in the Auditorium to an audience of about ten thousand, and the next evening the Choral Union of the church, with a chorus of eight hundred singers, gave a concert in the same place. At the regular meeting which commenced June 8th there were 1,214 registered voting pastors and lay delegates. The main topic for the convention was endowment funds for the schools and colleges. Several sessions were spent discussing this question and resulted in a practically unanimous decision to pay all indebtedness and deficits in the budgets and raise an endowment fund of $2,500,000. The regular budget for the next two years amounted to $2,680,638.92. Several building projects in connection with the colleges and academies were also approved. Some years ago St. Olaf College received approximately a million dollars from Harald Thorson, but with specifications that this was to be used for building purposes.

Dr. H. G. Stub was re-elected for a six-year term as president of the Church. Dr. J. A. Aasgaard, president of Concordia College, was elected vice-president; Rev. N. J. Lohre, secretary, and Mr. E. Waldeland, treasurer. The Church was organized shortly after the United States entered the war and naturally has had its difficulties during the upheaval of the war and the hard times following the deflation period which was especially severe on the farming communities of the Middle West comprising the large percentage of the church membership. It has not yet any rural problems. The country churches in the Middle West are in a flourishing condition and up to this time have been the mainstay of the organization. The new problem is the organization of city churches, especially in the Northwest. An English district will be organized in the near future and will naturally become a strong district in a short time.

Among the active members of the Church are Governor J. A. O. Preus of Minnesota, Governor Nestos of North Dakota, Senator Shipstead of Minnesota, Senator Norbeck of South Dakota, Congressman O. J. Kvale of Minnesota and Congressman Nelson of Wisconsin. The "Lutheran Church Herald" is the official English organ of the Church, a thirty-two page weekly edited by Rev. G. T. Lee.

Manitoba and Western Canada generally have been "dry." But at the end of last month Manitoba voted by thirty thousand in favor of the government sale of liquor. In Winnipeg the vote was more than two to one in favor of liquor, and that city contributed twenty-six thousand of the thirty thousand majority. The new law, which was put forward by the Moderation League, provides for a commission of three, who shall have charge of the arrangements for the sale of liquor. Breweries will be allowed to deliver their wares to the homes of purchasers and the liquor served in government stores will also be delivered. On July 11th Manitoba will vote on the question of the sale of beer and wine with meals in the dining rooms of hotels.

If our concern is for human life, why should we not one of these days adopt the suggestion of Dr. Roy Lyman Wilbur, the new president of the American Medical Association? He would like to see a physical examination made of every citizen in the United States at least once a year. That suggestion will probably be carried out one of these days, though it may not be within the life of any one now living.

An Intimate Confession

Anonymous

TO go down to the gates of death, almost to look in, to know what death means, and then to come away, is a great experience. It leaves one with a better grip on life, because one is freed from any fear of death, there is a new sense of values and old convictions emerge to a vigor before unknown. This has been my experience.

I had been ill for some months, gradually losing weight and strength. Then came frightful attacks of bloody nausea, repeated again and again, until so far as I was concerned it did not matter to me personally whether I lived or died; that stage of physical exhaustion had been reached where there was no longer any repugnance to death. Without any fault of my own, my responsibilities were being lifted from my shoulders, my conscience could not reproach me, my spirit was at peace. There was something exhilarating in the sensation. Life was the real task, life was the real problem, life called for struggle and effort, while death was easy, one had but to accept it.

I was hiccupping just as I had heard a poor fellow do for whom I had once drawn a will. He was dying of cancer of the stomach and the doctors did not say what was my trouble. In my mother's last illness she kept flopping her arms about. She could not keep them still. It was a sign of nervous exhaustion, and I soon found I was flopping my arms about in that same way. I could not keep them still. I should have cried in agony had any one bound them down. I could sleep but little. In the long night watches and the weary days I lay upon my bed and thought and thought. "Death is easy; life is the real problem. Your family needs you. What right have you to let yourself sink? These symptoms are bad. Unless you brace up something will give way and you will pass on." Then there came to me that passage in the twelfth chapter of Mark: And Jesus answering saith unto them. Have faith in God. Verily I say unto you whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou taken up and cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith cometh to pass, he shall have it. Therefore I say unto you, All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have received them and ye shall have them."

Of course, Christ did not mean literally that at your command or mine mountains would be cast into the sea. He was just using a figure of speech to convey the idea from his mind to ours that faith would conquer obstacles which were mountains to us. To fold one's hands and sit down in the presence of an obstacle and to say, "It cannot be done," will get one nowhere. God works through us. There is no doubt about that. Therefore, go forward with faith in God and the belief that one is achieving the desired result will aid in its accomplishment.

Thus I reasoned with myself as I lay upon my bed, and I said. "You have faith in God. He gave you a family to care for. You must not lie down under this responsibility without a struggle. You can get well with God's help, but He will not help you if you do not help yourself. God works through His laws. We can be the instruments for the execution of those laws. We cannot expect God to perform a miracle in our behalf and suspend laws which He has given us to use in our behalf. Hence, self-help becomes in fact a law of God. Therefore, not only will I pray God for health, but I will use every effort to get well; I will follow my physician's directions most exactly; I will fill my mind with pleasant thoughts only; I will try constantly to make my care as slight a burden as possible to my wife; I will be always cheerful; I will believe each day that I am better, and I will in some way occupy my mind."

So I read and read and became intimate with several splendid books. Among them were John Fiske's Essays, in particular, "The Unseen World," in which he describes the wonders of the heavens; how from whirling masses of gas our planetary system was created; how other worlds and suns and systems are in process of creation; how it may be that when our planets and sun are cold that they will be brought together in a collision of such violence that their solid substance will be turned again to gas and a new series of worlds started on their way; how, though the heavens be searched to their farthest depths with the most powerful telescopes, there is no end to these wonderful processes of creation, and all are going on subject to the same laws; how he felt awed by the stupendous evidence of a Divine Intelligence at work and saw God in the heavens above and in the earth about him.

Another great book which I read was "The Voyage of the Beagle," by Charles Darwin. In 1830 a small British man-of-war was sent to survey the far southern coasts of South America on both the eastern and western sides of the continent, to make studies of the geology of the region and of its animal and vegetable life. Darwin went along as the naturalist of the expedition which spent five years in its work. His powers of memory and observation were most extraordinary. He would look at a cobweb and say, "Only one spider in the world weaves a web like this. It is a rare specimen," and then go on and tell how it differed from others. From the study of the minute he turns on the next page to the stupendous in nature, to explanations of the laws governing the geologic upheaval of a continent, or the action of tidal waves or the eruptions of volcanoes. Through all the book there runs the evidence of his faith that only a God of infinite intelligence could have devised the universal laws for the growth and life of the great and small in the world about us.

A third wonderful book was John Muir's "Alaska Days." Together we paddled our canoe close to the mighty icebergs, we listened to the thrilling story of their birth, we crossed great glaciers chiseling a continent into new forms, we lived in the open where all about us we could see nature working, without haste, without rest, with unfailing obedience to law. As he depicted this marvel of ordered energy John Muir showed his own faith in the guidance of a controlling Providence.

By reading these books I had been taken out of myself. I had lived in the open with three great companions for guides; I had seen God's thoughts in expression. First of all, I was struck by the simple, complete faith of my companions. There was no doubt, no cynicism, only faith in a Creator whose marvelous laws ruled in the seen world about us. And that raised a big question in my mind. How about the unseen world and the life of the Spirit which determines and controls our actions? It is unthinkable that a Creator who rules the physical by laws of infinite intelligence will not guide the spiritual in a like way. In the former realm man progresses and accomplishes results in proportion as he understands and applies the laws of the Creator. He may defy those laws. He may do so because his will is free, but the result is sure disaster. That man who makes new and useful discoveries and applications of the divine laws in the physical realm is hailed as a great inventor and benefactor of the race. He is able to do it because he labors in harmony with God—he is a worker with God.

It is unbelievable that the same methods should not apply in the unseen world as do in the seen, in the spiritual as in the physical. There must be laws which man is free to violate, but with the sure penalty of punishment. There must exist the same opportunity to learn what those laws are, to live in harmony with them, to be a worker with God and to accomplish results as helpful to others and beneficial to one's self as in the corresponding sphere of the physical world.

So the real secret of life, successful, free, rich joyous life is to be in harmony with the Divine, to be at one with it whether that be in the physical or spiritual realm. It is the same in the sense that both are controlled by the laws of the same Intelligence. How are we to know what are the laws of the Spirit? Above all, we have in Christ one who reveals those laws. He recognized and practised life in harmony with the will of His Father, God. "I and My Father are one," He said. He was trying to make plain that He was working with God, that the Father's purpose and His purpose were the same. To be at one with God, that is the real secret of life, that is the key which unlocks all, that is the theme about which the whole grand symphony is woven.

To have faith in God, to lay hold of His laws of the life of the Spirit as revealed by Christ as the way to life joyous and triumphant, is something that I knew before, but until my illness forced the dropping of incessant activity and put in its place time for reflection these thoughts were little more than intellectual concepts. Now they came over me like the surge of a mighty sea. I felt myself borne away in a current of infinite power. For me the secret of successful life was solved. I had laid hold of the first great law of the Spirit to be one with God.

Now to go back to my illness. From the time that I resolved to get well I held my own. At first almost imperceptibly, then little by little I gained strength from May to September, until I had enough to go to a famous surgeon, who cut away an ulcer near the outlet of the stomach. His only comment was, "It is a wonder that ulcer did not kill you in the spring." After the operation my strength rapidly returned. Within a year I was enjoying health and vigor such as I had never known before.

"Thy Kingdom Come"

By Rev. W. H. P. Faunce, D.D.

President of Brown University

WHAT is the kingdom which we call "thine"? It is not my kingdom or yours, but His. What do we mean by it?

The kingdom of God does not mean mere economic progress. It does not mean simply more comforts and conveniences in the home and the shop. It does not mean merely better wages or salaries or better clothes to wear. It does not mean pure food, porcelain bathtubs, fireless cookers and an automobile for every family. Civilization may be "increased in goods" and yet remain "poor and blind and naked." What is the use of traveling at seventy, or even two hundred, miles an hour if we are as discontented at the end of the journey as we were at the beginning? What is the use of talking over wire—or without one—if we have really nothing to say? The promotion of comfort is not the creation of character. To every nation that is boasting of mere accumulation of material comforts God will say at some great crisis, "Thou fool, thy soul is required of thee."

The kingdom does not consist in ceremony or organization. No ceremony can of itself change the soul of any human being. Useful as a symbol it is deadly as a substitute for experience. First a change within, then the symbol without is the normal order of the kingdom. Organization is the expression of life, but cannot create life. The Interchurch Movement was the apotheosis of organization. It accumulated countless files, catalogs, indexes, charts, as if the kingdom were not like a grain of mustard seed, but like an adding machine. We live in an over-organized world, and we may be devoured by our own machinery. Our great need is not more wheels and pulleys, but more life.

The kingdom is not metaphysics or abstract philosophy. Of course, there must be a metaphysics involved in all our living, there must be a philosophy and a theology, but these are not the foundations of the kingdom. If the church fathers, Irenaeus and Origen, were here to-day we should find their faith the same as our own, but the reasons they would give for it would be very different from our reasons. Irenaeus said there were four Gospels because there were four winds in the sky. But both for him and for us there are four Gospels and no more.

Can we define a mother in terms of chemistry? Can we say, Take so much oxygen, so much hydrogen, and the result is a mother? Or is there something in motherhood that breaks through all our formulas and escapes? Suppose we had asked Simon Peter if he believed in the two natures in one person? He never heard the word "nature" or the word "person" as the theologians use them. All he could say was, "In that man from Nazareth God has spoken to me. Him I will follow to prison and to death." First stars and then astronomy, first bowers and then botany, first religion and then theology, is the order of all human experience. Charles Lamb understood that when he said: "If Shakespeare were to enter this room where we are now sitting, we should all instantly rise; but if Christ were to enter, we should all instantly kneel." He who kneels before Christ is on the way to all the theology he needs to know.

No, the kingdom of God is not economics, not organization, not metaphysics—it is spiritual. God is spirit and His kingdom is a spiritual domain. Wherever His will is done, there His kingdom is set up. Wherever His will is studied, interpreted and embodied in human lives, there His kingdom advances and triumphs. Wherever God is, there is His throne; wherever His righteous purpose, His eternal love, His overflowing life controls the loves and hates and purposes of men, there is the kingdom of God. And since Christ is the express image of God, we rightly say in the unceasing Tc Deum of the Church, "Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ."

At the center of the kingdom is a person, and that person is our Lord. Without absolute allegiance to Him the kingdom in its highest form cannot exist. Let us speak plainly and unmistakably. Christ is to us not one of many teachers. He is the perfect revelation of the Father. Christ is not an important edition of Confucius: He is not a bettered Buddha. We follow Confucius a certain distance and admire him and then we find in him what we can never admire. We follow Buddha a certain distance and then we turn away. We follow Christ without reservation and we follow Him forever. We yield ourselves to Him with no hesitation or scruple, and we ask nothing more in this world or the next than to know His will and to do it. As Dante said "His will is our peace."

If any man have not the spirit of Christ—though he have learning, titles, wealth, fame—he is none of His. And if any man have the spirit of Christ—though he have little learning, no reputation and a defective theology—he is one of His. If a church have not the spirit of Christ—it may have oratory, music, architecture and a full treasury—it is not a Christian church. If any church have the spirit of Christ, though it be defective in architecture, in organization, in creed, in ceremony, it is a church of Jesus Christ our Lord.

And how do men or churches enter the kingdom of God? There is only one pathway. When Christ first began to preach he uttered one great cry, "Repent ye, for the kingdom is at hand." To repent is not to weep and moan. The word means "change your mind." The one primal need of the chaotic world is change of mind—not a change in organization or formula or ritual, but a change of mind. But men say, "You can't change human nature." The fact is, human nature is the only thing that can be changed. We cannot change the laws of the physical world, the ebb and flow of the tides, the force of gravitation, the stars in their courses, the atoms in their attractions and repulsions. But the loves and hates and purposes of men can be, have been, must be changed. That the individual is changed all the world knows. That Tolstoi was changed from a brutal soldier to a humble disciple, that Jerry Macauley was changed, that George John Romanes was changed we all know. Also nations and races may be changed. Delicate Roman ladies sitting in the ancient Colosseum looked down with delight on a contest of prisoners with wild beasts. No city could endure that sight to-day. Aristotle declared slavery essential to civilization. No philosopher on earth now believes that. The church in which I worship every Sunday was built by the proceeds of a lottery. No church in civilization would tolerate that method of securing funds to-day. We cannot change the laws of nature, but we can change the laws, the attitudes the purpose of men, and wherever men do change their minds and adopt the mind of Christ, there, and there only, is the kingdom of God.

Is that all? If we Christianize men in their relation to God, have we expressed the Master's thought? Or must we Christianize the relations of men to one another? No reader of the Old Testament can be in doubt. Christ finely held the balance between the individual and the social. The second commandment is like unto the first. We must Christianize men in their relation; that is, as members of a social order. We must not merely help the slave, but abolish slavery; not only reform the drunkard, but abolish the saloon; not only gain converts, but establish them in such right relations to one another as to constitute a kingdom. The moment we attempt to do that we face conflict. Do we dare to be Christian to-day?

In the industrial life around us pagan principles too often prevail. When the industrial world is divided into two parties, one determined to give little labor for much money, and the other determined to give little money for much labor, our industrial life is simply a continuous silent warfare. It then becomes the foe of the home and the church and a caricature of the Christian order of society. Men do not exist to make shoes or barrels, but shoes and barrels are made for men. The object of a Christian society is never profits, but service. Genuine service will bring profits, but they are incidental to the real aim, which in a Christian society is identical with the aim of Jesus of Nazareth. Business should become a profession; and a profession like that of the doctor or the minister aims at more than financial results. Our present acquisitive society must be transformed into a constructive society, aiming not primarily at dividends or wages, but at the service of men in the name of Him who even in a carpenter's shop was about His Father's business.

So, also, the kingdom must come in the church life of our country. The supreme test of any church is this: Do the men who enter the sanctuary find there the spirit of Christ? We all know churches where you can find candles and vestments and rituals and dogmas, but somehow fail to find Christ. And when He is absent many dissensions arise because the church has become eccentric—off its center. When He is absent the spirit of charity goes with Him, and all divisions among us bulk large and black, just as rocks protrude in the harbor when the tide ebbs out to sea. We overcome the rocks not by blasting them out, but by letting the tide come in. "We have the mind of Christ"—to have that is better than to have all the endowments in the world. When that mind—so broad, so just, so forgiving—goes from the church nothing is left of the kingdom, but only separate quarreling individuals.

So also the kingdom must come in our education. There is no such thing as Christian mathematics or Christian chemistry, but there is such a thing as a mathematician or a chemist who is a Christian man. I have rejected many men applicants for teaching positions because I knew that at heart they were cynics. I would not ask any teacher to sign a creed because I would not sign one myself. I would not insist that he be a member of a church, since we know by sad experience such membership does not guarantee a Christian attitude. But we do rightly ask that our teachers shall not blight the buds of spiritual aspiration and not teach a view of the world which makes it incredible that God should love so miserable a planet.

The most vital of all tasks to-day is to make the kingdom come in our international relations. "A nation," said John Milton, "should be one huge Christian personage, one mighty growth or stature of an honest man." Are our nations today like Christian personages, or are they organized on

"the good old plan
That they should take who have the power

And they should keep who can?"

Is the fitting symbol of the modern nation the lion, or the dragon, or the "creatures that tear each other in their slime? The Christian religion cannot endure such a national attitude, and it repudiates all greed and rapacity and oppression even when those things wear the mask of pseudo-patriotism.

Pastor Keller's Alpenstock

By William Willard Howard

THE good Pastor Adolf Keller, of Switzerland, who is a highly-esteemed foreign correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, has grasped his alpenstock with both hands and whacked me over the head. The alpenstock seems to be made of some hard material resembling second-growth hickory.

The good pastor's attitude is due to my article, "Why Europe Hates Us," which was published in THE CHRISTIAN WORK of May 26. This article, the pastor declares in THE CHRISTIAN WORK of June 2, "Is a colossal misrepresentation of certain facts and a quite fallacious generalization." These are hard words, but are they justified?

It is not for the likes of me to hint, even remotely, that the good Pastor Keller does not know what he is talking about. That would not be altogether true. The pastor does know what he is talking about—to the extent, at least, of his knowledge of what he is talking about. The determining factor in the case is the extent of Pastor Keller's knowledge of the real feeling of Europe toward the United States.

Pastor Keller says: "The question is whether such hatred is to be found in the European peoples who have lost the war through America's participation in it. Although I am in constant contact with hundreds of men and women of these countries I never heard one word of hatred, but very frequently the expression of another feeling which is widely spread all over Europe: it is disappointment, but not hatred."

Let us accord to Pastor Keller the honor that is his due. He is one native of Europe who admits that Germany lost the war through America's participation in it.

I do not doubt for a moment that Pastor Keller never heard one word of hatred for the United States. Pastor Keller is professionally and temperamentally unfitted to hear anything of the sort. He goes to and fro upon the face of nature preaching brotherly love and international friendship and faith and hope and charity and peace and goodwill. Is it likely that such a man, with a countenance suffused with kindness and good-will, would be met by snarls of hatred? Is not the every-day world on its good behavior when such a man passes by? If not, then there is not any potency in goodness or any spiritual authority in Pastor Keller's calling. When Pastor Keller looks upon the face of Europe its badly-hidden snarl of hatred for the United States is softened to a look of disappointment.

In my article, "Why Europe Hates Us," to which Pastor Keller takes such strongly-expressed objection, I pointed out that if you went to Europe bearing gifts of food or relief you would not see any evidence of hatred—unless you happen to have eyes in the back of your head.

Pastor Keller says that Europe's feeling of disappointment, which, he admits, "may be worded in strong language by ignorant and incompetent people," would disappear quickly if America would assume the leadership in constructive work and international co-operation.

This leadership in constructive work means invariably loans of money and unlimited credits. Pastor Keller is only one of a small army of men and women who rise at frequent intervals to demand that America emerge from her isolation and reconstruct Europe. The latest recruit that I have noticed in that army is the eminent Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, who returned recently from a woman's congress in Italy, demanding that America take up the task of reconstructing or stabilizing Europe. Mrs. Catt did not say how this was to be done. Pastor Keller does not say how it should be done. Not one of the men and women who demand that America "do something" to rehabilitate Europe has offered even a tentative suggestion indicating just what should be done. No one has the right to demand constructive action on the part of America unless he is able to offer a practical working program.

Just what action should America take in the rehabilitation of Europe? Will the good Pastor Keller write to THE CHRISTIAN WORK and tell us? Will he submit a definite suggestion?

All that Europe wants of America is money. Europe does not want American constructive leadership or co-operation, or anything else that does not carry with it enormous loans and credits. Europe does not want America's restraining hand laid upon her. She wants to go her own pace, in her own way, with America's money to speed up her going.

Until Europe has a change of heart America cannot help her. If she gets a change of heart she will not need loans or credits. She will bring about her own rehabilitation simply by going to work. As a primary testimony to good faith she should stop printing worthless paper money.

Europe is suffering from a case of nerves. She needs to stop talking war and politics and go to work. Loans and credits will hinder rather than help her. Europe is a spend-thrift whose brain has been unsettled by the colossal loans of money and goods poured into the empty laps of impoverished nations during and after the war.

By a curious coincidence other returning American travelers arriving in New York from overseas since my article was published have given newspaper interviews in which they described Europe's attitude toward the United States almost exactly as I had found it. Conspicuous among these was a United States Senator who had gone to Europe to investigate the possibilities of American constructive co-operation in foreign affairs.

The vanquished nations of Europe do not need our help. Their fields are as productive as ever they were; their factories were not damaged or destroyed by the war. Physically, they are as well off as ever. Their present situation is due to moral and spiritual demoralization. Germany's sole trouble is the result of the post-war exploitation of her middle classes by the big industrialists and her laboring classes. In spite of her defeat and humiliation in war, Germany has recovered sufficiently to take away much of England's foreign trade. This has been accomplished by the systematic depreciation of the value of the mark and the semi-starvation of the middle classes.

America is handicapped by ignorance of the real situation abroad. One difficulty is that foreign correspondents of the American daily newspapers do not print all that they know. America does not know the truth, because the truth is not told to her.

Especially is this the case with Russia. The truth has not been told. If I were to write what I know to be the truth I could not get any daily newspaper in the United States to print it.

At the close of the war I was an ardent supporter of Woodrow Wilson's fourteen points and an earnest advocate of the League of Nations. But my mind is not so narrow that flint-hard facts cannot change it. To-day I am opposed to American participation in the affairs of Europe. Not until Europe reaches the high level of honesty, unselfishness and good-will from which America looks out upon the world shall we take part in her affairs. When an honest, broad-minded, generous man goes into partnership with a narrow-minded, selfish, mercenary, grasping individual the result is neither pleasant nor profitable.

Leaving out of consideration the good Pastor Adolph Keller and his alpenstock, there is one situation in Europe in which the United States should take active participation. That is the situation of unthinkable poverty and distress of the members of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia, who fled from their ancestral lands and homes to escape death at the hands of revolutionists and took refuge in the independent countries in eastern Europe. These destitute gentlefolk feel toward the United States neither hatred nor strongly-worded disappointment. They look to America with wistful longing as the only possible source of help.

I have told in these pages a little about the sufferings and slow death of these unfortunate gentlefolk who have been passed by and left to starve while the peasants of Bolshevik Russia have been fed. I have told, also, that Anne Louise Howard is at a far outpost of eastern Europe carrying on a relief industry in which she gives employment to destitute gentlewomen in the making of beautiful hand-embroidered, hand-sewn Russian Princess Blouses. A forty-page booklet will be sent to anyone who wants to see what the blouses look like. Contributions to the working fund may be sent to the Russian Refugee Fund, care THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Young People and the Church

By Richard Knowles Morton

IN many churches there is growing up an ominous schism between the church members and the young people. These terms somewhat commingle, it is true, for many young people are church members. The significant break is widening, however, between the older church members and the young people who are just looming up as prospective church members.

Because of good strategy in a few churches, no sign of a break is at all evident. But perhaps even when invisible the causes of such a schism may, nevertheless, be present.

Why should there ever be even the thought of a religious schism between young people and church members? Why, you say, some of the young people are the children of the church members! True to a much lesser degree than you might suppose. And, moreover, each person is an individual with differences and eccentricities galore. The break between the two ages is manifesting itself, due to very concrete causes—church atmosphere, church management, church activities. Probably I have omitted to mention other important ones, but I did not have any intention, on the other hand, of including in my list modern amusements, modern petulance, and the current indifference of youth. I shall go so far as to say that the latter group of causes is only secondary and purely the result of the existence of the first group I mentioned. Church policies have often in many churches simply driven young people to their dances, their unconventional activities, their petulance.

I believe that this age did not naturally give birth to what are known as modern tendencies and inclinations. Hundreds of years ago the time was just as ripe for youth as it is now. True, the church had its troubles years ago, but it held the community and the young people. The fact is, that in comparatively recent times the elders of the church have often, in many churches, chosen to discuss theology rather than religion, and dispute rather than discuss. This is one of the main reasons for the break with the young people. They are not interested in these pointless disputes, nor will they run the gauntlet of adult criticism, rebuke and restriction which have resulted from this new church policy. Modern progress and amusements would have helped instead of hindered the church, if its leaders had had the foresight to direct the church's influence to the right place at the right time. These amusements and new ideas have not hindered the college, industries, wholesome recreation nor the enforcement of the law. They harmed the church because the church did not deal correctly with them; the church failed in its plain duty toward the young people. And even to-day there is not one church out of a hundred in which an intelligent study of the modern world, young people's needs and the relations between the church and all these new influences has been made. Where, moreover, were the stimulating inventions, the beckoning industries, the intellectual stimuli of to-day when the church was better one hundred years ago? Why have not the new marks of progress stimulated the church as they have education, for instance? Because again the church maintained a primitive, uninformed, bigoted point of view. There were and are, of course, many churches in which the true light is being introduced, but the church as a whole has been woefully lacking in initiative and foresight. The young people have not been slow to perceive these deficiencies, and the present results are to be expected.

It is idle to distinguish so sharply between the "modern" age and some other age of an Utopian character which the adults imagine to have existed thirty or more years ago. Changes occur with relative moderateness. The new attitude which so many of the young people hold toward the church to-day is the gradually evolved product of constant tendencies in the church which have led it away from intimacy with young people, religious democracy and beautiful reverence. The young people have stepped first into the church fresh from life and its requirements and with true, pure religious feelings at heart. After a protracted stay a great many of the young people have sensed keenly that their innate longings were not being satisfied; they sensed the want of something. They were filled with astonishment, too, to find the church so often marred by rambling talks, disputes, scheming, and all descriptions of irreligious and non-religious motives.

I feel that I may speak thus boldly from the young people's point of view, for I am a young man myself. I believe that, if circumstances had not specially favored it, I should never have become interested in the church and its activities. The strict formality of some churches still repels me; I dislike the childish prattle so often aired within the church's doors. The many disgusting acts done with an air of religion in the church draw my hearty contempt. The ignorant people, ministers and laymen alike, who find a chance to play aristocracy and to air their supposed learning in a religious but conceited manner, repel me. Yet I believe, on the other hand, that the church can be the dispenser of true religion, and that it is the only instrument by which the young people may be directed to the worthiest duties and interests of life.

The young people do not quite see, in the first place, the contact of the very religious and orthodox church members with the masses of people boasting no such admirable reputation. The church and Christ himself want each member to be an evangelist, a gospel messenger, a recruiting agent for the church. But how many really discharge such duties? The contact is of the slimest nature; evangelistic meetings are frequently sad failures; the church has not an effective way (or at least does not use one) of getting out in the community and really winning people for Christ and His Church.

The young people often realize, too, that the church loves ritualism and the show of learnedness and form. The youth is not distracted by theology or by church strategy, and he therefore senses the other motives with which his stern elders are often occupied. He must make a sensational statement of his faith before the church, perhaps, or he must take a certain conspicuous seat in the church auditorium. He must abide by a set of rules, and he must listen to displays of ethics, theology and oratory (sometimes) by the pastor, which are, of course, more or less intrinsically sound. He must listen, after these, however, to whisperings by many of the congregation who succeed in convincing him of their long-winded explanation of something they themselves never understood. How an uninformed group loves to lay down the law!

When a church sets out to maintain all its services and relationships with the young people in all austerity and sobriety it loses the full support of the young people. They will not abide by foolish rules, the fallacies in which they can readily see. They will not be overlorded by many church members whose complete ignorance curiously makes them over-religious and ludicrously conceited. They will not take criticism of an unjust or provoking character, and they are disillusioned by finding it rampant within the church walls, which seemed to them at first sacred and holy.

The church will widen this dangerous breach with the young people if it does not explain to them the essentials of the true abiding religion, and then practice it, and it only, every week in the church! The young will, furthermore, not concern themselves with churches in which there are aristocratic attitudes, cliques or stereotyped rules laid down by a few. They will not sympathize with perpetual quarreling and dissatisfaction. They will not have their well-meant plans vetoed by conniving church members whose motives are obviously irreligious. They want co-operation and confidence and real contact with the life of the church. Nothing so alienates the young people, also, as having in the church a board of deacons which bears with unusual sobriety and intolerance its high duties. While this board should maintain its rightful dignity and power, it should not obnoxiously abuse it. The minister must mix with the young people, but they do not want him to make out of himself a fawning schemer, who tries by his antics to win the young people. Such a minister is a fool, not a success with the young people. The church must possess itself of some features distinctly youthful and appealing to young people. The church must not talk about the young people, nag them, criticize them; it must attack their problems intelligently, efficiently, sincerely. It must give the proper prestige and honor to the work of the young people. Give them credit for good common sense and shrewdness. Conceptions of religion are not very dependent upon the age or erudition of the one having the conception. I am convinced that there are many sixteen-year-old boys who have a finer, more beautiful conception of religion and Christ than some much-discussed D.D.'s.

Recruiting for the church begins with the parents bringing to the church their own children. Let them make sure that the church accepts them in a friendly way. Let the older people take an interest in the young people's meetings and events. The young people should be represented on all church committees and know all the church transacts or votes.

If the churches in general do not heed the warning of this break with the young people the church of the future will suffer tragically. Community life, the prestige of religion, and the general forces for righteousness will suffer. But one cannot get the young people by discussions of the annual assembly of this or that church, at which a discursive dispute took place. The churches often do to-day what they forbid in other groups. The young people command the church of the future; they have the final word; you can influence or thwart them, but you cannot stop them. The first essential for church unity is unity of different ages, different communities, and different points of view.

INSTALLMENT XVIII.

"I didn't know anything could be so horrible," she sobbed. "Oh, I was mad! I did not understand, I did not realize! But I had not been married to him long before I—I saw what he was; knew what it was to be the wife of such—You don't know, Eleanor! You—can't think! But still I fought on. I would not give in. I would not confess that I had made a mistake. I said I would be loyal to him, and—and all the time—oh, I can't tell you! You know what it was like on that Sunday afternoon—the kind of house, the kind of people. When I got back last night the place was empty and that horrid woman told me that Mrs. Barnes and her daughters had gone away, and then she gave me a letter. Here it is—read it."

"And you know no more than this?" asked Eleanor after she had read.

The child shook her head.

"But what did you do? How did you spend the night? Why didn't you come back here?"

"I didn't know what to do. I think I was mad. I remember wandering round the streets not knowing where I was going. If I thought anything at all it was that I would find my way to the river and throw myself in. I did not feel as though I could come to you, somehow. I didn't think you would understand; but I kept on walking, walking, and then suddenly I found myself on Hampstead Heath, and—and—

"Yes?" cried Eleanor eagerly.

"I don't know how it was, but I heard myself saying, 'I will arise and go to my father,' and—and I found myself at home! And there was a light in the window—and I rushed to the door, and Dad came out and brought me in! Oh, Eleanor, Eleanor!"

"Then you went home?"

"I couldn't help it. Do you know what he said to me when he came that morning I told you about? 'The door will be always open to you, Peg,' and his words have remained in my memory ever since."

"And they received you kindly?"

"Oh, Eleanor, you don't know! You can't think how good Dad is, or how beautiful he was. Of course, in a way, I expected that Mother would; but, oh, Dad was just lovely! He took me on his knee just as he did years ago, and I found myself with my arms round his neck telling him everything."

For a moment a feeling of anger shot into Eleanor's heart. A sense of pride rose up within her, a horror of failure.

"Then you swallowed your pride?" she found herself saying.

"Eleanor, what pride had I? What had I to be proud about? Why, as you know, I had been a bad, wicked girl—we both had; and—and I could not help going home. Oh, if you knew how splendid Dad is! Why—why—in spite of everything, I went to sleep feeling happy. Just the knowledge that I was in my own bed again, and that I was home, and—do you know when Dad came into the room and knelt down by me and said, 'God bless you, my little Peg,' I felt as though—oh, I can't tell you what I felt! It's all been so horrible, and I've been so wicked! But I am glad I went home."

"Then you've gone home to stay?"

"Where else could I go? Besides, after all that common, tawdry, shabby vulgarity, to find myself at home where things were beautiful and—and pure, and clean, it was just heaven. I don't know how it was, but last night when I read that letter something seemed to break and I—saw things as they really were. I—I—oh, how could I have done it, Eleanor?"

"And you have come from home now?" said her sister, bewildered at what had taken place, and hardly understanding Peggy's incoherent story.

"Yes," the child replied; "and do you know I did not wake until midday to-day, and it was all so beautiful. And then Trev came home quite unexpectedly. He isn't going back to Ireland again, and of course it was all so wonderful. You see Trev's so changed. And then he insisted on bringing Mary Penryn—that's the girl he's engaged to, and—and I think I forgot everything except my own happiness. All those horrible months seemed as though they never existed, and they were all so good to me, Eleanor. Mary Penryn is just lovely—no wonder Trev's fond of her. No one upbraided me, and they have been so kind. Oh, it has all been so wonderful, so horrible, and yet so beautiful. I hardly know what I'm saying! Then Trev mentioned your name, and immediately I felt I must come and tell you. Dad wanted to come with me, but I wouldn't let him. Then John insisted that he would come; but I felt as though it wouldn't be right, somehow. I wanted to see you myself, and I told them that I would come alone. And when I got here you were gone. But I wouldn't go away. I knew you would be home some time, so I said I'd wait. And I have waited, you see. I could not help coming for you dear."

"Coming for me?"

"Yes, coming for you, for of course you're coming back with me."

Eleanor shook her head. "No," she replied. "I can't do that."

"But why? They are waiting for you."

"How do you know? Did they tell you anything?"

"Oh, you really must come home with me, you must."

"And confess myself a failure? No, I won't."

"You can't mean that?"

"Yes, I do," the girl spoke defiantly. "Now I know you are safe I shall be all right. Perhaps it was right for you to go home—you—you are different, but I cannot do it."

In vain Peggy pleaded with her. Eleanor longed to do what her sister asked; her heart ached for a sight of her father and mother, but something forbade her. Her pride rose in revolt. She could not go back and confess she had been wrong, for she knew she had been wrong. But to go back and confess it was too humiliating.

"Then I suppose I must go without you," said Peggy sadly. "Or they will be thinking that something has happened to me, and I did hope you'd come with me!"

At that moment there was a knock at the door, and a man who was employed by the owner of the flat appeared.

"A telephone message for you miss."

"Yes, what is it?"

"It's from Miss Honeywood, miss. She 'phoned to say that her friends at Enfield wanted her to stay the night, and thinking you wouldn't mind, she consented. That's all, miss."

"There now," cried Peggy, when the man had gone, "you can't stay here after that! Oh, Eleanor, why be lonely and miserable?"

"I am not lonely, and I am not miserable," replied the girl. "I have my work to do, and I am going to live my own life. Do you know, Peg, I have got a splendid position, and I shall have all sorts of opportunities for advancement."

"But—but—"

"It's no use talking, I'm not going back."

Peggy made her way to the door. "Good-night, dear. Is there any message you would like me to give them at home?"

Eleanor shook her head.

"Shall I ask Trev to bring Mary Penryn here? I know you'd like her."

Again she shook her head.

"There's nothing you'd like me to say to Dad and Mother, is there?"

"No."

"Then 'good-night'."

There was something pathetic in the child's tone, something which appealed to Eleanor strongly. A great weight had been lifted from her heart to know that Peggy was safe, and yet, as she realized that her sister's life had been ruined, that the past few months had meant, and must ever mean, an irreparable tragedy in her life, she felt a horrible remorse. It was her fault. Peggy had been greatly under her influence, and had she acted differently her sister's life might have been saved. But because she had been under the spell of such women as Tamsin Cory and had listened to her unhealthy talk she had allowed Peggy to go her own way, and this was the result of it.

Still she steeled her heart against her sister's pleading. She could not, no, she simply could not go back to her home after all that had taken place.

She opened the door and Peggy passed out on to the landing. As she did so a sense of utter desolation swept over her. Peggy would go home while she would be left there in loneliness. After all, what had she to stay away for? What had she gained by going away? And—and was not Peggy right? Hadn't she, too, been a bad girl? Her heart ached with a great hunger. She longed for the life she had forsaken, longed with an unutterable longing. Why should she stay there in loneliness, and misery? Besides, it was her duty to go home.

At that moment she realized something of what her father and mother must have felt because of her action. Perhaps they had spent sleepless nights thinking about her and Peggy, and she had been careless, indifferent about them. She had thought only of herself, nothing of her duty.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." The words came to her mind.

All the influences of her early years were at work. All those things which she had learnt when her mother taught her to say her simple prayers. Her innermost soul was calling out for something which she had discarded, forgotten, and yet which was the great secret of life.

It all came like a flash, and although it has taken me some time even to suggest her feelings, Peggy had scarcely passed from the door before the truth came to her.

"Peggy!" she called, and the word was like a gasp.

"Yes, dear, what is it?"

"I'll—I'll go with you! Wait! No, no, don't say anything, I can't bear it! But wait!"

Almost feverishly she put on her hat and jacket and they left St. Hildebrand's Mansions and went into the street.

"Dad told me—" began Peggy.

"No, no, don't speak!" interrupted Eleanor. "There—there's a taxi."

Almost frantically she stopped the driver, who drew up at the curb.

Neither of the two girls spoke a word as the taxi made its way towards Hampstead, but Peggy, who had nestled close to her sister's side, sobbed quietly. As for Eleanor, she sat perfectly still, gazing with unseeing eyes into the streets.

The taxi had barely reached the door of General Trelawney's house when it opened. It might seem as though some one were waiting, listening.

"Hello, Peg, you've got back. Splendid!" It was the General's voice. "And you, too, Eleanor! Splendid! Run in, will you? I'll pay the man."

A minute later the General entered the house and saw Eleanor standing in the hall alone. He was an understanding man, and knew that what might appeal to Peggy, and for that matter was absolutely necessary to her, would be repugnant to his other girl. The two were entirely different. Peggy was impulsive, emotional, easily moved, quick to manifest her feelings. Eleanor, on the other hand, was outwardly cold. She dreaded scenes. She was not given to evidence her feelings.

For a few seconds the two stood looking at each other as if trying to read each the other's thoughts. The father saw that his eldest daughter's eyes were hard and defiant, even while they were yearning; saw that she was fighting a great battle, and that a wrong word on his part might do infinite harm.

"Eleanor, my dear," he said, "I am glad to see you. This is simply splendid! You have just come in time for supper, too."

Not a word of reproach, not a suggestion that she had come back as a disobedient child; only a glad welcome—just as though she had been away for a long holiday and had returned. She did not speak, she could not, but she seemed to be waiting for something. What neither of them could have told.

Then the General, scarcely knowing what he was doing, held out his arms, and the girl, almost as unconsciously, threw herself into them.

"Dad," she said, "it's awfully hard for you, but will you forgive me?"

"There, there," cried the father, "it's beautiful to see you home again, my dear. Ah, Alice, there you are. Eleanor's come just in time for supper."

It was all so natural, yet so wonderful. Instinctively she knew what her father felt, knew of the thoughts which were surging through his mind at that moment, realized the nightmare of the last few months, and yet he never hinted at it. He seemed to know by some wonderful wizardry what her feelings were; knew that she could not bear the words which might seem natural under the circumstances. And because she understood she felt as though a great healing power had passed over her. It was as though the thought of his love, although she felt more than ever her own wrong-doing, brought joy instead of reproach in her home-coming.

Yes, Peggy was right. Her father was wonderful, and she knew, as she had never known before, what a daughter's love meant. Somehow the crust which had encased her heart was broken, and the cold pride in which she had rather gloried was melted.

How it was she could not tell, but Eleanor felt like a new girl. For the first time in years she wanted some manifestation of affection, wanted to hear words of tenderness.

"But, Dad," she said, "you'll try to forgive me, won't you? And, oh, I do love you!" There was a catch in her voice as she spoke and the General felt the tears well into his eyes.

"But not as much as I love you, dear. Not half. But there, it's splendid to have you home."

A few minutes later Eleanor had recovered herself. She wondered how she could have so given way to her feelings, but she was not a bit ashamed of them. Some strange alchemy had been at work that had changed everything.

Then there was Eleanor's meeting with her brothers and Mary Penryn. Everything passed off in the most ordinary way. It might seem as though everything had been arranged beforehand, and the General had told his children what they were and were not to say. But this was not so. He simply knew how to lead the conversation into right channels, knew by a kind of instinct and intuition what words ought to be said.

Nevertheless, the joy of it all was beyond words. Instinctively the General's mind swept back to that first Sunday night after those long years of absence, and he realized what that night had meant in their lives. Realized the antagonism which existed, and how it had embittered the whole of the succeeding months, and must throw a dark shadow upon the future of all of them. But he said no word about it. Words would be worse than useless at such a time. What he felt may be guessed but cannot be described.

"For what we are about to receive, may the Lord make us truly thankful," repeated the General, as they sat down to supper.

Old-time words, repeated oftentimes without meaning, yet somehow each felt them to be something more than a mere matter of form as they passed his lips. The whole atmosphere of the place was that of thanksgiving and quiet joy.

"What do you think of Mary?" asked Trev, who sat next to her at the supper table. "Isn't she fine? I tell you I'm the luckiest beggar in the world. I shall be able to see her nearly every day now. You do like Mary, don't you?"

"Of course I do, Trev; she's a dear, sweet girl."

"I knew you'd say so," cried Trev, with all the fervor of a young lover. "I can't get over it, you know."

"Get over what?"

"What she should see in me. And, do you know, things are turning out splendidly, too. I was made captain during the war, and then afterwards I went down the scale and had to be contented with being lieutenant; but they are putting me back again."

"Back again? What do you mean?"

"I'm captain permanently now. Mary's mightily pleased, I can tell you, and as for her father—you must meet the Squire; he's just the bluff old chap that one reads about in stories. But he's nothing to Dad. Isn't Dad great? Do you know when I saw him first I was awfully proud of him, but—but—"

"I know," replied Eleanor.

Oh, how beautiful it was to be among her own people again, to breathe the atmosphere of refinement and understanding! She had felt afraid. All sorts of forebodings had filled her mind. More than once on her way to the house she was on the point of telling the driver to stop. But her father had made the difficult places easy. With his old-fashioned courtesy and his wonderful knowledge he had made everything so easy for her. She did not deserve it. She knew she did not deserve it, and while his kindness made her past disobedience harder for her to bear, she felt thankful for it.

There were only two awkward situations during the whole evening. One was when the clock was striking ten and she had declared that she must go back to St. Hildebrand's Mansions.

"Back to that place, my dear. But why?" asked the General. "Isn't your room ready? Alice, isn't Eleanor's room ready?"

"Certainly it is."

"Then, of course, you'll not go back," said the General, as though he took the matter for granted.

"But I must get to business to-morrow morning," she urged.

"Then go to business from here, my dear."

He took her position at Spurling and King's as a matter of course, and whatever he may have felt about it, he offered no opinion.

"Do you really want me to stay, Dad?" And she spoke to him in a husky voice.

"Want you to stay? Why, Eleanor!"

That was all, but it was enough; and Eleanor, although she felt everything differently from Peggy, realized that she was at home, and that the old foolish wicked past was as if it had never taken place.

The other awkward situation was when, shortly after ten o'clock, Rod Ravenscroft was ushered into the room where the family were sitting.

Eleanor had expected nothing of the sort, and so when, without warning of any sort, he stood before her she felt as though she could not speak.

Ravenscroft, who had not seen her at first, spoke to Mrs. Trelawney, then to the General, after which his eyes swept quickly around the room. Seeing Peggy, he moved towards her, but no sooner did he catch sight of Eleanor than he stood still as if not knowing what to do. For a moment an awkward silence prevailed, but the General, with that keen intuition which made him understand what ought to be done, spoke as naturally as if nothing had taken place.

"Yes, we're all glad to see you, Rod!" he cried. "It's the first time we have all met together since I left home, years ago. Isn't it lucky that Trev should be able to come home and find Eleanor and Peg here? I think you have met Miss Penryn? Yes, I see you have. A good job for you that you approve of his engagement. If you hadn't there would have been pistols for two and coffee for one to-morrow morning. Ah, Trev is a lucky young beggar! Splendid, isn't it?"

This speech of the General's gave the two girls time to recover themselves and enabled Ravenscroft to act naturally.

For the next hour laughter and good feeling abounded. Both the General and Mrs. Trelawney seemed to be as light-hearted as children, while from John's eyes a light shone which told how happy he was.

"By the way, John," said Ravenscroft, "I really called in about that patent of yours. It's all right. Nothing like it has been placed on the market, and the patent is as sound as a bell."

"Splendid," laughed the General. "What a good thing it is to have a friend who is a lawyer, and especially as he happens to be specializing in patent acts."

"It's going to be a great thing, General," said Ravenscroft. "Anyone to look at John wouldn't think he's got it in him, would they?"

At this there was general laughter, especially as the boy looked shy and confused.

HENRY FORD AND "COLLIER'S" STRAW BALLOTS

"Collier's Weekly" is conducting the first of the great straw votes for the Presidential nominee for next year. Out of 198,724 votes so far cast in their poll, Henry Ford has received 64,948, while President Harding has received 39,236. McAdoo comes highest of the strictly Democratic candidates with 15,667. Cox follows him with 13,182. Governor Smith of New York has received 10,623, and Underwood, the leading Southern candidate, has received only 3,049. Outside of the President, Senator Johnson leads the Republican nominees with 12,608, with Mr. Hughes a close second with 11,179. Hoover comes next with not quite 8,000 votes. The perpetual candidate, William Jennings Bryan, has disappeared as a possibility for the Presidential nomination. Out of the nearly 200,000 votes he only received 110. Ex-President Taft fares even worse. His total so far is 12. Before we take the ballot too seriously we should like to know more clearly the real attitude of "Collier's" itself. Is it trying to "groom" Mr. Ford for the Presidency. Whatever else Ford's antagonist, the "Chicago Tribune," proved, it showed Mr. Ford ignorant of a great many things pretty generally known. His ventures, apart from business, have not seemed inspired with any sound judgment. His "Dear-born Independent's" attack on the Jews has been thoroughly unhealthy propaganda. On the other hand, there is no doubt of the man's business force. He has succeeded in paying high wages and at the same time keeping prices low. He has given mass production for the benefit of the great public. A great many people do look at him as a wizard who might do all sorts of wonderful things to the public's benefit. The "Collier's" vote makes the talk of his running for President look more serious than it had before. According to his secretary, Mr. Ford is receiving two hundred letters a day in connection with his running for the Presidency. His secretary also says that Mr. Ford would consider seriously an offer of the nomination by any responsible persons or party.

THE BOK PEACE PRIZE

Last week Edward W. Bok, formerly editor of "The Ladies' Home Journal," announced that he would give a prize of $100,000 for the most practicable plan by which the United States may co-operate with other nations to achieve and to preserve world peace. The prize, to be known as the American Peace Award, will be given in two parts. The first, of $50,000, will be awarded for the idea itself; the second, of a like amount, will be given when its practicability is proved, either through its adoption by the United States Senate or by a sufficient popular response endorsing it. Mr. Bok has appointed a Policy Committee which will give out the conditions for the prize and appoint the jury for its award. The Policy Committee includes former Ambassador John W. Davis, Judge Learned Hand, President William H. Johnston of the International Association of Machinists, former Governor Nathan L. Miller of New York, Melville E. Stone, former general manager of the Associated Press, former Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, and the wives of Governor Pinchot, Ogden Reid, publisher of the "New York Tribune," Franklin D. Roosevelt and Frank A. Vanderlip. Mr. Bok's proposition, of course, has aroused a very great interest. As has been said by many shrewd commentators, the prize seems superfluous, since the League of Nations already exists and no greater step could be made toward the securing of the peace of the world than for the United States to become a member of the League. We are firmly convinced that sooner or later the United States will take that step, but in the meanwhile the discussion of other measures for a program of world peace is most valuable. It should result in the bringing forward of other projects which will aid toward the great end. The international no-more-war demonstration, which represents the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Women's Peace Society and the Women's Peace Union, has already submitted its plan to the Policy Committee. It proposes immediate steps be taken to outlaw war by making it illegal to prepare for, declare, or carry on war. It would amend the United States Constitution so as to deprive Congress of the power of appropriating funds for the use of war and to abolish the Army and Navy. It proposes an agreement with the peoples of other lands that war for any reason be declared a crime, as well as the use of armed force against subject peoples and in time of revolution. It further proposes that, once the United States Congress or the governing body of a foreign land has been deprived of the power of waging war, or in the event war has been declared a crime, peoples be organized in groups to refuse to support war, if funds should be appropriated or war declared despite the illegality of such acts. In order to put through this third proposal incessant education by pacifist organizations would be necessary throughout the world in order to build up the idea that war is a crime and that violence and bloodshed are always wrong in principle and disastrous in practice. E. Eugene Thompson, of Elmhurst, Long Island, has submitted another plan, that the United States virtually buy world peace by agreeing to cancel all indebtedness of foreign nations to her upon their solemn promise either to destroy or convert to peace-time use all the materials of warfare which they are now maintaining. His plan also would provide that we lend to other nations sums sufficient to restore to them some measure of their former prosperity under the condition that these countries disband their armies above a necessary minimum and scrap all naval equipment which cannot be put to peace purposes. Armies would be turned to internal police and navies would be only agents in furthering commercial expansion.

Foreign Correspondence

Progress in Austria

THE improvement of conditions in Austria is going on. The effect of the granted though not yet received League of Nations credit is obvious. The population itself is doing its best to save in order to rebuild the state. Though it is quite known over the world that nearly nobody in Austria earns a living, the population has saved from their insufficient wages and earnings so much that, since the stabilization of the krone, the deposits in the savings banks have been enhanced about six times in gold kronen. Now the same population looks for the $25,000,000 through which the United States has participated in the universal loan. This is all the more satisfactory since the United States is not a member of the League.

The improvement is to a large extent the work of the present State's Chancellor, Dr. Seipel, who strongly championed the cause of the country at Geneva. Seipel has worked constantly to get the political parties into one body. A test of his statesmanship and energy is an occurrence of some weeks ago. When he announced his intention to come to Rome he was given to understand by the Roman Curia that he had to make the first visit to the Pope. However, Dr. Seipel wanted to go to Rome in order to discuss the treaty of commerce with Mussolini and to settle some other political questions. To understand the situation one has to keep in mind that the Vatican had, since the establishment of the Triple Alliance, prevented the Emperor of Austria from going to Rome to see his ally there. Always obeying the Pope's demand, the Emperor forfeited the friendship of the King of Italy, so that the Triple Alliance never became a hearty one. Now Seipel, being a Catholic priest—he had been professor of moral theology at the Vienna University—seemed bound to obey his superior, but he had the courage to reply that it was not possible for him to take the way ordered by the Curia. Not willing to neglect the duty of his high office, he answered he felt it a difficult task for a Roman priest, indeed, to keep such a high state's position, and he would rather prefer to resign. But the way out was found. Dr. Seipel went to Rome and settled his affairs. Then he left the city for a day and after a visit to the cloister of Monte Casino came to Rome again and paid his visit to the Pope.

At any rate, the greater part of the population is enjoying Seipel's work, hoping not only for the reconstruction of Austria, but not less for the progress toward reconciliation. Just now he ordered the small militia stationed in Vienna to take part in the pageant on Corpus Christi Day at the Dome of St. Stephan. Although the left parties opposed when this order became public, there were no demonstrations during the celebration. Thus the first time in Austria's republican era a body of soldiers attended this ecclesiastical feast.

A sensational trial took place some weeks ago. It is the more interesting as an American author is involved. The former Minister-President, Dr. Hussarek, the last one of the imperial era, had written an article in the leading Catholic paper, "Die Reichspost," in which he criticizes, and that in a smashing way, Upton Sinclair's invectives against religion and the Church. As his criticism culminated in the word "scoundrel," which he applied to the author, Sinclair's lawyer sued Baron Hussarek for libel. In the trial Baron Hussarek pleaded not guilty because his critique was justified in face of Mr. Sinclair's statements that priests are robbing the pockets of church members. And to prove this fact a great deal of Upton Sinclair's book was read to the jury and reprinted in the daily press. But to make the sensation complete, Mr. Sinclair's lawyer produced as a witness Dr. Singer, editor of an important Viennese paper (Neues Wiener Tagblatt), who gave evidence of similar statements uttered by Dr. Hussarek himself with regard to the way the great monasteries had gained their riches. As a result Dr. Hussarek was fined a small sum. Party politicians have made use enough of this event and adherents of the National Socialist Party, called the Fylfolists ("Hakenkreuzler"), marched to Baron Hussarek's home to serenade him.

The Methodist Church had a Conference Week which is not without importance for certain public needs. There were two open assemblies. In one of them the Bishop of the European Methodist Church, Dr. Nuelsen, who had returned from a visit in Russia, lectured on the condition of the Russian Church. People crowded the concert hall and attentively listened to the most vivid description of the present situation in that country and received some hope that the worst stage seems to have been passed there. Another evening a mass meeting has been held in the Town Hall, where Dr. Melle, director of the Methodist College in Frankfurt, and Bishop Nuelsen spoke brilliant words in favor of the Anti-Saloon Movement. There exists a similar movement in Austria, the President of Austria, Dr. Hainisch, furthering it a good deal. However, there are regrettably grave obstacles. It was very significant that, when a congress for teetotalism was held in Vienna a month ago, only the Social Democratic Party had sent representatives to greet the assembly. The Christian Socialist Party did not officially promote the idea of abstinence because a good many of its members are saloon keepers and wine growers. You can find a strong opposition against the idea round the country, as I know from experience. When I once wandered through a district which is nearly without vineyards and in a peasant's home asked for a glass of milk for my boy the family was much astonished at the weakness of such a town-born child, since their own children drink perry and cider in their earliest years. There is much to be done, indeed, in this respect and every attempt to enlighten the population in regard to the perniciousness of alcoholic drinks must be welcomed. A good beginning has already been made. Considering that also in the United States prohibition has not come in a day, we hope the good result will also come in Austria. The churches, to be sure, did not give a firm declaration. But there are representative teetotalers among the Lutheran preachers and one of the most prominent churchmen took active part in the Anti-Saloon Conference.

Mary Magdalene

LUKE 8:1-3; MATT. 27:55, 56; JOHN 19:25; 20:1-18

"I have seen the Lord."—John 20:18.

MARY'S grateful devotion to Jesus led her beyond the discomfort and misunderstandings and criticisms in Galilee. It took her to Jerusalem and to Calvary. She experienced with Jesus the opposition of His enemies in all their passionate bitterness, with all that that involved for a sensitive woman. The second Gospel reference to Mary Magdalene is at the cross.

The disciples had fled. This woman who owed so much and was doing so much to repay—her courage did not fail. It had been won at great cost. It was worth the price. She and the other women risked everything and remained through our Lord's crucifixion. They accompanied His body to the tomb. After the Sabbath rest they came back to complete the preparation for the permanent burial.

How deeply she feels! Nothing left now but memories and a dead body! How gratefully and tenderly she had gone with that dead body to the tomb and had left it on the Friday night! How gratefully and tenderly she will do all that can be done on the Sunday morning. Nothing but a dead body, but how precious that body! It is now the only tangible reminder of her deliverer from the seven demons, of the teacher whose lips spoke words of life, of the benefactor whose sympathetic going about doing good brought priceless blessing to her and to many others. Now nothing but His lifeless body! Jesus had done everything for her. For the sake of Jesus she had made every sacrifice and known every satisfaction. What a privilege the last ministry to His body!

Imagine her dismay at the empty tomb. Her cry, "They have taken away my Lord," was a cry of anguish. Not even the dead body left! But the one who had learned new values in her own life through the Master, and who had learned new things about Him many times before as His disciple, was now to make one of the greatest discoveries God ever revealed to man.

Death is not the power she supposed. She and the disciples and the world supposed that death is stronger than life. She supposed that death had permanently taken her Lord, and that He is now only a dead body. She makes the great Easter discovery. He is more than the body He wore. Death has not taken Him. He still lives. Companionship with Him can go on. Discipleship is not over. "They have taken away my Lord" is soon changed to the cry of victory and joy, "I have seen the Lord."

Do not lose the significance of what took place in Mary's experience as suggested by the two exclamations, "They have taken away my Lord" and "I have seen the Lord." It is typical of the experience of all those who make new spiritual discoveries—of every stepping out into larger life and larger knowledge. Childhood's toys are everything until one discovers the joys of youth. Youth's satisfactions seem small when the larger responsibilities and opportunities of manhood and womanhood are revealed. The Lord of Mary's immature understanding and faith is taken away to make room for the larger, more spiritual and abiding Lord discovered at the resurrection.

Many people's ideas of Jesus are very like Mary's thought of Him as a dead body. Many Christians and most who are not Christians need to have their present ideas of Jesus taken away, and to be compelled to say, "They have taken away my Lord." Then they may be able to accept a truer and completer idea of Him, and to say with something of the Easter joy, "I have seen the Lord."

In such fashion Mary Magdalene becomes the pioneer discoverer of Christ's resurrection. Her discoverer's cry, "I have seen the Lord," comes to the other disciples. It seems to them too good to be true. They cannot believe it at first. But one by one and group by group they too make the resurrection discovery. They too see Jesus risen. The greatest marvel of history takes place. Their despair is changed to hope. Their fear is changed to courage. The frightened, despairing, scattered disciples come together again and go out courageously to win the world to Christ. They are sure that He is with them. They take Him to the others. Seven weeks later their contagious enthusiasm and victorious courage win three thousand. How rapidly the number grows! Every day are added those who are being saved.

A risen Lord over whom death can have no dominion has come again to those who loved and obeyed Him, and through the love and obedience of His growing Church is coming to ever wider circles. The world is more and more seeing the fulfilment of His promise, "If a man love Me, he will keep My word: and My Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him" (John 14:23), and, "All authority hath been given unto Me in heaven and on earth. Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28:18-20).

Do not forget that the first to make the great resurrection discovery, and to announce it to the others who disbelieved, was a woman, Mary Magdalene. Remember, too, that her limitation and disability had been so great that she is described as having been possessed of seven demons. She prepared herself for the larger service by rendering what service she could. That service meant for her sacrifice and discomfort, probably also ridicule and slander. It took her to the cross and to the tomb. It led her to doubt and despair. Just before she made her great discovery she thought everything was gone, and cried in saddest anguish, "They have

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Orthodoxy and Liberalism*

THIS book, by the assistant professor of New Testament literature and exegesis in Princeton Theological Seminary, is a serious and undoubtedly sincere attempt to draw a sharp distinction between what he calls "Christianity" and what he calls "Liberalism." It seems to the reviewer that he has in both cases described Christianity and Liberalism far too narrowly. He has identified Christianity with a purely book religion, declaring that Christianity makes its appeal "not merely and not even primarily through current experience, but through certain ancient books, the most recent of which was written some nineteen hundred years ago." In another place he says: "My Christian life within depends altogether upon the truth of the New Testament record." Liberalism is practically identified in his description with a certain type of Unitarianism, and he declares that it is "in essentials, only that same undefined type of religious aspiration which was in the world before Christianity came upon the scene." Between these two forms of religious belief Professor Machen believes that there must be continuous warfare. Indeed, he declares quite simply, "A separation between the two parties in the Church is the crying need of the hour"; and again, "involuntary organizations ought to be tolerant, but voluntary organizations, so far as the fundamental purpose of their existence is concerned, must be intolerant or else cease to exist."

Now it must not be assumed because of the unjustifiably narrow description both of Christianity and Liberalism that Professor Machen adopts that his book is without value. It has been to the present reviewer full of suggestion and has uttered many warnings which are greatly needed in the present day. There are, for example, some fine passages on the spiritual impoverishment of modern life, especially on the "limitation of the realm of freedom for the individual man." There is a fine tirade against the Lusk laws of New York State which it will do the heart of every liberty loving man good to read. And it seems to me that the phrase "materialistic paternalism" is rather a fine description of some of our modern sentimental conduct. And yet it does seem unreasonable to come to the following conclusion: "It cannot be denied that great men are few or non-existent, and that there has been a general contracting of the area of personal life. Material betterment has gone hand in hand with spiritual decline." Again there is a fine emphasis upon the importance of doctrine in the Church. Professor Machen would be astonished to find, I am sure, that most of the Liberals whom he so roundly denounces are tremendously occupied with doctrine, though not necessarily with the particular doctrine which he has rather arbitrarily picked out for emphasis. He seems to make an impossible distinction between the "Jesus of history" and the "Christ of experience." He draws rather an astonishing contrast between the conditions of discipleship in the days of Jesus' life and the life of to-day. "The plain fact is that Jesus of Nazareth died these nineteen hundred years ago. It was possible for the men of Galilee in the first century to trust Him, for to them He extended His aid. For them life's problem was easy; they needed only to push in through the crowd or to be lowered through some Capernaum roof and the long search was over. But we are separated by nineteen centuries from the One who alone could give us aid. How can we bridge the gulf of time that separates us from Jesus? . . . In that life we are spectators, not actors. . . . A Jewish teacher of the first century can never satisfy the longing of our souls." Professor Machen takes what seems to me a very mechanical view of the person of Christ, insisting on the old creedal statement that he is "God and man in two distinct natures and one person forever." After all, this is philosophy and not faith in a religious sense. To insist simply by declaration and reiteration that Jesus is "a supernatural Person" does not seem to me to carry any weight with it. Nor does it seem to me to have any real meaning to declare that "that religion which Jesus had was not Christianity," especially when on the next page he says, "Imitation of Him may extend, and must extend, to the sphere of religion as well as to that of ethics." As a matter of fact, liberalism does not deny "the redeeming work of Christ." But it does not limit that work to one aspect of one part of the earthly life of Jesus. It does not say "blood" when it means something else. It has no one particular phrase or cliché which it insists upon hearing in order to judge another man orthodox. Professor Machen brings a most unjust and untrue accusation when he says, "Against the doctrine of the cross they [the liberals] use every weapon of caricature and vilification." What we insist upon is that the work of redemption be accomplished in terms of life and character and not "applied to the individual Christian man" ab extra. We would like to know what is the distinction which Professor Machen draws between what he calls "an act of God" and "an act of man." A supernatural event Professor Machen describes as "one that takes place by the immediate as distinguished from the mediate power of God." That seems to most of us a purely theoretical distinction, and we would like to have pointed out to us an illustration of an act of God entirely apart from means. It is right here that Professor Machen's view of miracle seems so inadequate. To say that "the question concerning all miracles is simply the question of the acceptance or rejection of the Saviour that the New Testament presents is only to move the whole issue out of the field of reality into the field of dogmatic acceptance of authoritative statements. One may surely be permitted to question the detailed correctness of a report without impugning the motives of the reporter or denying the fact itself. But of course Professor Machen taken away my Lord." It was the darkness before the dawn. The dawn came when she could say, "I have seen the Lord."

Have you seen the Lord? Has your household seen the Lord? Have your friends seen the Lord? Have the business and social circles to which you belong seen the Lord? Does the nation and the international order see the Lord? How about the world of commerce and industry? Has it a clear vision of the Lord? Is it a dead Lord? A Lord of the past? Or is it a living, vital, present Lord, a really risen Lord? How can clear visions of a living, present Lord be secured? Mary Magdalene brings a message toward the satisfactory answer to these questions.

Those are seeing the present, living Lord today and seeing him ever more plainly, who are doing as she did. They are letting him remove their disabilities. They are allowing him to use them in spite of the limitations. Such relation to him often leads to doing things one does not feel fitted for, things that seem unsuited to one's station in life, things that go counter to the conventions of the social group in which one may be living, things that bring misunderstanding and sometimes abuse. It may lead to the cross, and to the losing of things counted most precious. It may lead to a change in one's ideas about Jesus himself. It probably will. But if one follows Jesus through it all, at whatever cost, it will be possible again and again to say and ever with new meaning, "I have seen the Lord," and to help others to see him too.

has a view of the Bible which does not permit of the acknowledgement of any error. "The account itself is true, the writers having been so preserved from error despite a full maintenance of their habits of thought and expression, that the resulting book is 'the infallible rule of faith and practice.'" He insists that it is doing despite both to the spirit of God and to Jesus himself "to regard the teaching of the Holy Spirit given through the apostles as at all inferior in authority to the teaching of Jesus." Professor Machen insists that our Lord himself seems to have held the high view of the Bible which the liberals reject; but has he forgotten the fact that the "Bible" of Jesus' day included certain books which are not now included in Our Bible. "Dependence upon the word of man would be slavish, but dependence upon God's word is life," says Professor Machen. But surely Professor Machen knows the history of the formation of the canon, and knows that there was for a long time in the early church a fringe of doubtfulness as to which books should be included and which excluded. Does his idea of inspiration extend also to the councils which finally determined what was to be included in the Bible and what was relegated to the Apocrypha or the writings of the Church Fathers?

Professor Machen has done, despite the rather narrowly dogmatic tone of his book, a real service to the church in drawing attention to the need of sound thinking (which is the real meaning of orthodoxy) in the present day and to the appalling growth of ignorance in the Church and to some instances of paganism in the Church in the name of Christianity. He does make a real case against those who like Marcion in the early Church would construct a mutilated gospel by going to the Bible with certain preconceived notions and rejecting all that does not precisely suit themselves. It must never be forgotten that no one generation and much more no one man ought to set himself up as the standard for all others. Our faith is an historic faith, but unless it finds itself progressively verified in human experience we must be obliged to admit that we can no longer accept it. As one who is greatly interested in the modern development of the Church and who believes that what we need is not warfare but a little more of the actual spirit of Jesus himself, we look forward not to a period of excessive preoccupation with questions of theology, especially those which lie in the realms of speculation, but to a period of increasing concern over the actual meaning of life which will carry us with an irresistible power to the teaching, the person, the work of Jesus Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I heartily appreciate the recent articles from the pen of Rev. Walter Spence on Evolution and Theology, and Evolution and Immortality. These articles are a fine representation of the viewpoint of the modern preacher who is trying to adjust himself to a rapidly changing world, and one in which Science has so large a place. What a deep spiritual satisfaction it is for men to see the creative activity of God manifested in the processes of life as these are revealed by the scientists! How much greater the power and purpose of a Divinity who acts not by mere caprice but in accordance with law. Those of us who have come to this larger view of the Christian Revelation may count ourselves happy and calm in the midst of a passing fundamentalist reaction which seeks the cover of dogmatic assertion, and through the emotion of fear comes to a distrust of God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Your excellent paper is performing an invaluable service in its fearless presentation of the findings of Christian men who have found their way through the mazes of theological speculation to a faith which, while still incomplete has at least the undergirding of rational thinking rather than fanatical assertion.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM J. VAUGHN.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

We have been using a motion picture machine in our church for some time with such marked success that my enthusiasm for this kind of entertainment and visual instruction knows no bounds. It might be of particular interest to pastors to know just how we introduced motion pictures in our church.

The first step taken in launching the movement was to bring the matter to the attention of the official board of our church and explain to them what I considered was an opportunity to serve the people of our community in more ways than one. I felt that our people had social as well as religious needs which we might seek to supply as far as possible and my idea was that with motion pictures of a better kind we could render better service.

From the first we began by putting on a regular weekly program which is varied from time to time. We usually use at least two reels that will appeal to the children. The children come in numbers from one to three hundred. As a rule we use about six to seven reels, sometimes many more. We have introduced special music on the pipe organ, special singing, stereopticon slides with songs, scenes, etc. We use these during the changing of the reels. We also have talks on various subjects of live interest. We believe in variety, so we carefully plan for a varied program.

The result—the attendance of men, women and children and their generous offerings (free will) more than justify the effort and expense. We use dramas, comedies, cartoons and pictures on geography, industry, science, history and religion.

Thursday night is known as Community Night at our church. We have just organized a men's club that will meet on the same night in the Social Room of the church and those who care to may attend the pictures and then return to the Social Room for various other social diversions.

We gave the Life of Moses to over three hundred and "The New Minister" to a crowd that taxed the seating capacity of our building.

I trust that these facts may be of interest, especially to those who are beginners.

PERSECUTED, BUT PERSISTING

That the Sunday school has enduring qualities is shown by the workers in the mountain town of Kessab, about thirty miles from ancient Antioch. Before the war this was one of the strongest centers for evangelical work in all of Turkey and North Syria. The Protestant Sunday school in Kessab had a membership of more than 2,000. Then came the Turks, who both desecrated and destroyed the buildings. Some were literally smashed and one was burned. This did not cause the faithful people to lose their faith or to give up their public worship. Just now the Sunday school is but a fragment of its former size for there are only fifty children left. The preacher is one of the Aintab boys who was, while in college, under the helpful influence of Rev. Stephen van R. Trowbridge, Sunday school secretary for Egypt. Urgent appeals for assistance have come to the World's Sunday School Association, whose headquarters is 216 Metropolitan Towers, New York City, from this and many other such schools.

The Scottish National Sunday School Union, which will be host to the Ninth Convention of the World's Sunday School Convention to be held in Glasgow June 18-26, 1924, is working to make the gathering a great success. Many plans are maturing, which will minister to the pleasure and comfort of the more than 4,000 delegates who will be in attendance from all parts of the earth. James Kelly, M.A., is Secretary of the Scottish Union and also is Secretary of the Glasgow Convention Committee. He is now making his second trip to the United States in the interest of the Glasgow Convention. His latest announcement is that H. R. H., Duke of York, K.T., has graciously consented to act as Patron of the convention of Sunday school workers, which will be held in Bonnie Scotland next June. In fixing the apportionment of delegates 2,000 have been assigned to North America. A tour bulletin and all information can be had by addressing the World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City.

THE CHURCH AND RECREATION

"The Church and Public Recreation" will be an important topic at the Recreation Congress, October 8-12, inclusive, to be held this year in Springfield, the state capital of Illinois, according to the announcement of the Playground and Recreation Association of America. Springfield has rich historical associations as the home and burial place of Abraham Lincoln. Here are to be seen his old house, the office where he practiced law and the seat in Sangamon County court house where he sat as legislator. In addition to the discussion concerning the church and recreation there will be addresses on many other topics, including home play, small town and open country recreation, athletics for girls and women, recreation for colored people, adult recreation, summer camps. It is expected that a special committee, of which Dr. J. H. McCurdy, president of the Y.M.C.A. College at Springfield, Mass., is chairman, will present a preliminary report on the study of summer camps now being made under the immediate direction of L. H. Weir. William E. Harmon, president of the William E. Harmon Real Estate Company and of the Harmon Foundation, will speak on the topic, "The Value of Parks and Playgrounds in Real Estate Development" and many other leaders in the play movement will give addresses.

TO ASSIST CHURCHES IN COMMUNITY WORK.

The Federal Council of Churches has lately added to its staff an additional secretary, to give special attention to the Community Relations of the church, Rev. Carl H. Barnett, former pastor of the Oak Cliff Christian Church, Dallas, Texas. Mr. Barnett has also held pastorates in North Madison, Conn., Rochester, N. Y., and Brazil, Ind. He had charge of religious work at Ellington Field, Houston, Texas, during the war. The purpose of the Council in this field is to give more effective assistance in developing the neighborhood and community work of local churches. The conviction is gaining that church buildings should be used more completely for the good of the community and that the churches have a great opportunity for service in the matter of the people's free hours during the day. Mr. Barnett will also act as executive for the reorganization of the Protestant work in county jails, which is soon to be undertaken. Rev. C. A. Brooks, city secretary of the Baptist Board of Home Missions, is chairman of the department of which Mr. Barnett will be secretary.

Centre College, Danville, Kentucky has become famous of recent years on account of its wonderful football team. It has just celebrated its one hundredth consecutive commencement, but its history stretches back to 1780. Its centenary commencement was also marked by the inauguration of its new president, Reverend R. Ames Montgomery, D.D., LL.D., formerly president of Parsons College, Fairfield, Iowa.

NEW YEAR BOOK OF THE CHURCHES

The 1923-24 Yearbook of the Churches is now in press. This volume, published by the Federal Council of the Churches, is such a valuable storehouse of information concerning the organization, work, membership and official personnel of all the denominations and all religious organizations that it has come to fill an indispensable place. It is edited by Rev. E. O. Watson, Secretary of the Washington Office of the Federal Council, Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

PEACE AT LAUSANNE

The Lausanne Conference at this writing is about to end with an agreement between Turkey and the European nations. Ismet Pasha has in reality won a series of victories for his country. One of the greatest of these is the abolition of the capitulations. The capitulations, as is now generally familiar, provided for a great number of special privileges for foreigners, such as right to trial in a consular court, according to the law of his own land. By the new treaty the Turks grant certain temporary special concessions to foreigners, but the essential point of the agreement is that in due time the foreigner shall have the same status in Turkey as the Turkish subject has in a foreign state. The treaty also provides for the evacuation of Constantinople by the Allied troops and the re-entry of Turkey into Europe. Foreign naval forces in the Dardanelles will be reduced to one warship for each of the great powers, thereby leaving no doubt of the new and independent position of Turkey. The treaty as drawn at first, recognized certain concessions which were granted by the Turks to foreigners before the war, but whose legal status was not thoroughly established. It also granted British and French interests preferential rights in future concessions. These provisions might have conflicted with the Chester concessions, now held by the Ottoman-American Development Company. Of course, we do not take too seriously the Turk's acquirement of western methods of government. For example, last month, the Turks held their elections for the new national assembly. Voting in Constantinople and elsewhere was in the mosques, which were decorated with flags and pictures of Ghazi (i.e., Conqueror). Mustapha Kemal Pasha. At election time many of the Greeks of Constantinople, making the best of the situation, shouted "Long live Mustapha Kemal," and the Greek Bishop made a moving speech in his behalf and called for three cheers for him. Such tragi-comic hypocrisy is typical of the Near East. Of the two hundred and ninety thousand voters in Constantinople, as estimated by one of the local papers, probably not more than twenty thousand actually voted, for the election was cut and dried. Nevertheless, Turkish publicity agents announced that ninety per cent. of the population had availed themselves of the voting privilege and that the Turkish delegation at Lausanne was taking a keen interest in the elections. Such reports are only for effect. But the new international status secured by Turkey is very significant. The whole East is on the way to greater independence since the war. That is partly due to the release of Russian pressure and partly also to the growing influence of the poorer classes in European countries, especially in Great Britain. Workers and the liberal intellectuals are not in sympathy with imperialism. Their point of view makes it impossible for European governments to secure the finances and military force necessary to continue their Eastern adventures in the old spirit. The new freedom which Persia enjoys, the Washington agreements in regard to China, the grants of a larger share of self-government in India and of nominal independence in Mesopotamia and Egypt, are all illustrations of the same tendency which appears so strikingly in the results at Lausanne.

THE AMERICAN TREATY WITH TURKEY

While the Turks and the Allies have been wrestling at Lausanne, we have been told from time to time that progress was being made in working out the new treaty between the United States and Turkey. So far our State Department has completely closed its ears to the appeal of the Federal Council and other organizations that we do not resume diplomatic relations with Turkey until that country has made some sort of reparation to the Armenians and has provided them with a safe national home. The State Department's answer to those who protest is that no information which it has received indicates that such a stand on our part would secure the desired result. The Administration is ready to refuse to recognize governments in Russia and in Mexico for years because the protection which they accord property does not suit us. According to reports from Lausanne our American observer there, Joseph C. Grew, has been very active, and very successful in getting rewritten sections of the treaty between Turkey and the Allies concerning foreign concessions. Is justice for the weak of so much less interest to the Administration than commercial interests? Will we refuse to take the hand of a robber but grasp that of a murderer and robber combined? Has the United States, which we are told on the highest administrative authority holds the moral leadership of the world, thrown over the cause of the Armenians just as completely as has that moral inferior, Europe? Why cannot we demand certain standards of justice in a government before recognizing it? It is not too late for the Administration to change its mind even now.

INTERNATIONAL LAW COLLEGE BEGINS AT THE HAGUE

In the course of the great war some one showed Mr. Carnegie a headline which read as follows: "Grass growing high in the deserted grounds of the Peace Palace." The fling at his idealism disturbed Mr. Carnegie for a moment, and then he answered: "They'll all come there yet." They are coming. The World Court, with a representative from all the nations of the world except America, is in session in the Peace Palace and fulfilling one of the functions that was nearest to Mr. Carnegie's ideal, i.e., the adjudication of international disputes. Now the cable brings the welcome news that another of the great rooms of the Palace has been opened and is housing the new Academy of International Law. This is another ideal that Mr. Carnegie cherished, i.e., that students from all over the world might come and study internationalism within the walls of the Court. The school evidently has opened with great success. Many students have come up from all the nations. It is interesting to note that the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace is financing the school. There has been a good deal of grumbling about the country to the effect that Mr. Cargie's endowment was not being used to much purpose during these last ten years. No criticism surely can be made of this endeavor, for not only will these students coming from all nations hear lectures from learned jurists and scholars from every land, but they themselves will be living together as citizens of the world of scholarship, forgetting for a while their national prejudices and the countries from which they came. It will be of inestimable benefit for these young men from different lands to live together for the summer months. The opening session of the college brought together a very distinguished group of men from all of Europe. All the judges of the World Court were present, as well as the diplomatic representatives of the different lands who are residing in Holland. Several representatives of the League of Nations were also there. Of course, there were many distinguished scholars from all countries, some of whom are to reside at The Hague during the summer and lecture before the college. The directing mind of this enterprise is Prof. James Brown Scott, the secretary of the Carnegie Endowment, and the inception of the school has been largely due to his efforts. The school not only fulfils the cherished ideals of Mr. Carnegie, but also it realizes one of the hopes and expectations of the Second Hague Conference. Perhaps the time will yet come when there will be a great international court at The Hague of which the Peace Palace will be the center, and where students from all over the world can come to study all subjects in which men are interested. It is also hoped that the exchange of opinions by the various scholars and jurists who will lecture before the school will be of help to all who are interested in international good-will.

THE TWELVE-HOUR DAY IN THE STEEL INDUSTRY

Just before he sailed for Alaska, President Harding announced that the leaders of the steel industry, acting as the American Iron and Steel Institute, had promised to eliminate the twelve-hour working day from their plants as soon as they had the necessary labor. Only a few days earlier the Research Department of the Federal Council of the Churches had brought out a bulletin on "The Twelve-Hour Day in the Steel Industry." Although the United States Steel Corporation, in answer to the President's declaration last year in favor of the elimination of the twelve-hour day, had declared that it was doing all it could to stop the custom, it has nevertheless kept a very considerable proportion of its men on the long day. Just how many we do not know. The last report of the American Iron and Steel Institute, given out at the end of May, did not publish the number. Judge Gary of the Steel Corporation says that the employment of three shifts of men on an eight-hour work day instead of two shifts, as at present, will increase the cost of steel. The experience of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, however does not bear out that statement. In order that the men might not lose too much in the way of wages, the Colorado company, when it gave up the twelve-hour day, raised hourly, tonnage and piece rates ten per cent. The president of the Colorado company testifies that the men were willing to accept that arrangement in order to shorten their day, although it meant a decrease in their pay. As a matter of fact, the men's work increased so much in efficiency that the change did not cause loss for the company. Other concerns have had similar experiences. Apparently, the Steel

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Institute, in reckoning the increase of cost due to shortening the working day, has not paid sufficient attention to the human factor. We might add that the Federal Council's Research Department has had difficulty in getting the co-operation of the Steel Corporation in making its report accurate. When the bulletin was presented to a high official of the corporation with the request that any inaccuracy be pointed out and that a statement of the manufacturers' side of the controversy be prepared for inclusion in the document, the official insisted that the corporation would submit criticism only if it would be printed without comment and without opportunity for the Research Department's representative to confer with the Steel Corporation's officials on disputed points. What an absurdity! Such an attitude certainly suggests that the Steel Corporation does not care to have the impartial truth made known. The Research Department has once more put in its debt all those who are interested in industrial problems.

INSTRUCTION IN HONORING CONSTITUTION OF UNITED STATES

When the Governor and the Legislature of New York disgraced themselves by repealing the State enforcement code for the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States the Superintendent of Schools of Sioux City, Iowa, M. G. Clark, immediately sent to every teacher in his schools a communication bidding them to include respect for the Eighteenth Amendment as one element in good citizenship. At the head of his circular he quoted Lincoln's words, "Let reverence for the law be breathed by every mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, seminaries and colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books and almanacs; let it be preached from pulpits and proclaimed in legislative halls and enforced in courts of justice." Superintendent Clark's letter ran in part as follows:

Not since the war of 1812 has any man dared to make a statement which was in any way comparable to the statements of Calhoun and Hayne. It has been left to the Governor of New York to put himself in their class and to place New York State, if it follows his leadership, in a class with South Carolina. Never since 1862 has the Constitution of the United States been questioned until the Governor of New York dared to stand before the world and to place his great State before the eyes of all the people as a State, in the year of 1923, refusing to acquiesce to the will of the people in the enforcement of the spirit of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Never since 1862 has anything occurred in the political and economic history of any State that should bring every citizen of the United States so quickly to his feet in the defense of the Constitution, the Nation and the flag as does this act of the Governor of the State of New York.

The issue is the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States. If the action of the Governor of New York can stand unchallenged, the Constitution of the United States is but a mere scrap of paper.

I am sending this circular post-haste to each teacher in Sioux City, before the close of the school year, because I feel that this challenge should go out to every boy and girl and the disgrace of New York should be placed in their eyes, exactly where it belongs.

Once before in the history of our country a man on the Hudson attempted to sell his nation to its enemy. For years the name of Benedict Arnold has been upon the lips of every American citizen as bearing the title of supreme disgrace in American history. Another man on the Hudson evidently would sell the Constitution of his country. Will New York State allow him to do so? This act should be brought to the attention of every public school child, that its real significance may be clearly understood and that we may teach to these children the supremacy and the sacredness of the Constitution of the United States.

Let us stand, salute the flag, and with this act of the Governor of New York State in our mind, let us repeat our oath of allegiance.

Other school superintendents might well follow Mr. Clark's example. We commend it to such organizations as the Constitution League and the American Legion. Here is an opportunity for them to serve the country anew with real patriotism.

THE ROMAN CATHOLICS AND INDUSTRIAL PROBLEMS

Ten years ago the Roman Catholics attempted to hold a Conference on Industrial problems. The attempt failed then, but this year, June 27 and June 28 their conference at Milwaukee was a very great success. Bishop Muldoon explained the difference by saying that in the last decade "labor unions and students interested in labor unions have obtained a certain degree of respectability." What was said at the Conference is just about what one would hear in a similar meeting among Protestants or in one without religious lines. Father Curran, of Wilkes-Barre, one of the men instrumental in effecting the settlement of the coal strike twenty years ago, declared that if employers would think first of the community at large, industrial wars would be at an end. Father Siedenburgh, discussing the religious elements in industry, said: "Religion demands, in the first place, justice, and whoever contributes to the solution of labor problems will on a large scale and by a mighty stroke further the cause of justice. . . . In a lesser degree religion demands charity to our neighbor and here the economically strong can assist the economically weak most effectively not by alms, but by a concern in their working conditions." The Roman Catholics are careful not to commit themselves to socialism. Father Ryan, the head of their National Welfare Council, defined their position as "a middle ground between Socialism and individualism." The Roman Catholic teaching, he said, "at tributes to the State the duty of protecting all natural rights and promoting the welfare of the whole community. It opposes Socialism because a Socialist state would be harmful for society. It opposes individualism because that political theory neither adequately protects individual rights nor adequately promotes the welfare of the weaker social classes." The Conference discussed the National Labor Union versus the local shop or individual union. In the course of the informal discussion, Professor John R. Commons of the University of Wisconsin, urged a law to compel employers to take care of unemployment through taxation. Rev. Joseph Husslein of the Order of Jesuits, expressed the opinion that the growth of the labor unions would in time bring about the undoing of the large financiers who have virtually controlled the most important industries. From both the workers' and the employers' side there was the suggestion that labor should be given part ownership in industries. John A. Voll, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, urged likewise that capital be allowed a fair return for its share of the business. Colonel P. H. Callahan, of Louisville, Kentucky, put it thus, "It is not hours, or wages, or conditions of labor which touch the worker deep down in his heart, but rather his status as a hired man. . . . For his future status it is required that the worker shall come to own at least, in part, the means by which alone he is enabled to live." Such a meeting makes us realize anew how much we hold in common with men of good-will in all fields. It is a pity that we are not brought into closer touch with each other.

THE HAMPTON INSTITUTE FARMERS' CONFERENCE

For a number of years now Hampton Institute has held a Farmers' Conference, attended by the colored farmers and home demonstration agents of thirty-one counties of Virginia, together with delegates from churches, community clubs and "co-advisory" boards, who are working to increase the co-operation of the Negro farmers with each other. As every one knows, the Negroes have been gradually acquiring more and more lands. To-day the Virginia Negroes own one million seven hundred thousand acres, exclusive of lots owned in the cities. The Negro farmers are beginning to work out a system of co-operative buying and selling. What co-operative marketing means in profits appears in the record of the Virginia tobacco crop last year. Although that crop was larger than in 1921, the Virginia farmers who shared in the co-operative marketing system received a better price per pound than they had the year before, although usually prices fall when there is an increase in the tobacco crop. The Virginia crop altogether brought forty million dollars in 1922. The year before it brought only nineteen million. Twenty-five hundred Virginia farmers likewise are co-operating in peanut growing. All this, of course, deeply interests the colored people. Negroes cannot get together now without discussing the immigration to the North. Ten thousand colored people have left Virginia within the last few months. A good many shrewd Negro leaders think their brothers are making a mistake in this movement. Thomas C. Walker, of Gloucester Court House, a colored lawyer-farmer and a graduate of Hampton, urged his fellow conferees, "We must teach Negro boys and girls that the migration must be stopped. Too many are leaving fields of diamonds. . . . We must tell young colored men to settle down and keep their feet on the soil." One of the greatest reasons why the Negro is dissatisfied in the South is lack of schooling. According to Mr. Walker himself, out of a school population of two hundred and forty-five thousand in Virginia, some sixty-five thousand colored children are not in school. The Negroes need good local schools and good teachers. When they have them the colored population will be better contented in their old homes. The Farmers' Conference is a good example of the work Hampton is always doing. It teaches to the leaders who attend such a conference the same lessons as it does to its own pupils—practical lessons of the value in good poultry and good stock, well selected seeds, sanitary toilets, labor-saving devices, homes that are tastefully and simply arranged without the spending of money which ought to go to other needs, clothes for the women that are appropriate and economical. At the same time it instills earnestness and conservation. We might well occasionally offer special thanksgiving for the many agencies of helpfulness which are quietly doing good work year by year.

IS THE COMMUNITY CHURCH SATISFACTORY?

The church which has the reputation of being the first Community Church in this country has recently connected itself with one of the great denominations. The pastor of the church explains the change in these terms. "We decided to make this a [denomination] church for a number of reasons, chief of which was the feeling which grew to be a positive assurance, that the spiritual life of the church would be greatly developed by the knowledge that it was organically related with a mighty work that was being carried on at home and abroad, by the organization to which it was vitally related. We knew that all the power of the [denominational] as a whole would in a very certain sense move in our direction; and that any educational and inspirational assistance we would need would be readily forthcoming. The Community Church was always feeling that it had just about all the work that it could do to look after itself, without taxing its powers with the burdens of others. The people here four years ago were faced with a big tax when they tried to raise three thousand as the budget for the year's activities. This year we are going to raise fifteen thousand; and the end is not yet. Of course the advocate of the community church will say that this could have been done under proper leadership, anyhow. Yes—but it wasn't; and it is now. Then the church has proved itself to be a far finer community church since its organic relation with the ——— Church than it ever was before, or had the immediate likelihood of being. Any church like this is compelled to be a community church in the best sense of that term. We are naturally delighted with the change." The testimony of one church, of course, may not be extremely significant. Perhaps those who have taken an opposite step can make an equally glowing report of its results. It would be interesting to hear the experiences of churches which have moved from the denominational status to the community status, or vice versa.

At the recent meeting of the National Council of the Boy Scouts of America, Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., gave a little glimpse of the great Theodore Roosevelt's training to his children. "When we were all little," he said, "it was before the days of scouting, but we had the principles that underly it in our family life. My father was our scout master. He took us on 'hikes' with him. We used to have point to point walks where we'd swim ponds, climb bluffs, get over, under or through anything that lay in our way. Then he would take us off camping together, as many as a dozen at a time, and we would spend the night on the end of some point jutting out into the sound and sleep soundly to the rustle of waves on the beach. Strict discipline was always kept, and woe to a selfish, whiny boy."

When Mr. Bryan came to New Jersey the other day to be present at his granddaughter's wedding, some one asked him if he thought the world was growing worse. Mr. Bryan took a pretty cheerful view. The World War, he said in effect, caused a lowering of morals, but they are returning now to the high standard which has made America the greatest nation on the face of the globe. America will soon again be looked up to as a God-fearing and a God-serving race.

Loyalties

CIVILIZATION is largely the expression of loyalties. The first loyalty is always to self. The barbarian thinks of self first and his progress toward civilization begins when he enlarges his loyalty, transferring it from self to the tribe of which he is a part. This tribe was generally an expansion of his own family, but his loyalty even to his family marked a step upward from loyalty to self. Just as there are customs and superstitions which persist in a civilization which has outgrown them, so this loyalty to self still persists and not infrequently one finds an individual living in the tribal or national civilization we have reached whose chief loyalty is to self, rather than to his tribe or country.

The advance from loyalty to the tribe to loyalty to the country was a step upward in civilization because the country or nation was generally a congeries of tribes. Thus an expansion in loyalty took place and hence came a new civilization. Wars still persisted, as they always will under any loyalty less than to all humanity, but they became wars between nations instead of wars between individuals or tribes, hence less frequent, although none the less sanguinary. This loyalty to the nation has sometimes centered in a person, generally a king or mighty warrior, or in an abstraction called the state, but so far in history it has never been superseded by any larger loyalty, except in the case of Christ, when the early Christians and the few martyrs in each generation put their loyalty to the Church, the super-state, the Kingdom of God, above that to the tribe or nation, although they have been few and generally persecuted in each generation. (And yet it is to be seriously asked if they are not the only true Christians.)

We are sure that one cannot sit down and read the gospels and epistles through with unprejudicial mind without soon becoming convinced that the essence of Christianity is loyalty. And it is not loyalty to one tribe or nation. This is never dwelt upon (indeed, Jesus seems even to infer that at times it is not even to family). It is an infinitely larger loyalty than the world has known. It is loyalty to Him, to all that He stands for, namely, the Kingdom, the community of all believers, to religion, to the Church Universal. This is on every page of gospel and epistle. Professor Josiah Royce sums up Christianity as loyalty to the "Blessed Community" first. The "Blessed Community" is the company of those who have attached themselves to Jesus Christ. He says this is Paul's fundamental gospel. The individual, says Professor Royce, finds his salvation through uniting himself to the community. The early Christians saw this and the first Christians "left all to follow Him." Their first loyalty was to Christ. As Professor Seeley pointed out in "Ecce Homo" fifty years ago, the core of Christianity is the transference of loyalty from the individual and state to the community. Christianity is simply "the enthusiasm of humanity," he said. The first Christians felt a closer kindred to their fellow Christians, no matter of what nationality, than they did to non-Christians of their own land. Practically all the Church fathers forbid Christians to take part in war. The reason is not primarily the inherent wickedness of slaughtering one's fellow men. (The Church fathers did not quite see that this time-honored and favorite sport of men was inherently wicked or cruel, any more than do most Christians to-day.) Their real reason was that Christians should not kill Christians. "We Christians, who in the past killed one another, do not now fight our enemies," says Justin Martyr. Christians belonged to the same household the world over. Their allegiance was to Christ and His Kingdom. Membership in the Christian family was the great thing. The Kingdom of Christ was their fatherland, any Christian their fellow countryman. They were citizens of a new state, "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all."

This idea of a loyalty extending beyond tribe, state or nation to the blessed community of all believers of all races, to humanity itself eventually, which is the burden of both Christ's and Paul's teaching, is the highest point of civilization yet reached, and marked the passage from the pre-Christian and anti-Christian philosophy of nationalism, with its necessary wars owing to conflicting patriotisms and loyalties, to the Christian doctrine of a universal, spiritual "super-state," or city of God, where men may still be citizens of a nation, but where their chief allegiance is to the King of this universal state, Christ, and their fellow citizens are the citizens of His Kingdom. As we said above, Christ's mission was to found such a state; to leave all and follow Him was His undeviating command; first loyalty to Him was His demand in every instance. Paul makes this new and larger loyalty to Christ and the new community his gospel; the fathers lived and practised it; it is in all our Christian hymns and classics; few Christians would deny it—(how can they?) and yet none of them practise it—except a few prophets and martyrs. Lord Hugh Cecil was absolutely right when he recently said, "So far as abstract assent goes, Christians are, I believe, absolutely unanimous in teaching that every disciple of Christ is bound to his brethren by a common tie of fraternity and a common allegiance to their Master, and these bonds are both more binding and more sacred than any national connection. The difficulty does not lie in the doctrine of Christians, but in their practise. No one disbelieves catholicism; but the conduct of very few is influenced by it." Rev. Richard Roberts has put this truth in even stronger words than these used by Lord Hugh Cecil. He says: "Despite its own domestic disunion, the Church is essentially a supranational society within which distinctions of race are irrelevant. The declensions of the Church from its catholicity is an old story into which we cannot enter. But if the New Testament view is to be retained, it is plainly contained in it that a British Christian should be sensible of closer kinship with a German Christian than with a Briton who is not a Christian. That this is not actually so is simply an additional piece of evidence of the modern Church's failure to realize all the implications of its basal principles. If the avowed Christians of Germany, Great Britain, Austria, France and Russia had been really conscious of their unity in Christ, and had declined to go forth to kill one another, there would have been no war." Here, then, we have the strange situation of millions of Christians acknowledging by the very act of being a Christian that their chief loyalty is to Christ, accepting a Book as supreme authority in their religious life whose whole message is, first, loyalty to the Kingdom of Heaven, and that all members of the household of faith are brothers and fellow citizens; singing hymns every Sunday about the Kingdom of Heaven, and pledging all they are and have to this super-national Kingdom; and yet everyone of them, with outstanding exceptions, really in their hearts loving some country or state more than they do Christ; considering, if they are Germans, any German non-Christian more of a brother than a member of Christ's fellowship in France or England; if Frenchman, a non-Christian Frenchman more of a brother than a Christian German, and so on. Our chief patriotism is for our nation and not for Christ's City of God. National patriotism is a much deeper instinct than allegiance to the community of Christian believers in eight out of ten Christians. Nationalism triumphs over religion in every time of crisis. Our loyalty to country is stronger than our loyalty to Christ. The vast majority of Christians in any country will support their country and even go to war for it if called to, regardless of the perhaps un-Christian character of the act. One of the newspapers which perhaps hundreds of thousands read without protest—"The Chicago Tribune"—declares this principle at the head of its columns, "My country—may she always be right—but my country right or wrong." "Right or wrong." This is a very blatant and bald declaration that patriotism has first loyalty, before Christ, the Church, or the Kingdom, or humanity, or even righteousness. But it is the present state of loyalty among nine-tenths of the Christians of the world.

There is no hope for the peace of the world until Christians rise above nationalism as their chief creed and substitute Christ's creed of the Kingdom, of humanity; until Christians make their first loyalty not to country but to Christ; until Christians' patriotism is primarily for the City of God, Jesus Christ established in the earth; until our dearest countryman is not necessarily one who happens to be born in the same land with us, but one who has made Christ's blessed community his home with us, because of mutual love and devotion to Him and His Kingdom. It ought to be more inconceivable that a Christian could bear arms against another Christian than that he could against a fellow countryman.

Just as we were writing these lines a very interesting little book by Dr. Lucius H. Bugbee, of Minneapolis, came into our hands—"Living Leaders Judged by Christian Standards." One of the chapters is devoted to a study of Gandhi. Gandhi has come in for praise from many Christians, and Dr. Bugbee recognizes his outstanding virtues. But he is perfectly right in pointing out that Gandhi falls short of the Christian ideal at its chief point, namely, its substitution of a universal society of believers, as claiming chief allegiance, for nationalism. Gandhi is an apostle of nationalism and cannot therefore be called Christian. Says Dr. Bugbee: "But Gandhi has not yet followed Jesus to the ultimate goal of the Master's teaching. He is thinking primarily in terms of India and of the freedom of his own race. Jesus is thinking in terms of all mankind and the freedom of every human soul. The world was in Christ's thought as it is not in the mind of any of our modern leaders. In His mission to humanity He rose above the bounds of race or clan or color. 'Who is my mother, my sister, my brother?' He said to those who called His attention to family obligations, and answered His own question by the statement, 'Whosoever doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, my sister, and my mother.' In Christianity there is no room for our narrow, national egotisms and our racial prejudices. Only in this universal brotherhood will we find the solution of all the trying and tangled situations of the present period of unrest. Pride of family, pride of race and patriotism, all of which have served their purposes as valuable and stimulating ideals, must ultimately give way to the Christian world brotherhood, and in proportion as Gandhi is really leading India toward this larger consciousness of human solidarity is he approximating the spirit of the Master, whose principles he has preached with such effectiveness."

Wanted---A Simple Creed

OUT of the midst of a civilization grown old and complex there is sometimes heard the demand for a simpler life. And it is a parallel and not unrelated phenomenon that, out of the midst of a religious life which has outlasted many centuries and become somewhat entangled with documents and institutions, there should also arise the demand for a simpler faith. Those who are set to teach Christianity can scarcely escape the appeal; it has come to us time and again during the last generation; and there are many reasons why we should listen to it. It comes from some who are transparently sincere, and who dread subtlety and complexity because they fear being entangled in insincerity. It comes from the young; and it is possible that on such a point the young may be wiser than the old, and it may be the wisdom of the old to listen to hearts not yet sophisticated and conventionalized. It comes—sometimes at least—from those who are far off: when the reason for their aloofness from Christian worship and fellowship is inquired into, it may be found that the Church and her teachers have made religion too difficult. This last form of the demand strangely moves the heart, perhaps because it sounds like the echo of an ancient cry, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him.

It may be necessary occasionally not only to listen to this demand for simplification, but even to support or stimulate it. For there is a relentless tendency towards complexity in the scheme of things—a tendency which may need to be resisted and counteracted. The evolution of life is an ordered progress from the simple to the complex. The story of civilization is largely the story of organization—the superimposing of complexity upon simplicity. It is small wonder, then, that religion, that Christianity itself, should develop in the same direction. Yet sometimes amid doctrinal complexities, ecclesiastical complexities, men remember the sweet and clear beginnings of the Galilean Gospel, and they ask that faith should once more be made plain and simple.

The request deserves an answer, and the answer ought to be partly warning and partly encouragement.

There is room for a word of caution here. It is well to make the message simple, but not well to give the impression that everything can be made simple, or that a complete scheme of thought and life can be provided in words of one syllable. To think that truth can always be made simple is one of our intellectual temptations. As a matter of experience, it is not so. What is the cure for cancer? There is no simple and obvious remedy waiting. What is the solution of our social distress? No cut-and-dried formula will charm our darkness into day. These things take hard thinking, long investigation, the best endeavors of the best minds; and, even so, we are only traveling, we have not arrived. The same elusiveness of truth besets us everywhere: the smallest fact of science or of life, if we only look at it closely enough, becomes itself a mystery, and lies on the edge of abysses too deep for our sounding. Why do men so persistently imagine that, while strenuous thinking is needed in every other department of knowledge, religion, which deals with the summed-up meaning of all things, can dispense with the travail of the mind?

There are two quarters from which the plea for simplicity in doctrine is specially likely to reach the modern preacher. Who does not know the good evangelical friend who implores him to proclaim “a simple Gospel”? Every true preacher wants, with all his heart, to do that; yet he may sometimes wonder whether his counselor ever has a glimpse of the sheer heights and depths which are opened up by the simplest and most familiar words of the Christian vocabulary—words such as God, sin, salvation, eternity, immortality. The same request may come in another form from some of the younger folk who, in asking that religion should be made simple, probably mean that they would like it to be untheological. It is not so easy as it may seem. Dr. Horton has suggested as the irreducible minimum of Christianity the counsel, “Be Christlike.” Here is simplicity indeed; yet dogmatic theology is waiting round the corner. Who was Christ, and why should we be Christlike? Was Christ more than a shipwrecked venturer? Is Christianity more than a sop for the under dog to keep him quiet and gentle while brute force takes its way and wins its kingdom? Such questions as these need to be answered if even so simple a counsel as “Be Christlike” is to hold the heart for any length of time. The simplicities and the profundities here, as elsewhere, are next-door neighbors.

Yet the plea for a simple faith may be met with a great and positive encouragement. We are encompassed with problems at every step, not in the religious realm alone, yet most of our problems have a practical end, and if we take hold of them there they do not altogether bar our progress. Many people are learning to “listen in” who could tell us little about wave-lengths or wireless mechanism—their experience is the justification of an experiment which they could not explain. And many souls who could not state to their own satisfaction the doctrine of the Trinity, nor give a philosophical defense of it to the world, have gazed upon Jesus Christ until they are sure that in Him the glory of the Divine and Eternal is risen upon them.

It is instructive in this connection to study the lives of God's saints, and notice how commonly they lived upon the simplest things: it was these that made them the men they were, not the curious controversies and side issues in which they sometimes found themselves entangled. Richard Baxter tells in the “Reliquiæ” how in his earlier days he was very fond of curiosities and subtleties—the mere twigs upon the tree of truth, he calls them. By and by, being older and wiser, he came in to the central stock of the tree: such things as the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, gave him most acceptable and plentiful matter for all his meditations. In this he might have spoken for many of the wisest and the greatest.

It is to such things that we also ever and again must return if we would nurture in ourselves, or in those who look to us for counsel, a fresh and simple faith. The Lord's Prayer—to take that alone from among the things that built up the soul of Richard Baxter, and that have built up the souls of the saints through the ages—is it not, when we begin to understand it, an intellectual equipment as well as a devotional aid? Those are right who have told us that the lex credendi is one with the lex orandi—that the things on which the soul leans in the secret place are the things worth believing, acting upon and defending when the great world with its temptations and hostilities surges near. That we have a Father in heaven: that His name is worth hallowing, and His kingdom worth seeking, and His will worth doing: that His providence is real, giving us our daily bread: that His grace is real, forgiving us our trespasses and keeping us from evil—here is enough to start the plain man on his career as a theologian. There will be any number of heights and depths which he still may search, and any number of problems on which to try his intellectual powers. But on the central things he who has reached this creed is wiser than the scholars. He has prayed himself into it, and there is no better way of learning how to believe and how to live.—The British Weekly.

Prince Caerani, the Italian Ambassador, said to the students at Yale the other day: “Italy has been brought to new life, not through the wisdom of the old statesmen, but by the impetuous daring and energy of youth.” Interesting, the way it looks to an Italian.

THE OBSERVER

The Primate of Denmark in America

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

I WONDER if my readers realize how large the number of Lutherans is in America? Not only are there the hundreds of thousands from Germany, but there are the large numbers from Sweden, Norway and Denmark. I do not know just how many hundred thousands there are of them, but it seemed to me as I went about these Scandinavian countries last year that every family had a son or daughter or some relative in America, and as I went up and down the Middle West last year that every other person I met was a Scandinavian. These Scandinavians are all Lutherans. In Sweden the Lutheran Church is the State Church. There is an Archbishop who holds practically the same relation to the crown that the Anglican Archbishop does to the State in England. In Sweden, too, they have the unbroken apostolic succession, so that there was not much difficulty in negotiating the terms of inter-communion with the Anglican Church, which was signed by the Swedish bishops while I was a guest in the Archbishop's palace at Upsala last year. In Norway the Church has bishops, but they do not maintain the same relation to the crown, and there is no Archbishop. There is a Primus, and it is the Primate of Denmark who is now in this country visiting the Danish churches. The Norwegian and Danish bishops do not claim the unbroken tactual succession, but they do claim the spiritual succession and believe it just as valid.

Bishop Ostenfeld is a noble, big, lovable man and my heart rejoiced when I learned he was to come to this country. I had learned to esteem him in Europe where he has been one of the leaders in all big things, in all work for reunion of the churches and for international good-will. He is big physically—six feet or so—with gray beard, benevolent face and magnetic personality. Everybody loves him. I met him first at The Hague, where a few of us foregathered while the Peace Conference was sitting in Paris. There he was exercising his kindly office in bringing the German and French pastors together for their first meeting. The meeting was full of embarrassment, and such men as Bishops Soderblom and Ostenfeld did much in acting as kindly mediators. Professor Amunsen, who has just been made the Bishop of Schleswig—now Danish territory—was also present. Again, the following year, I met Bishop Ostenfeld in Geneva and Beatenburg, where he was devoting his time to the problems of the united life and work of the churches and to reconciliation of the war-torn segments of Christ's Church. When we parted his last words were, "We shall welcome you to our house in Copenhagen next spring."

The welcome could not be given for two years, as I could not go to Scandinavia until the spring of 1922. But last April when I arrived at Copenhagen with my lectures for the University in my pocket there the Bishop was to welcome me. And such a welcome as it was! The Bishop had invited most of the clergy of Copenhagen with many University professors to meet me at luncheon at the Bishop's House, a noble old palace, full of Assyrian antiquities which some former bishop of antiquarian taste had brought together. The American Minister, Mr. Prince, was also there, and I have enjoyed few functions in Europe more than this gathering. Mrs. Ostenfeld sat beside the Bishop at luncheon, and I was fascinated by her face; it was exactly as though she had stepped out of one of those portraits of Danish queens and ladies one finds in all the Danish galleries. This was my introduction to Denmark, and what a happy one it was! Of course, I saw much of the Bishop during my stay, and the more I saw him, the more I admired him.

Last Monday night the Lutherans gave a farewell dinner to the Primate and Mrs. Ostenfeld at the Hotel Astor, and Dr. Morehead and I were asked to make the addresses of appreciation and farewell. It was a happy family gathering, almost everyone present being a Lutheran. The Bishop, when he arose to speak lifted the meeting out of the atmosphere of Lutheranism into that of the Church Universal. He said how much he had enjoyed visiting the Danish congregations in America. He had crossed the continent and had preached eighty times in seventy days. But he was used to big dioceses. He had the biggest see in Europe. Here everyone looked dazed, for Denmark is so small. But it includes all Greenland. He had been to Greenland, too, so he knew all his diocese now. He was glad to meet these Danish congregations. Soon they would all be talking English in their churches, and they were rapidly becoming American. For that he was glad, not sorry. He then dwelt upon the coming World Conference of Lutherans at Eisenach. He hoped and prayed that at that conference the Lutherans would take the great opportunity of emphasizing, not their distinctness from other Protestant groups, but their oneness with them, urging affiliation in spirit and co-operation in every way. Many theories of Lutheranism had grown up since Luther's day. He hoped that at Eisenach they would go back to the simplicity of Luther and claim fellowship with all communions which stood for a pure gospel mediated through the Bible and the sacraments. He thought a great opportunity had come for Lutheranism to do a big thing for unity among all denominations. This was the beautiful spirit that ran through all his address. I heard the same thing from the Lutherans of Denmark, from Archbishop Soderblom, whom I perhaps heard twenty times, from the leaders of the Church in Norway. Somehow I miss it in America. Why is it? The Lutherans are a great and wonderful body with superb traditions. They exercise a vast influence here. I wonder if I could, without offense, express the wish, just because of my admiration for them and my affection for so many of their leaders, that they might take this same great, broad attitude; come into the Federal Council with all their evangelical brethren; have inter-communion with their Protestant brethren of other communions as they do in Scandinavia. They have a great opportunity and should not let it go by.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Baccalaureate Sermon

By President James R. Angell of Yale University

A GREAT force has grown up in the world in the last century or two which was practically unknown to earlier history—a force with which we must learn to deal, a force which is molding our entire civilization. This force is modern science, with its amazing technique and its utterly unlimited possibilities. National ascendancy seems inevitably in store for those peoples who most persistently and intelligently pursue the development of this science. This is a fact which the more far-sighted nations sensed some years ago, and they have already begun to act upon it. In the sheer logic of events, this ascendancy will accrue to them, whether they wish it or not, provided they follow sanely and energetically scientific investigation and the application of scientific discovery, although how long such ascendancy may endure rests on many unpredictable circumstances.

It is a truism, now for years well recognized, that the commanding position which Germany had won for herself before the war was due to the work of her scientists, who had made her industry and her commerce more efficient than that of her rivals, and but for the grotesque political blunders of her rulers she would to-day be firmly intrenched in a position of international prestige which she might have enjoyed indefinitely.

It is not, however, simply because improved scientific methods permit commerce and industry to flourish that power and prestige flow to the nations which cultivate these methods. Nor is it merely because in time of war many of these refined industrial processes can be turned into means of military mastery. The case is far subtler and more complex than is suggested by any such conception.

(Dr. Angell then proceeded to point out the revolutionary changes in agriculture, forestry, animal husbandry, and the like, affecting the food supplies of men, rendering it possible for nations to achieve far greater independence than heretofore in the matter of their sheer sustenance. He commented upon the scientific contributions to public and personal health with a corresponding increase in the length of life and bodily and mental well-being. He also called attention to the radical changes in the control of man over space and time, concluding with the statement:)

All this means a revolution in human life no less profound for being in the main peaceful and gradual in its forward sweep. In all that concerns the physical side of life, and in much that affects its social fabric, modern science is entering to give new power, creating and supplying new demands and bringing to those nations that cultivate it new control over life, over nature and so over all the peoples of the earth.

There are many who see in all this the menace of a purely materialistic epoch, such as history has more than once experienced, with its foundations in a self-centered and discredited philosophy—wealth and luxury and mere physical comfort the aim of life and the standard of success. They carry over this fear into the realm of learning, where they look askance upon scientific and technical education as the corrupting source whence spring many of the evils they allege and dread. Against these dangers they urge the promotion of humanism, of classicism, of literature and art, of all those ameliorating influences which take the mind away from emphasis upon mere material possession and fix it upon the more enduring fruits of the spirit.

Now it is true that science, as such, is impersonal and non-moral. The same science which creates poison gases of unbelievable lethal power, invents protective devices to guard against the noxious effects of the poison and presently discovers yet other agents which create anesthesia under the most excruciating pain. Science is devil or angel, depending wholly upon the uses to which her achievements are put. She will heal or destroy with equal ease and without prejudice. Again it is true that science, despite the inspiring insight she gives into the secrets of nature—the illimitable reaches of the starry universe above, the even more marvelous universe within the molecule and the atom below—gives nothing directly comparable with those imperishable achievements of the human spirit which have come down to us in the literature and art of other times. The Greece of Homer has gone, but the deep undertones of the Iliad, the “surge and thunder of the Odyssey” still remain to rejoice the heart of man. The Athens of Pericles has perished, but the shard of the Parthenon endures and with it much of the beauty born in the soul of Phidias. The Empire of Alexander has passed, but reflective thought has touched no higher pinnacle than in his teacher, Aristotle, and his immediate predecessors, Socrates and Plato. Rome has vanished, but lex Romana is written into the basic law of every civilized state and the Latin tongue and the Latin literature have left their abiding impress upon the peoples of Western Europe. One need not multiply these familiar instances of the spiritual achievements of great peoples, nor pause to expound the divergent values represented in their accomplishments and those of modern science.

But it is quite as true, and must not for an instant be overlooked, that the great nations which gave birth to these superlative works of the human spirit fell into decay and were displaced by other less cultivated and less humanized peoples—and for a reason. Humanism as frequently and perhaps generally portrayed is not in itself a sure corrective of an over-materialistic trend in life. Quite the contrary may be true, as more than one example in history testifies. Humanism may be so conceived and cultivated as simply to offer a refined form of self-indulgence, a type of intellectual luxury, which may prove quite as relaxing, quite as fatal to the maintenance of a virile national fiber as any of the coarser and more obvious forms of material indulgence.

No, what is needed in season and out, if the national tone is to be kept high and pure, is devoted character, high moral purpose, essentially religious conviction. These are all qualities to be secured in their finest and most excellent form when based upon wide and deep cultivation, such as comes alone from intimate contact with the best which has been thought and felt and written. But robust, vigorous character requires far more than, and something far different from, mere appreciative acquaintance with great literature and great art. It implies devoted personal consecration to whatever task life has allotted to us. In a sense it is something very simple and very humble, but intrinsically it is the jewel of great price without which life loses all dignity and worth. We have heard something of late of the need of an aristocracy of intelligence. Surely we need quite as much an aristocracy of morals.

Surely, also it is incumbent upon the educated man to see and hold in just balance these great forces in the modern world. Science must and will be heard. Her methods are those of tireless pursuit of inexorable truth, and civilization already so widely fashioned by her hand is sure to be still further molded by the same influence. Only the ignorant can hold her in contempt. Nevertheless, taken alone, she inevitably presents a view of life somewhat distorted and out of focus, for there are other truths than hers to which she is at times blind or indifferent. And here it is that a balanced view of life demands that we give due weight to all the arts, to history, and to letters. Whoever scoffs at these but marks himself uncultured, undeveloped, in some degree uneducated. But most of all is it needful for the educated man to think clearly and to the end upon the place in life of moral and religious ideals and convictions.

That fundamentally religion is incompatible with science and with culture is one of those falsehoods which flourish in the shallow soil of ignorance and prejudice. True it is, that probably every religion has entertained one or more doctrines at variance with proved scientific fact, and such doctrines are bound in time to disappear. But after science has said her final word and after we have chosen whatsoever philosophy we will, whether constructive and affirmative or agnostic, there remain the ineluctable distinctions between right and wrong, truth and error, good and evil. Remains also man's conscience and his irrepressible aspirations for a higher and a purer life. Most important, perhaps, of all remains the enigma for which science has no answer—nor expects any—whence came our universe with its staggering realities of matter and spirit, and whither is it bound? What is its essential meaning? These are regions in which faith and hope and fearless resolution are our only guides. And so long as these things are true, men will turn to religious faith to light afresh the torch of courage and high purpose.

The troubles from which the peoples of the earth are suffering today may be partially alleviated by the help of science. The miseries of hunger, disease and poverty can, to a large extent, be thus relieved or prevented. Other ills arising from prejudice and ignorance may be banished by education and that freeing of the spirit which comes from contact with humane studies and with cultural influences of every kind. But the most menacing dangers are those which derive from sheer moral and religious defects, from innate human selfishness and greed, from inability to see and accept the truth that only when justice prevails among men can enduring peace and prosperity be established. Let us therefore welcome every reasonable device, such as the proposed World Court, which promises to make it more difficult for evil-minded men to throw nations into armed conflict. But let us not for a moment forget that to render the operation of these devices in any lasting way successful the soul of the individual man must be brought into honest accord with the words of the prophet when he said, "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

And this is the old-new vision which our time so sorely needs. If at bottom men are not really imbued with a spirit of kindness and generosity, with a real desire to give justice as well as to receive it, we shall make no enduring progress. The needs of the individual and of the nations are in this matter one. Unless the vision of a world redeemed by love and mercy and the spirit of justice can be brought home to men and be made irresistibly appealing by those of our generation, the future of mankind is dark indeed. It is doubtful whether there was ever more hatred in the world, more cynicism and blatant unbelief, more unbridled greed. To stem this tide arising from the old animal deeps of human nature, nothing can avail but the purging spirit of the Almighty. Perhaps some great religious leader will arise among us to stir again a response to higher conceptions and nobler purposes. But in the meantime it is the solemn duty of all of us—and particularly of you young men, the beneficiaries of high privilege, who are going out to your first serious encounter with a cynical and disillusioned world—it is the duty of all of us, I repeat, to cast our whole moral strength into the scales on the side of sanity, of self-control, of good-will among men, of return to vital belief in the eternal verities of the moral and religious universe.

At Helena, Montana, the President discussed the place of women in the present generation. The President, himself, would be glad if the way could be found to maintain the traditional relations of father, mother, children and home, but he does not expect that that will be possible. On the contrary, he reckons that more and more the education and training of children will be taken from the home. He did recognize, however, that the home will have to continue to be responsible for the religious training of the children. To quote: "In the home must still be performed the duty of instilling into the child those fundamental concepts of religion and of faith which are essential to rightly shaping the character of citizens, and therefore of the nation. It would be an irreparable mistake if in surrendering to society a larger responsibility for the child's intellectual and physical well-being we should forget the necessity for proper religious training. That duty must be performed in the home; it will always be peculiarly the duty of a mother." In his attitude toward the home the President follows the popular current of thinking, taking it for granted that we must accept the particular swing of the day. If the President believes in the older type of home, would that he had urged the American people to work for its restoration. We must so alter our ideals and our social adjustments that the old sort of home and home relationships will revive again, if we honestly believe that it was a better institution than that toward which we are now tending. We want the Kingdom of God on earth. As a matter of fact, is it not more conducive to that Kingdom that women should spend their time training their children at home instead of working in factories, or pursuing careers, or playing cards and visiting the movies. We need homes where the children shall be brought up in self-control, with a strong sense of duty, unselfishness and recognizing what things are worth living for. It is people with these qualities who will build up a society of justice and of honest, brotherly kindness. Let us try to develop all the means that will produce them.

Relief for European Protestantism

By Rev. Adolf Keller, D.D., LL.D.

Secretary of the European Central Office for Relief to Evangelical Churches, Zurich

DURING my journey through America I was frequently greeted by compatriots. The other day a man asked me if I knew his mother in Zurich. I knew her and had to tell him that his mother was seriously sick. It was rather surprising that a son should not know that his mother was ill. I think often of this little incident when I see that the American churches do not realize how sick, how seriously menaced some of their European mother churches are and that European Protestantism in many parts is fighting hard for its existence. There has been no more serious hour for many of these churches since the Reformation.

There is a saying over in Europe that from the military standpoint France has won the war; from the political standpoint, Great Britain; from the economic, America; from the cultural, the Jews; from the racial, the Slav; and from the religious point of view, the Roman Catholic Church has won it. That would mean, in fact at least for a great part of the Continent, that Protestantism has lost the war.

There is no doubt that, except perhaps in Czechoslovakia, nearly everywhere there has been a tremendous increase in the power and influence of the Roman Catholic Church. The Pope has sent his ambassadors into almost all countries. The question of the return of the Jesuits into countries where they were excluded hitherto is afresh discussed. Just now one of the oldest evangelical churches in Riga, Latvia, the Takobi Kirche, where the gospel has been preached since 1522, is to be turned over to the Roman Catholic bishop. The Roman Catholic Church has the advantage of her strong centralization and commends herself by its conservative principle as a bulwark against all disintegrating forces which are at work.

On the other hand, Protestantism is divided and helplessly individualistic. Coleridge once said: "I belong to that holy apostolic and infallible church of which at the present time I am the only member." A good deal of Protestant de-nominalism resembles, in a larger scale, this exaggerated individualism. Thus until recently there was nearly no cohesion, or at least no co-operation or federation among the evangelical churches of Europe. It is the present need which has brought them closer together. Last year, at the instigation of the Federal Council of Churches in America, the first Protestant convention of Europe was held in Copenhagen in order to consider together and with American representatives the present condition of European Protestantism as a whole, and more especially the need of so many churches and evangelical institutions.

In fourteen European countries the Protestant churches and their works can no more continue their activities without foreign help. A number of churches and church buildings in France, Galicia and Latvia are still in ruins or in a seriously damaged condition.

Many of the evangelical institutions, such as homes, orphan houses, deaconesses houses (as for instance Kaiserswerth, which was so inspiring for Florence Nightingale), asylums, hospitals, etc., are menaced not only by general lack of funds, but some of them, as for instance the wonderful deaconess house and hospital in Posen; also by all kinds of governmental administrative measures of a Catholic state. All these institutions are more or less independent of the Church and were undertaken by private Christian men or societies who are now financially too weak to support them any longer.

Just before leaving Europe I received from Dutch and Swiss friends very alarming news about the distress of evangelical pastors in Saxony, Brunswick, and also in parts of Austria and Czechoslovakia. In Saxony out of fifteen hundred pastors only one hundred can live on the salaries which the parish is able to give them. Many try to earn a sufficient living by going as clerks into banks and offices or even into mills.

In some countries, such as Austria, Poland and Rumania, the chief anxiety is for the preservation of the evangelical schools. According to a statement of Dr. Beach of Princeton the future existence of the evangelical minorities in these countries depends mainly on the maintenance of these schools.

The religious press in some of these countries is rapidly disappearing. In one of them three hundred church periodicals have ceased to appear during the last five months. To buy books or even to subscribe to a theological review has become impossible for thousands of pastors and students, even for many university instructors.

Evangelical minorities in certain countries are not persecuted in their religious life, but they are hit by land legislation which reduces them and their institutions to helpless poverty, and by language laws.

The lot of the children in large cities is still heart-rending. Most of them are undernourished and a great part menaced by tuberculosis. When we looked at the size of the thousands of children who were invited for holidays to Switzerland, the Scandinavian countries and Holland from cities as Vienna, Munich, Hamburg, Berlin and Budapest we underestimated their ages by four or five years. They had remained small because of undernourishment.

Of course, this distress is only a part of the general need of the people, especially of the middle class. And this middle class is vanishing—a social fact of far-reaching importance. There is in secret a great and silent dying in the middle class and suicide has become frequent.

In the seventeenth century Protestantism in many parts of Europe was reduced and weakened by drastic political measures, "dragonades" and all kinds of persecution. Today hunger and abandonment have quite silently the same effect.

It is true that need also brings forth out of the hearts a new life, a heroism of faith unknown in times of prosperity. A mighty effort to evangelize the masses is made in many of these churches. New hopeful movements in Czechoslovakia, Austria and Jugoslavia are in full swing and a heroic struggle is stimulated by the very need and deep humiliation out of which the cry for God is born. But nevertheless it must be said that, taken as a whole, European Protestantism is in a defensive attitude and the churches of the neutral countries which are not suffering are deeply concerned about the future of many of these churches and their works.

The churches of the neutral countries on the continent help the suffering sister church to their utmost and support by their sympathy the faith of their fellow Christians. They have raised during the last six months in Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland about $200,000 for such relief. And some of the British churches have given considerable help, especially the United Free Church of Scotland. But the task is too big for them. On the Continent the five helping countries with about fifteen millions of Protestant souls are confronted with the need in fourteen countries with about fifty millions of Protestant souls.

They look, therefore, towards America for help and co-operation. America came into European affairs on the battlefield. It launched a great constructive program of international co-operation—and then fell silent. This silence is ruinous for Europe. We know, of course, what many of the American churches have done in their wonderful relief works. But denominational relief restricted to the sister churches of the same faith is insufficient to-day to meet the need of European Protestantism as a whole. Unless denominational relief works are undertaken in a very broad sense and constant co-operation is secured there would be great inequality in the distribution of gifts, constant overlapping, injustice and bitterness, and even camouflage is not excluded. What is needed now is a larger vision of a common evangelical cause, a formation of a deeper and wider feeling of Protestant responsibility, and a real co-operation in a spirit of unselfish sacrifice and service. The helping European churches have been taught by the present need to grant their help from an interdenominational, common Protestant standpoint because the common evangelical cause is at stake now. They would be glad if the American churches would accept their advice and information in this regard, because they have a thorough knowledge of European conditions.

The European Central Office for Relief in Zurich, ratified by nearly all evangelical churches of Europe, has been established to a large extent with the help of the American churches as a nucleus of the desirable co-operation of the religious forces of Europe, and as a center of practical connection in relief work between European and American Protestantism. It is not intended to replace the existing denominational relief work, but to serve them as a clearing house and a center of information. Its suggestions are that relief to European suffering Protestantism should become a common task for years; that the single churches, especially those which did not hitherto grant any help, should assume their part of responsibility; that beside the help to be granted in the budget, a Sunday of brotherly love should be appointed, whose offerings should be determined for this relief, and that also by individuals as in Europe, an extra effort should be made to save innumerable evangelical institutions and to strengthen the churches in their activities.

The Greek Patriarch of Constantinople, Meletios, has left that city in order to help improve relations between Greece and Turkey. Meletios, who is known to many of us in America, is an able and broad-minded man. He showed a disposition to co-operate with the evangelical churches that would have been unbelievable to those who knew the East twenty-five years ago. But whether through his own wish or not, the Patriarchate at Constantinople has been a center of political intrigue. According to the general opinion, ex-Premier Venizelos himself has urged the Patriarch to resign in order that he might not continue to be a thorn in the side of Turkey. Meletios, however, has not resigned, but has retired to a monastery on Mount Athos. If he does not resign the Greek Church will resort to some device or other by which to appoint his successor. The Turks, as is well known, have wanted to abolish the Patriarchate at Constantinople, but Christendom may well protest against such a break with history. The Patriarchate of Constantinople shared with the Bishopric of Rome the leadership of organized Christianity for more than a thousand years.

Notable Remarks: President Harding at Salt Lake City: "A nation of inconsiderate spenders is never secure." And again: "The coming of extravagance and profligacy in private life and wastefulness and excesses in public life ever proclaim the failures which history has recorded."

President Harding at Idaho Falls: "If we were to live up to God's idea, we would do all in our power to bring about the victories of peace." Why not try to make a beginning by applying God's idea in the Near East

Is Religion an Opiate?

By Rev. Samuel Zane Batten, D.D.

IN the current news we find some items that challenge consideration. From Russia come statements showing that a bitter hostility to the Church has developed in many quarters. In the cities placards are displayed bearing the words of Karl Marx, "Religion is an opium." In a recent article in "Current History" we are told how atheism is engulfing German youth. We are told how school children in Berlin parade the streets carrying banners inscribed, "Down with the God superstition; religion is an opiate!" Anyone who has ever attended a meeting of radicals in England or America has met this same phrase. What does it mean?

The corruption of the best is the worst evil. That saying has many applications, but its clearest illustration is in the realm of religion. Religion, we are ready to believe, represents the highest values in life and the supremest concern of mankind. This is so, for the reason that it embodies man's reading of the meaning of the world and his conception of the nature of God. At its best it represents men's highest conception of goodness and the clearest expression of moral values.

But there are downward possibilities in everything human, and unfortunately religion has often slipped down the scale and has represented some of the worst things in life. It has fallen into the hands of small men who have reduced everything to their own small dimensions. Religion has suffered much from the wrong thinking of bad men; but it has suffered much more from the small thinking of good men. This is not all, but it has sometimes fallen into the hands of designing men who have exploited it for their own advantage and have made it an instrument of human oppression. Kings and autocrats have used it to uphold their prerogatives and to keep the people cowed. And so from one cause and another religion, which should have represented the best things in life, has represented some of the worst things.

In many lands to-day there is apparent a critical attitude toward both the Christian Church and the Christian religion. In some cases it is a criticism of Christians for their imperfect apprehension of the Gospel and their still more imperfect obedience to its plain behests. In many cases it appears as a bitter hostility to the churches, with the feeling that they have misrepresented Christianity and have become the strongholds of reaction and privilege. It is easy for churchmen to resent all this and to say that the criticism is unfair. It is even more common for men to say that these complaints have been heard before and so have little meaning. It is not strange, therefore, that we should find many church people making light of all this criticism and falling back upon the conviction that the Church is divine and the gates of hell cannot prevail against it. The wiser policy is for the Church to heed this criticism and to see whether there is any just ground for it.

It does not require an extended knowledge of history or of life to see that there is some basis for this criticism. It is not possible to go into detail, but a few illustrations may be given. These show that religion has been perverted and has been used as an opiate.

The eighteenth century in France was a time of outward splendor. There was a magnificent court with its glory and show. But as every one knows it was a time of social injustice and universal oppression. Carlyle in his vivid way has pictured conditions for us, so we need spend no time on this subject. The thing that concerns us here is this: State and Church were closely allied and each was used to uphold the other. When the government was attacked the Church rallied to its defense. When the Church was ridiculed the State shared in the criticism. "On the one side," says Fairbairn, "men defended the political order that they might save the ecclesiastical; on the other men assailed the ecclesiastical, which was the more vulnerable, that they might reach the political. The supreme calamity of French Catholicism, or rather the crime which no later sufferings can ever atone for, was its alliance with king and court." (Fairbairn, "Religion in History and in Modern Life," page 26.) It came about that religion was associated in the minds of men with injustice and tyranny. It came about that king and court relied upon the Church to repress criticism and keep the people submissive. The overturning came in due time, and religion suffered along with the court.

We have a striking illustration of this misuse of religion in England during the first half of the nineteenth century. It was a time of industrial development, and this affected every department of life. Trade was expanding. Great fortunes were made. Millions of people, men, women and children, were employed in mills, mines and factories. It is impossible for us of to-day to conceive of the conditions that existed there and were accepted as a matter of course. But unforgettable pictures are to be found in De Gibbins book, "Industry in England," in "The Nineteenth Century" by Mackenzie, in "The Life and Labors of the Seventh Earl of Shaftsbury" and in "The Town Laborer" by Hammond.

The wrongs of the people were so sore and so apparent that it would seem no one with a human heart could be unmoved. But we find the strange and anomalous thing of a church silent or acquiescent in face of this wrong. Few men loved the Church more truly than the Earl of Shaftsbury; few men have labored more unselfishly in behalf of the weak. Yet again and again in his diary we meet such items as this: "I find that evangelical religionists are not those on whom I can rely. The factory question and every question for what is called 'humanity' received as much support from 'men of the world' as from the men who say they will have nothing to do with it." Again and again we have such items as this: "Sinners are with me; saints are against me. Strange contradiction of human nature."

This is not all, but the authority of religion was used to keep the people submissive. Hannah More can hardly be regarded as an authoritative interpreter of Christianity; yet her writings had a remarkable vogue in her day. In her books she gives striking pictures of the misery of the people. But there is never a word of protest against these inhuman conditions; never a word is spoken to those who were

Gentle Waifs

IT is difficult to describe adequately the plight of the Russian refugee orphans who, as told briefly in a special appeal in last week's issue of "The Christian Work," have been turned into the street because the building in which their orphanage was housed had been bought by certain men ostensibly for use as a Jewish school. The children are the little sons and daughters of what was called the upper classes of monarchist Russia. The fathers of most of them were army officers who were killed either in the war against Germany or in the later battles against communist revolutionists.

Because they were the widows of army officers the mothers of the children were hunted down by revolutionists with tigerish ferocity. So, the mothers changed their names, disguised their identity as far as possible, and fled by night toward the barren shelter of an alien land across the frontier. Only the children, and, perhaps, a few yards of old lace and a handful of jewels, were carried on this panic flight to safety.

Not all who fled from their ancestral lands and homes lived to reach the frontier. It is estimated that half of the refugees who fled from the fury and hatred of revolutionists died of starvation and exposure on the way. It was a stupendous tragedy, the story of which has not yet been told.

Safe in an alien land the widows and orphans took up the problem of human existence with brave hearts. The few yards of old lace and the handful of jewels were sold, a little at a time, for money with which to buy food. Always it was the mother who went without when there was not enough food for all. Always it was the little children who had food when there was any food at all. Those heroic mothers—daughters of long lines of gentlefolk—starved that their little sons and daughters might live.

HAD BEEN FED ONE

The inevitable result overtook these brave souls. They died, one by one, of hunger and broken hearts, leaving their little children alone and helpless in an alien land.

Even in the depths of indescribable poverty and despair the surviving refugees gathered a turnip from others—so that the children might have one bowl of soup a day. Sometimes the soup might be rather thin, perhaps; but, it never failed to be there.

I will not say that the little orphans grew excessively fat on this diet; but, at least they had enough to keep them in good health and in strength sufficient to enable them to romp up and down the corridor of the gloomy building in which they were housed. To this much I can testify, because I saw these children at intervals during all of last Winter. They were well cared for and as contented and happy as motherless children can be. Now calamity has swooped down upon them and turned them into the street.

In the emergency appeal last week I asked for a special fund with which to gather up these homeless waifs and place them in a new home which should be called "The Christian Work" Orphanage. I emphasize now the urgency of the call.

One does not like to think of the fate of the little girls among these homeless waifs should they, through stress of hunger and need of shelter, fall into the hands of unworthy or wicked persons. At the least these gently-bred children are at the mercy of cold, rainy, foggy Summer weather. It is not a pleasant climate. Anne Louise Howard, who bore the rigors of the short Winter days without complaint, has written to say that she would be better pleased if the Summer weather were as good as the Winter weather. Delicately-reared children exposed to cold rains and fogs succumb quickly to colds, influenza and pneumonia.

We of America have fed the peasant children of Bolshevist Russia at a cost of scores of millions of dollars, while the children of the exiled nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia have been left to starve. Our defense—if we have a defense—is that we did not know of the plight of the refugees. Now that the readers of "The Christian Work" do know—at least of the plight of these homeless orphans—I shall hope to make "The Christian Work" Orphanage a bright and shining reality immediately.

in large part responsible for these wrongs. Instead, she brings the consolations of religion to the overdriven and miserable people. She assures them that there is a land where toil shall cease and the weary are at rest. In the same way we find Wilberforce and Paley, along with many others, using the power of religion to keep the people submissive. Wilberforce shows how Christianity teaches men to be diligent and patient; he reminds the poor "that their more lowly path has been allotted to them by God; that it is their part faithfully to discharge its duties and contentedly to bear its inconveniences; . . . and finally that all human distinctions will soon be done away, and the true followers of Christ will all, as children of the same Father, be alike admitted to the possession of the heavenly inheritance." (Quoted by Hammond, "The Town Laborer," page 232.) In the name of religion men accepted a fatalistic view of the world and its evils. There was a frank renunciation of all hope of a decent and civilized life on this side of the grave for the majority of people. The famine was probably "permitted by an all-wise and gracious Providence to unite all ranks together, to show the poor how immediately they are dependent upon the rich." In 1819 a conference of Methodist ministers at Bristol adopted a manifesto in which men are told: "Remember, you are Christians and are called by your profession to exemplify the power and influence of religion by your patience in suffering and by living peaceably with all men." (See Hammond, Ibid; 280-281.) "The economist besought the reformer not to quarrel with nature; the Christian might warn him not to quarrel with the dispensations of God." (Hammond, Ibid; 224.)

In a more general way and in all lands religion has often been treated as an opiate. As every one knows, there are many evils in the world that blight the life of man and bring immeasurable misery upon millions. It would seem that by this time men would have challenged these evils and would have sought their elimination. Very often, however, men have taken a pietistic, even a fatalistic, view of these things. In the name of religion men have taught that the trials and troubles of life were a part of God's gracious discipline of the soul. So they have taught men to be patient and to accept these evils as beneficent and necessary. In the past men have taught that God sends the flood and famine to try His children. They have made light of science on the ground that it was holding out false hopes. In the name of religion men to-day make light of social service; they tell us that all such efforts are vain. "Nothing can be done till Christ returns and sets up His Kingdom in the earth." Beyond all this, in the name of spiritual religionism men have taught people to be submissive. Keep men interested in religion and their own souls, and they will care little about work and wages. In a certain city during a time of business depression thousands of men were out of work and discontent was growing. Some prominent employers in that city encouraged a great evangelistic campaign and contributed liberally to its fund in the hope that it would awaken an interest in religion and cause workingmen to be more tractable. Some years ago during a great denominational program employers were urged to support the Church on the ground that religion made more diligent and contented workmen. There was no recognition of the fact that religion was designed also to make more just and brotherly employers. Just now we find many employers encouraging the practice of the Golden Rule in business. But so far as I can see in most of these pronouncements it is the other men who are urged to practice that rule.

In view of all this, in many lands we see that men have had reason for calling religion to account and for saying that it has been used as an opiate. But in all this we see that there has been a serious misconception of religion and an utter perversion of its meaning.

In the case of Christianity at least, it is plain that religion was never intended to be an opiate. Its fundamental idea, that of the Kingdom of God, carries a great hope and summons men to a definite task. Men have given many definitions of the Kingdom of God; but in the Christian conception of things it never means anything less than a righteous society on earth. It implies that there is a divine order for human affairs, and our task is to discover and establish that order. It holds up before men a great ideal and charges men to seek that ideal with all their might. In the Christian conception of things no man can sit down satisfied with the world. The one who has beheld the Kingdom of God looks above and beyond the order of the world and longs for the order that is to be. He is one who is forever afflicted with the malady of the ideal. The members of the Kingdom accept the present social order so far as it is just and in accord with the will of God, and no farther. They do not stand for things as they are, but for things as they ought to be. They believe in justice and they are committed to the work of making justice prevail.

Not only so, but they who have seen the Kingdom of God are squarely committed to the task of destroying the evils of society. The old great historic evils of society, such as poverty and disease, crime and war, have run riot and have blasted the lives of millions. The time was when men accepted these evils as inevitable, perhaps as providential. But the Christian to-day knows better. He knows that these evils are not here in the will of God at all, but are due to the conduct of men and conditions in society. They are due to ignorance and greed, to the selfishness of men and the injustice of the world. These evils are not to be accepted or condoned; they are to be challenged and destroyed. In the name of the Father in heaven we challenge every one of these evils and we summon men to join in their destruction.

The religion of Christ is not an opiate but an awakener. They who believe in the Kingdom of God are called to the task of building a Christian social order. They are called to a lifelong unsundering fight against all injustice and evil. They are called to take sides with God against all disorder and ignorance, all cruelty and vice, against every enemy of man and every wrong in society. They who expect the Kingdom of God are called to the work of social redemption; they are to get the will of God done and to make justice prevail. They are to find the flaws in the social order and mend them. They are not here to keep things fixed, to accept the world as they find it. They are not here to mitigate the evils of society and bid men bear them with resignation. On the contrary, they challenge those evils and in the name of Jesus Christ they seek to destroy them.

The will of God is a submission first, but beyond that it is a dedication. The Gospel of the Kingdom is not an anodyne, but rather an energizer. Too often men have forgotten this; and so Christianity has forgotten its mission in the world. Too long men have accepted poverty and disease, saloons and slums, industrial strife and deadly wars as a matter of course, perhaps as necessary, as more or less inevitable in the present order. Too long God has been regarded as sending plague and pestilence, famine and disease, blindness and feeble-mindedness, for some hysterical reasons, perhaps for our discipline. So men have taken a fatalistic attitude toward these evils and have felt that little could be done, for the present at any rate, to change the world. In face of social injustice and political wrong there has been a quiet submissiveness, the half-feeling that rebellion against these was a denial of God's will. The power of Christianity which should have turned the world upside down and destroyed its evils has been turned into a means of making men submissive and keeping things as they are. The Gospel has been an anodyne, God's will a submission.

All this must pass and we must have a true conception of the Gospel. Christianity is not a passive, static, fixed thing, but is an active, dynamic, revolutionary power. The will of God is not a submission only, but a dedication as well. Christ has not come to keep things as they are, but to make all things new. He has come, not to accept the evils of the world, but to destroy the works of the devil. The Kingdom of God is a revolutionary idea and is a direct challenge to every evil of the world. These evils are not the will of God at all; they are not to be accepted and endured; they are rather to be challenged and destroyed. Contentment with the world as it is amounts to treason against the Kingdom of God. Acceptance of the evils of the world as inevitable is a denial of the Cross of Christ. The will of God means the redemption of the world, and it is a declaration of warfare against everything that hurts man and opposes the Kingdom. The will of God is being done in the earth as slavery, pain, disease, poverty, injustice, crime, oppression, war, are conquered, and freedom, health, joy, safety, bread and peace are realized among men. "The true God," says H. G. Wells, "is not a spiritual troubadour wooing the hearts of men and women to no purpose. The true God goes through the world like fifes and drums and flags, calling for recruits along the streets." One great part of the churches' work is to keep alive in men the vision of the coming social order and to hearten men to seek the Kingdom of God and its righteousness. Contentment with the world as it is may be treason against the Kingdom of God.

The Christian who is instructed unto the Kingdom of God is an idealist and an agitator. He is a revolutionist, and he expects the passing of the old order and the coming of a new. It is necessary that we keep ever before ourselves the purpose and meaning of the Gospel. The ideal of the Kingdom of God carries the hope of a new world order. The world as we find it is not the world as God wants it. They who believe in the Kingdom of God are committed to a definite task. Their lives are a standing protest against every injustice in society, every evil that defeats the will of God and blights the life of man. They believe in the Kingdom of God and are not willing to postpone even in thought the blessings of the Kingdom to a remote millennium or a far-off Utopia.

Christianity an opiate! Why it is the most revolutionary doctrine ever preached on earth. King Robert of Sicily is not the only one who has found "seditious words" in the Magnificat and the Sermon on the Mount. Christianity an opiate! Why the very idea of the Kingdom of God is a standing protest against the world as it is; it is a confession of faith in another order, even the order that God wills and God ordains. They who think of Christianity as an opiate, something that keeps people submissive under the ills of life and patient in the face of injustice, have wholly misunderstood the Gospel.

The Indian Expression of Christianity

By Rev. J. Ireland Hasler

[NOTE: The following article appears in "The Christian World" for June 7, 1923. It is so interesting and so illuminating that we could not resist the temptation to share it with our readers.—THE EDITORS.]

THE spirit of nationalism which is now animating India is leading, among other things, to the placing of increased emphasis on things Indian, and this, not only in the realms of politics, education and industries, but also in connection with the organization and development of the Indian Christian Church. Criticism is directed against the introduction into India of Western denominationalism and modes of worship. At one town the members of a congregation agreed to sit on the ground for worship rather than on benches, and so bring themselves into line with an old-established Indian custom. A few Sundays' experience of this mode of seating led them to feel its inconvenience after having become habituated to the custom of the West, and they decided to revert to their former practice because true worship was not dependent upon any particular bodily posture. So the benches were brought back.

To be of real service anywhere the spirit of criticism needs to be allied with a constructive policy. Such a spirit of constructiveness marks an article which has just appeared in the monthly periodical of the Indian National Christian Council upon the subject of the characteristics of the probable future development of Indian Christianity. This article is not only provocative of thought among all missionaries who are laboring in India, but it is also deeply suggestive to Western minds, since it indicates new lines along which the spirit of Christianity may yet work, and new forms in which it may embody itself and so help to bring home to Christendom in general a fuller realization of the unsearchable riches of Christ.

This Indian expression of Christianity which is necessary to set forth further aspects of the truth as it is in Jesus, and so manifest to the world more of His full-orbed greatness, is a different thing from the Indianization of Christianity. This is a point which the writer emphasizes. Christianity may be Indianized by foreign and Indian Christians seeking in conjunction to fashion the worship and organization of the present Indian Church more in accord with Indian models. Such, however, is like the mere pouring of the water of life into Indian brass vessels for people to drink. The Indian expression of Christianity will need to be something more spontaneous and less mechanical than that. It will be rather the channel which the river of water of life cuts out for itself in India.

Among the probable characteristics of such expression which are indicated there is mention made of the following:

1. While the present Old Testament will not be superseded, yet it will be supplemented by some of the Hindu sacred books. "Why should it not be so," says the writer:

The Gita is to me a more appealing Scripture than the Book of Judges. Some of the Upanishads are more philosophical and rich than the Vanity of Vanities of Ecclesiastes. Prizing as I do some of the great Psalms, I feel that there are in the hymnology of the Tamil land more loveable and diviner strains than the imprecatory Psalms of the Old Testament.

And why should it not be so, adds the Christian missionary. The Church of the West has supplemented her Canon by the Apocrypha. The Gita mentioned above teaches God's condescending grace manifested for the help of sin-stricken souls and sets forth, as life's highest ideal, the disinterested performance of individual duty. A lady missionary in North India has recently translated some hymns into the current vernacular that were written by Kabir five centuries ago because she feels that they are in reality more Christian in sentiment than some of the compositions that now find a place in the Indian hymnary. The principle which Christ enunciated with regard to His attitude to the Jewish Scriptures—"I am not come to destroy but to fulfil"—is applicable to the truths which are to be found in the sacred writings of other nations.

2. There will be a greater spirit of "abandon" in Indian worship. There will be less of the formal and more of the emotional element. The writer is thinking of the ecstasy that characterizes the worship of some of the Indian sects—ecstasy kindled by music and song and the concentrated thought of a band of devotees upon the object of their devotion, and he contrasts with it the "stiffness, isolation and self-consciousness" of Western worship. The Indian Christian "does not forget himself, dance and let himself off."

The worship of the Lord as Beauty and Love that snatches the self out of man has not yet appealed to us. We have been taught to petition God for this thing and the other: for the forgiveness of sins; in short, to worry Him without enjoying Him. Even according to this self-conscious attitude is the liturgy and worship in our churches. We sit and stand, genuflect and bend on the hard benches. The knee cushion is the great achievement of this hard and rigid worship. There is no enthusiasm, no intoxication. Like the bureaucracy, the churches in India have succumbed to law and order.

There is the spirit of the Orient permeating this criticism—the spirit that led David to dance and sing before the Ark, the spirit that sought expression in the choral worship of the Temple, and that has manifested itself—not always in so commendable a manner—in some of the religious sects of the East. One of the favorite forms of religious gathering among Indian Christians at the present day is the "satsang," a service consisting chiefly of song. The Puritan of the West is inclined to doubt the utility of the predominance of the emotional feelings in divine worship. He is aware of dangers that lurk concealed. The temperament of the Oriental Christian may, however, need the evoking of the spirit of worship along such lines. Indeed, it may be worship such as this which St. Paul had in mind when he wrote: "Let the inspiration of Christ dwell in your midst with all its wealth of wisdom, with the music of psalms, with hymns and songs of the spiritual life teach and train one another."

3. There will be greater use of symbolism and sacrament. The writer had in the background of his mind the way in which Hinduism permeates the whole life. Its worship is of daily rather than of weekly occurrence. The images and pictures of its gods are to be found in shop and home alike.

Its sacred objects and special devotees are to be seen everywhere. In short, it has created for itself an atmosphere that environs the individual. Christianity, therefore, needs to create for its adherents more of an environment like this. So we read in the article. The writer advocates the greater use of images, and his words under this heading are worth quoting because of the contrast they present to our ordinary ideas:

In this land, where gods and goddesses are made, not a single Indian Christian has yet made any representation of the Lord as the devout imagination can conceive Him. In place of this poetic feeling and symbolism revivalist preachers have tried to substitute the feeling of sin. The glow of feeling that you are a sinner and that your sins have been forgiven is good, but somehow it does not suffice. The Indian nature is not much attracted by the psychology of sin; it requires, on the contrary, the symbolism of form, color and music. In the light of this interpretation of the Indian nature the whole field of ecclesiastical forms must change. The Indian structure in our churches, with figures of Jesus and the saints, flowers, incense, bells and lamps, these and other elements must find a suitable place.

It is quite conceivable that in the future there will be one section of Indian Christianity which will develop along these lines, even as in Western Christianity there is found the Roman Church, but it is doubtful whether such excessive symbolism will characterize Indian Christianity as a whole. Sadhu Sundar Singh and men of his type would not need these aids to devotion and the sanest minds of the community would fear lest this culture of the external might retard spiritual growth, and lest this emphasis on the emotional might result in the weakening of the ethical in conduct and character.

4. The highest type of Christian attainment will be that of the mystic and the recluse. "There will appear the inspired Guru, or teacher, to lead the soul on to higher initiation. It is here that the Indian Church would differ from the Western." In other words, the Hindu type of religious sages will reproduce itself in the Indian Church. There will arise a set of men outside organized Christianity who through meditation and self-discipline have become more spiritually enlightened than their fellows. They will live far from the haunts of men and yet will draw men out of the churches to be initiated into higher experiences of the spirit. So there will be instituted, as it were, a set of permanent Indian Keswicks or religious retreats which will co-operate with the church in helping men on to a fuller realization of God. That Indian Christianity will produce such spiritual free lances is quite probable, since it has already produced Sundar Singh, but his work clearly shows that others would do well to follow his example and seek to influence men in and through the Church, not apart from it.

5. There will be changes in theological thought. It is here that the Indian Church is likely to be of most service to the West. It will utilize the tenderest human relationships to express the connection between God and the individual. I have known non-Christians in India who preferred to think of God as Mother rather than Father, since to the Indian heart motherhood is a more sacred and attractive ideal than fatherhood. And if it went further and had more general recourse to the simile of loved one and lover it would be quite in harmony with Hindu ideas. Further, in the creeds and theological teaching there will be found new forms of intellectual expression.

In theological matters we are likely to be more psychological and less formal. The firm standing ground of all speculation will be shifted from a mere historical examination of facts to an examination of living experience.

Lastly, Indian thought and modern psychology combined may help to a clearer understanding of the nature and workings of the Spirit of God.

Scholars like the late Dr. Westcott have written of the nature of the glory that India may bring into the Kingdom of God. These thoughts of an Indian writer help to supply details of the vision that has come to Western expositors. That Indian Christianity will one day take a different form from its more or less Western shaping of the present no one can doubt. It will do well, however, in connection with its self-development to study the experiences of other churches recorded in past history, and in connection with the shaping of its theology to steady its thinking by a consideration of the thought of the West. It may well be that the above mentioned lines represent some of those along which Indian Christianity will develop. Nations, as well as individuals, need to work out their own salvation. The main thing is to be assured that such outworking is in accord with the inward working of God.

America and the World War Prospects

By Fred B. Smith

[The following address was delivered by Mr. Smith at the Convention of Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, Atlantic City, N. J.]

WHAT I am to say is based upon a tour of the world which I made one year ago as a speaker upon the topic of "International Friendship and Good-Will." The tour referred to was carried out under the joint auspices of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the purpose being to visit these nations in their greater city centers throughout the world and in every place to call together the educational, social, economic and religious leaders to discuss with them the principles upon which we might hope to eventually build up an order of good-will, brotherhood and co-operation in place of the older régime of jealousy, selfishness, bitterness, strife and war. I visited nineteen different nations upon this theme, and it is a privilege to submit these impressions to you in the full knowledge that you have power to advocate them in realms which I can never hope to personally touch.

It is, perhaps, not out of place to say that in speaking to you I am not the official representative of any particular society, cult or scheme. I am an ordinary layman and express these impressions simply for whatever value they may have in helping this common cause of brotherhood throughout the world.

I wish to call your attention to four outstanding impressions, all of them, I believe, vital to the highest interest of our American life.

In the first place, everywhere I went, upon every kind of an occasion, in every kind of a nation, no matter what their religion, no matter what their form of government, no matter what their traditions, I found everywhere people with a perfectly overwhelming passion, an emotional cry on the part of the common people, to be assured that war was a thing of the past and not in the future. This is true in places where I hardly expected it. I thought I started well informed about the general tendency in most of the nations to be included, and I was fully prepared to meet some resistance at some places, only to find, however, that at every place, regardless of what might have happened in the past, the common people, the ordinary people, the great throng of people, were crying out for an era of enduring peace and to be liberated from the curse of war. This sentiment is powerful. It is everywhere. I am of the opinion that throughout the whole world to-day there could be found a thousand pacifists to where there was one in 1914. The "folks," just the home folks, are sick, tired and disgusted with this intermittent lapse into war with all its terror, death, disease, plague and pestilence. This first impression cannot be overestimated, for if ever this sentiment becomes mobilized and can find adequate leadership it will absolutely banish war as a method of settling international differences from the face of the whole earth.

In the second place, however, I am compelled to bring to your attention the fact that of the nations referred to all but two or three of them are certainly contemplating more war and believe another war is inevitable. This may seem like a contradiction of my first statement. I fully admit that upon the surface at least it so appears, but it is a fact nevertheless. I cannot fully go into all the explanation of this fact, but perhaps I can justify it. I have already said the common people in all these countries are crying out to be liberated from war, but in the same nations where this cry was loudest, when I came in contact with the inside leaders of political, economic, social and religious life, they were compelled to say that they thought more war was inevitable. I do not say that they were all militarists and I do not indict their motives; I am simply stating the fact. Europe to-day is a seething vortex of jealousies, misunderstandings and ominous rumblings of threatening revenge. There hardly seems to be any nation in Europe satisfied with the verdict of November 11, 1918, or with the Versailles Treaty, or with anything that has been done since. Most of them are feeling that they have been wronged and that the only way to remedy the present situation is to resort to arms. In making this statement I am not undervaluing the beneficent influence of certain activities which are now "carrying on," and I am not belittling the work of the League of Nations, or any other society or committee seeking to alleviate this situation. I am merely stating what seems to be an undeniable fact that we are confronted with the peril of another war.

In the third place, I am impressed with the fact that the single greatest issue before the world and the entire human race just now is to discover methods by which we may perhaps avert this disaster. I am persuaded that everything else is incidental. That nothing else matters much compared to this. I need not take your time in any recitation concerning the horrors of war. It would seem as though the lessons of 1914-1918 were sufficient, but it may not be out of place to say that if we get one or two more terrific breakdowns of that kind everything you and I hold dear will go to the scrap heap. Another world war and the pessimists' philosophy will be verified, namely, that this present form of civilization has failed. Continue war in the world and our philosophy concerning democracy, our theory concerning the economic processes of the world, our hopes concerning social life, and even the most sacred traditions of religion will go to the refuse heap and be abandoned. The supreme issue before humanity is simply this: are we to find the way of brotherhood in the world, or are we to continue like the beasts to fight when we disagree. In saying this, perhaps, I ought to comment upon the fact that I am not a pacifist of the extreme type, and never have been, and I am not advocating the theory of an unpoliced world, but what I am trying to say is that the hour has fully arrived when we ought to turn the page over and paste it down forever upon war, brute force, and collective murder as the way by which nations will adjust their differences when they disagree. War as a method has been weighed in the balance, tried for these centuries, tasted and found wanting. It is a loss to everybody that touches it—to the victors as well as the losers in the long run.

In the fourth place, I think we are called upon to mobilize all the forces, call into action the very best talent we have, to discuss the methods by which this period of brotherhood may be so established in the world that it will become permanent and continuous. In referring to methods I want quickly to pass over some that I believe are obvious, some that are in operation now, some that can give us great encouragement and upon which we are all agreed. Here in this convention, I am sure, we would be unanimous in accepting the general doctrine of arbitration as a method by which individual groups, states and nations ought to adjust their differences. I am also quite sure we would be unanimous in welcoming the growing sentiment toward holding conferences as another method of adjusting these differences. It is quite evident that the younger generation will witness an entirely new theory coming into international life under the general title of conferences. Happily the time has now come when national leaders when they disagree with other countries instead of beginning to count soldiers and mobilize forces are saying, "Let us hold a conference upon this question." Conferences promise much in the future. I think again we would all be united upon a World Court of some kind that can take the place for internationalism that the United States Supreme Court now sustains to the various States of our Union. If the United States Supreme Court had had the confidence of all the people of 1860 probably our Civil War would have been impossible; but the fact is the people did not at that time have confidence in the United States Supreme Court, with the result that instead of having recourse to a judicial procedure they were driven in fury to the sword, the dreadful results of which abide in our national life even up to this hour. To-day the United States Supreme Court's influence is so great that geographical or sectional differences are entirely removed from armed intervention, as all minds turn with implicit faith to the high court. Surely, that day can come among the nations, and ought to come, and surely all lovers of peace and concord must welcome the good offices of the great President of the United States in his desire to have this nation fully participate in that court.

Once more, I think we would practically be united upon the fact that there must be some kind of an "international instrument" or "association of nations" which will bind all the nations together for the common purpose of working toward brotherhood and good-will. These are obvious considerations and while we might differ concerning minor details, I am sure we stand united in the general principles thus far unanswered.

I put emphasis upon them and have great confidence in them, but notwithstanding all these assurances I must call your attention to two things in the process of methods which I believe must eventually be brought into action in a larger way if this much needed thing good-will is to become universal. One of these is the full, complete co-operation of America in world affairs. I may say that in all the travel of last year, in every nation, at every city, without one single exception, before the conference or convention had closed, some delegate was on his feet saying, "If you Americans are so much interested in peace, why in the name of God don't you bring your own nation into full co-operation with the rest of the world to work for this purpose?" I was told everywhere, all the time, that America is the key to the world peace. I have come back to my own country with a firm conviction that it lies within the power of America to either, by full co-operation, see that the world shall have unbroken peace, or by its neglect of duty permit the nations to drift back into another unspeakable slaughter. Shall we have peace or war in the future? The answer is found in this. If we really, truly, sincerely and deeply want universal peace, then we must build fires of sentiment throughout this country of ours which will quickly carry America over into full co-operation where her representatives will sit down with the representatives of all the rest of the nations and do their full work in preserving peace.

I believe the present much-talked of isolation is not only anti-Christian, but I believe it is a certain guaranty that another war will come back to the world. We do not hesitate to send our business representatives everywhere. I did not find a spot in travel but that American products were being sold and American representatives were on the ground demanding full protection for every dollar invested—exactly what they have a right to do and what they have a right to expect. Economically, our American leaders are not "isolationists," they are not afraid of interfering and misunderstanding, they just assume the right to go everywhere. The same is true with our educational leaders. The same can be said to be true of philanthropic and religious leaders. In other words, we are going to the ends of the earth in every realm except in the zone of the political, and when we reach that point a little clique has grown up in the country, some of them Republicans and some of them Democrats, who begin to say with insane hysteria, "America first," with the result that America to-day is standing off not doing all that she might do to help the nations untangle this fearful complication. I have no desire to attach the names of societies or organizations. I have no desire to indict the motives of any who differ with me. All I desire is to give the most intense testimony of which I am capable to the fact that America in full co-operation with other nations of the world can probably be used of God to preserve peace, and America standing aloof will probably permit more war.

I do not make this statement wholly upon my own wisdom, which would not be sufficient, but I call to your attention the fact that this view is substantiated by practically every college and university president studying internationalism, and I would call your attention to the fact that this view is substantiated by every great moral and religious leader in the country of whom I have knowledge; and I would also like to call your attention to another fact. Study rather carefully the political ambitions as well as the economic plans of any men who are discussing the American isolation doctrine. I do not say that they are all insincere. I do not mean to even suggest that, but I do say that it is fair to study what is probably the moving motive with men of that kind.

I want once more to say that in the realm of the remedy for war, after full recognition has been given to all that I have suggested, I come more completely to believe that the issue in its last and final analysis is essentially and vitally a religious and moral question. Everywhere I turned, in every conference in every nation, and in every city, I noted this fact: before we had finished some one was on his feet to say: "If ever this world is to know the kind of peace and brotherhood that we are discussing, the good offices of the Christian Church must be brought into action." I heard that statement made in most amazing places. I heard it made by men whose comment simply astonished me, and some men saying it who never went to church. I heard men testify to this who were themselves the leaders of other forms of religion. I was made conscious of the fact that the whole world round to-day, somehow, in a strange and wonderful way, in this turmoil thinking men of great power and capacity, as they try to solve the riddle of humanity's war curse, are saying, "Christian Church, oh, Christian Church; oh, Christian Church!"

I do not bring this to your attention now as an easy way out of a difficult problem, and I do not say that because it is a peculiar hobby of mine, although I frankly say that I love the Christian Church more than I love anything else in the world outside of my own home. But this sentiment is based upon scientific fact, and the fact is just this: The men who are studying this war question and those who are deeply concerned about the present strife, struggle and bitterness among the nations are recognizing that the rest of the thing is carnality, jealousy, materialism. The greed of gain and an obsession for a narrow nationalism and geographical extensions. Looking at this thing as perfectly practical men, they are convinced that no League of Nations, no power of treaty, can fully satisfy and alleviate a struggle of this kind. Something more than legality is necessary to combat the frenzy of the materialistic world as we find it now, and therefore clear around the world, in every nook and corner, men are turning their thought toward the doctrine expounded by the Christian Church, because it is in its purity a spiritual interpretation of life based upon "brotherhood" and co-operation rather than competition and the law of "the survival of the fittest."

In one of Lord Rober Cecil's addresses which I was permitted to hear he closed with this statement: "The League of Nations is only an outline. It is only a form. It is only an implement by which the nations of the world may do certain things together for their common good. But it is only a form, it is only an outline, and we must look to the Christian Church to sanctify the deeds of the League of Nations."

In addition to this, these same men, it seems to me, as they think of this problem of world-wide brotherhood, realize that somewhere there must be an organization that can carry this spiritual interpretation around the world. I call your attention to the fact to-day, gentlemen, that when we come to that view of the importance of some organization that is world-wide in its scope the Christian Church stands absolutely alone. You cannot call to mind the name of a nation of any significance whatever that has any bearing upon the world situation but what the Christian Church is there. Its organization may be faulty, not well informed, nor would we claim for it a high state of efficiency, but notwithstanding all that, it does exist and it has a great band of preachers, prophets and priests who are fearless men. They cannot be bought or sold, and, while there may be exceptions, the real truth is when they know what the will of God is they will say it, and therefore this organization of the Christian Church is one of the elements that gives confidence that the offices of this society when brought into action will be of inestimable value in the peace program.

But finally, gentlemen, this turning of minds toward the Christian Church is sound and solvent because the doctrine of Christianity is essentially the very thing we are all longing for. Let us lay aside for the moment our differences, whether we are Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant. Let us lay aside all prejudice and all preconceived ideals and turn once more and read the Sermon on the Mount, preached by Jesus, the founder of Christianity, and I venture to say that you may search the literature of the world from one end to the other and no other such document can be found. Here is the hope of a peace that will not fail, and while I am no wild sentimentalist, and while I will work with you shoulder to shoulder in every method, by every scheme, at the ballot-box or in the conference room, to advocate this ideal of brotherhood which I believe to be the one great supreme question, yet I am bound to say that my final conviction rests in this Christian doctrine and also in the belief that the world will never know unchanging, abiding brotherhood and good-will until it shall have been leavened by the truth of Him of whom the angels sang at His birth, "Peace on earth, good-will to all men."

Gentlemen of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, you have sounded many a high note in the past. You have stood by great captains of industry and leaders of big business, you have demanded purity in the products we are selling, you demand honesty in the administration of affairs. You have set a very high standard. I invite you to-day to accept as a part of your program the greatest hope that has ever crossed the threshold of human thinking. We have banished other great evils from our fair nation. We have sounded the death-knell to the legalized sale of liquor and the vile corner saloon. We have said that no sections in our beautiful cities shall be turned over to the "red-light district" and termed exclusively as vice centers. You have said that the hour has come for a square deal in the industrial world. Shall we not move up to the heights and now become prophets of universal peace and good-will to all the nations?

According to some of the newspapers of the Baltic States, the Bolsheviks are outwardly changing their attitude toward religion. Their "revenge church reform," the Living Church, has pretty well failed of its purpose. If anything, it has only increased the religious feeling of peasants. According to these papers, something like three in every ten Communists secretly resort to the Church. The Bolsheviks, they say, are attempting to come to a compromise with Patriarch Tikhon. The Patriarch, it seems, declares that the Church is neither White nor Red, but is neutral in regard to government. Communist leaders intend to tolerate religion, at least temporarily, and give up the propaganda in which they have engaged against it. Such are the reports which the Baltic newspapers are printing. They would need confirmation before they can be taken at their face.

Worth remembering: Ambassador Jusserand's statement in New York recently that France is spending only half as much on her army and navy as is the United States.

Does Auto-Suggestion Rob Use of God?

By Rev. Marcus A. Spencer

Assistant Minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Warren, Ohio

THE power of suggestion has long been recognized as a scientific fact. The new idea that Coué has given us is this: that not only have outside things the power of suggestion over us for weal or for woe, but that we ourselves have the power of suggestion over ourselves, that we can to a large measure shape our own destiny by a sort of self-hypnotism. Things happen, he says, not because we pray that they shall happen, not because we will that they shall happen, but because consciously or unconsciously we have been suggesting to ourselves that they were going to happen.

Now does that rob us of God? If auto-suggestion be true, have we pushed God out of His intimate relation with the cause of things? We can bring things to pass without God?

The answer is that auto-suggestion is going to rob some people of God, we may be sure of that. The shallow people, who had only a thin belief in God at any rate, and who in their love for new things have become enamored of auto-suggestion are going to scrap God at once. He will no longer be necessary in their scheme for ordering their lives. As Samuel McChord Crothers aptly put it, "When a new idea gets control of an unfurnished mind it has the time of its life. There is nothing inside to molest it or make it afraid."

There is much in the theory of auto-suggestion which tickles the fancy of this self-sufficient age. We like to know how things happen. We like to feel we have worked back to the scientific truth. We like to believe that it is our own good judgment and our application of scientific principles which brings things to pass.

And then there are always the people who seem to feel contempt for whatever they can dissect and name. If auto-suggestion explains for them the way in which our minds can control our bodies, then the process becomes simple, understandable—it is no longer mysterious, divine. As a matter of fact, what has taken place is that we have discovered another of God's laws. God has rewarded man's search for the truth with a new revelation of the working of His laws; and shall we repay His kindness by straightway repudiating Him? If He give us bread, shall we return Him a stone?

Men had the same struggle to readjust their thinking when Newton proclaimed and proved his law of gravitation. Newton was a deeply religious spirit, but he encountered bitter opposition. Men said that he "took from God that direct action upon His works so constantly ascribed to Him in Scripture and transferred it to material mechanism," and that he "substituted gravitation for Providence."

But the law of gravitation does not trouble us to-day. We have rearranged our thinking. We like to think that God is dependable in that sphere of the universe.

Men had the same struggle to readjust themselves when astronomy taught us about meteors and eclipses, when God's thunderbolts were named electricity by Benjamin Franklin, and when Darwin propounded his theory of evolution. For a minute life seemed robbed of its mystery. For a minute religion seemed a thing of the past, since the wonder was gone, and wonder is an essential part of worship. For a minute the cure-all had been discovered. And then—men found that none of these things had taken place. The human mind oriented itself to new mysteries. The cure-all was found to be only a partial remedy. God was needed as much as ever. As Sabatier says, "Man is incurably religious."

Belief in God has survived all these changes, and will survive as many more as the mind of man is destined to make. We ought not to be afraid to be confronted with new truth or with unexpected ideas. We ought to trust God enough to long to know His truth, lead us where it will—we who reverence Jesus Christ, who called Himself "the Way, the Truth, and the Life." All we discover is new laws, immediate causes; we never touch upon the Force back of the universe. To quote Sabatier again, "Since God is the Final Cause of all things, He is not the scientific explanation of any one thing."

Perhaps Professor Bowne makes it clearer in his often quoted parable: "An Eastern king was seated in a garden, and one of his counselors was speaking of the wonderful works of God. 'Show me a sign?' said the king, 'and I will believe.' 'Here are four acorns,' said the counselor; 'will your majesty plant them in the ground and then stoop down and look into this clear pool of water?' The king did so. 'Now,' said the other, 'look up.' The king looked up and saw four oak trees where he had planted the acorns. 'Wonderful!' he exclaimed; 'this is indeed the work of God.' 'How long were you looking into the water?' asked the counselor. 'Only a second,' said the king. 'Eighty years have passed as a second,' said the other. The king looked at his garments; they were threadbare. He looked at his reflection in the water; he had become an old man. 'There is no miracle here, then,' he said angrily. 'Yes,' said the other, 'it is God's work whether He do it in one second or in eighty years.' Yes, the working of our mind upon our bodies and upon our personalities is God's work, whether He do it in a way that we can label and understand, or by some method that is for us still shrouded in mystery.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning is right:

"Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God;
But only he who sees takes off his shoes—
The rest sit around it and pluck blackberries."

Our quarrel with Coué's idea is not that we are afraid of auto-suggestion leading astray any thinking person who has ever known God deeply personally in his own life. Our quarrel with Coué is for what he omits much more than for what he says. He seems to state only a half-truth, or a third-truth.

The truth that he states is the value of faith, that quality which Jesus himself stressed so heavily. Coué rarely uses the word "faith," but that is what he is talking about. His book is a little manual of faith calisthenics. Many of us need just such a regimen set up for us. We do not know how to make our faith help us when we have a cold or are depressed. The book gives suggestions, starts us thinking, can perhaps jar our faith into action.

But important as faith or the purposeful use of the imagination is, we refuse to believe that it is everything. The facts do not bear out that importance. Our quarrel with Coué is that he denies the manifest place of the will in getting things done, and that he ignores prayer utterly.

Take the case of the will. It is an acknowledged medical fact that many a patient's life has been prolonged through an intense desire to continue to live. The will refuses to yield the mastery of the body. On the other hand, physicians are rendered anxious when, in a serious illness, the sick person has no wish to prolong his life. Again, there are long, monotonous pieces of work in which the will has constantly to be invoked to prevent the tired soul from giving up the battle. There are spheres of life and there are types of people where the will is far more important in getting things done than is the imagination.

And as for prayer, he is silent on that whole side of life. He evidently does not believe Tennyson's affirmation of faith, that more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of. Coué knows of no communion with a friendly Father God. What cure for insomnia is better than that? Auto-suggestion is blind to the prayer attitude of mind that keeps men humble and that leads them to the discovery of fresh truth.

All honor to auto-suggestion, if it leads men to use their faith in every-day living. Jesus said, "When the Son of man comes, will He find faith on earth?" But what a pity if some people are going to throw over Christianity for this new fad. Did they only know it, they can find in true Christianity all that they are seeking in auto-suggestion.

Let a person use Coué's phrase if he wishes to, but there are any number of texts from the Bible which can also be employed as formulas to helpful advantage. Certainly one will believe these Scriptural truths much more vividly if one is thus using them in his daily mental gymnastics, making them a part of his true, underlying self.

Anyone could choose a large list of such texts. Here are a few as samples of what is meant: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:13); "No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly" (Ps. 84:11); "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8:28); "With God all things are possible" (Mk. 10:27; "Nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Mt. 17:20); "As thy days, so shall thy strength be" (Deut. 33:25); "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. 3:16); "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint" (Is. 40:31). Why reduce religion to one mental attitude—that of invincible optimism about oneself and the world? There are other sides of life and other sides of our natures that cry for expression. Why not be all-around men?

And finally, it would be difficult for anyone who has yielded the direction of his life to "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" to become an enthusiastic devotee of the auto-suggestion cult, because its whole emphasis is on self, not others. It stresses getting, not giving; domineering, not serving. Let us learn what lessons it gives as to how to make our Christian faith work. But let us keep it in its place. Let us remember that Jesus said, "He that would save his life shall lose it," and "Whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant, even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister," and that He emphasized beyond the power of denial the mighty influence of prayer.

The Japanese Problem in Hawaii

By Rev. Sidney L. Gulick

"CONGRESSMEN JOHNSON and Raker came and saw and went off and spilled the beans. . . . They have made a serious blunder. Instead of being in Congress they should be in 'vo'dville,'" writes the editor of the "Hilo Tribune Herald," while the editor of the "Honolulu Star-Bulletin" declares that their program "would not end our problem of assimilation. It would only make that problem insoluble, and might also breed evils as far-reaching as any which it was intended to cure."

The proposals of these Congressmen "to save Hawaii," as wired to Honolulu on June 14, include, "first, the absolute exclusion of Japanese immigration." If this means Congressional legislation to this end, that would annul the Gentlemen's Agreement by ex parte action. This would be an affront to Japan. Responsible Japanese have repeatedly affirmed that if the agreement is not working satisfactorily, Japan would be ready to consider any changes that may be desired by America that are reasonable and that are not humiliating. If, however, the proposal means that the desired change is to be secured by conference with Japan, there is no possible objection to it. But in that case it will surely be pointed out that for many years more Japanese have been leaving the Islands than have been entering. The exact figures are given below.

"Second, the cancellation and loss of citizenship privileges for those who return to the land of their forefathers." If this proposal refers to a permanent return, no one can object. It is not at all likely that it refers to a return for a mere visit. If it refers to a return during the years of childhood and youth for education in Japan, then much can be said in its support.

"Third, an amendment to the Constitution of the United States denying citizenship to anyone born in the United States of alien parentage whose parents are ineligible for citizenship." This is the proposal which the "Star-Bulletin" declares would make Hawaii's Japanese problem "insoluble" and "breed evils as far-reaching as any which it was intended to cure."

The writer is personally acquainted with both of the Congressmen referred to and while he sympathizes with some of their viewpoints as he has known them in previous years, he wonders what information they secured in the Hawaiian Islands that led them to their conclusions. During his recent twelve-day visit in the Hawaiian Islands the writer diligently sought for facts, figures and sober judgments by painstaking students of the question. The real situation in its main outlines appears to be quite different from that usually presented in the papers. Here are a few facts:

The Japanese population has begun to diminish as compared with the rest of the population. In 1900, for instance, Japanese constituted 39.7 per cent. of the entire population and in 1920 they constituted 42.7 per cent. Two years later their proportion fell to 41.1 per cent. During these same twenty-two years, according to official figures, the net results of arrivals and departures of the laboring class was a positive diminution of 4,394 (total departures, 128,328; total arrivals, 123,934).

During the past three years Filipinos have been coming in in large numbers. The total number of workers on the plantations is 46,035 (March, 1923), of whom Filipinos are 20,396, while the Japanese males number 13,496 and females 2,795.

Prof. R. Adams, the statistical expert on Japanese in the territory, states that Japanese alien males diminished from 44,734 in April, 1910, to 36,594 by June 30, 1922. This departure from the Islands with the steady dropping out from work on the plantations for other forms of work explains the distress of the sugar planters, who began their frantic efforts in Congress to get relief by importing Chinese labor. During these same twelve years alien Japanese females increased from 15,016 to 22,396, while minor children, chiefly born in Hawaii, increased from 10,875 to 58,057.

A sensational illusion has been widely propagated about the alleged phenomenal Japanese birth rate. Its propagators do not apparently understand the realities about such statistics. The "birth rate" is the ratio of all the children born in a single year to the entire population; this includes all the grandparents, bachelors and old maids and also unmarried children down to one year of age. Now in the case of immigrant races, these elements of the population are largely absent for a decade or two or three. This fact upsets the calculation. Under such conditions the true method for comparative calculations of birth rate is to deal only with the women, say between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. Now when the birth rates thus computed are compared it is found that in the Hawaiian Islands the Caucasian birth rate is the lowest of all and the Japanese come next. Such are the conclusions of Professor Adams.

Certain visitors and writers have also been discussing the "menace" of Japanese political domination when these thousands of children come to age and begin to vote. Some have even stated that that time will come inside of a decade. Such talk, however, is not based upon accurate statistics and ignores the operation of well-known social forces.

The latest Governor's Report (1922) gives a table of the prospective Oriental voters based upon the present number of "birth certificates" that have been issued. This shows that in 1940 the total number of Japanese voters will be 7,678. The total number of voters of all races at that date will probably exceed 30,000. The Governor's table, however, makes no allowance for deaths, departures or new certificates. Professor Adams estimates that the total number of Japanese voters is not likely ever to exceed a third of the whole.

The Americanization of Hawaiian-born Japanese seems to be going forward excellently. Their knowledge of the English language is remarkable. In the schools race consciousness is remarkably absent. At the Mid-Pacific Institute, for instance, where all the races are represented, the pupils numbering some two hundred all told, at the recent election of the athletic association, although Japanese constitute sixty per cent. of the entire student body, so that they could elect a Japanese for every position if they desired to do so, out of three candidates for president the Japanese received only seventeen votes, while the two Chinese candidates received respectively forty-seven and 146 votes. There were two Japanese candidates for vice president, but the Chinese candidate won by a vote of 144. Each of two Chinese candidates for treasurer received a larger vote than did the one Japanese candidate.

The captains of the baseball, the basketball and the track teams were all Chinese this year "although the majority of the players who elected the captains were Japanese. Last year the captains were two Japanese and one Korean. . . . In every instance the boys elected were considered the best players and leaders. This same holds true in all class and society elections." These quotations are from a letter by the principal of the Institute, Dr. J. H. Hopwood.

One of the much talked of questions in the Islands at present is that of the foreign language schools. There are some 130 of these maintained by the Japanese, and some twenty more by other races. In 1920, after some rather heated discussions, a measure was proposed by a group of mediating Japanese which proved satisfactory to the legislators and was promptly enacted into law. It brought all private schools under the supervision of the Department of Education. Provisions were made for examining and licensing all Japanese teachers, while the period for special language training was limited to one hour in the afternoon. A committee for the preparation of suitable text books for this education is now at work.

Last fall some of the suggestions of this committee looking to the shortening of the language course from eight to six years were at once accepted and authorized by the Superintendent of Schools and promulgated by the Governor. This threw some of the schools into serious financial straits, and some of the Japanese feared that it might be the first step to the ultimate abolishment of the entire language school system, which, however, would be contrary to the mutually accepted plan on which they were working. This led to litigation to test the constitutionality of the regulations.

It should be noted, however, that out of 130 Japanese language schools only sixteen are parties to this litigation. The rest are loyally falling in with the proposals of the government. The writer was informed by one of the leading Japanese that even the recent judgment of the Federal Supreme Court regarding foreign language teaching in the United States should turn out to have nullified the territorial action referred to above, the great majority of the Japanese schools would no doubt be guided by that action.

The outlook in the Hawaiian Islands so far as the Japanese question is concerned is decidedly hopeful. The Japanese are making good. To allege "a Japanese menace," as certain politicians in the Islands have recently done, in order to frighten Congress into desired labor legislation favorable to Hawaii is itself a "menace."

One of the most astute students of race relations and race characteristics in the Hawaiian Islands stated to the writer that in his belief, within a score of years, Caucasians would be thankful indeed for the presence in the Islands of a considerable body of Japanese voters who will constitute an intelligent, steady, conservative influence as compared with the restless, relatively unreliable and inefficient members of other races.

While the writer takes on the whole an optimistic view in regard to the Japanese problem in the Hawaiian Islands, he is not blind to certain difficulties and dangers. Some settlement should be found promptly for the difficulty of "dual citizenship." The present overlapping of Japanese and American laws is bad for both countries and particularly bad for the young men involved.

It is also desirable that the further coming of "picture brides" to Hawaii should cease. Highly important is it also that certain misunderstandings now widely held in Japan about the "California question" and in America about the "Japanese question" should be dispelled. This can be done only by wise procedures in popular education in both countries.

Further immigration from Japan to the United States should cease. But this step should be taken in a manner that is friendly and honorable and free from all implications of humiliation. Fiat, ex parte abrogation of the Gentlemen's Agreement is surely not the way to do it.

Probably the next best step for both nations to take looking toward a fundamental solution of all remaining difficulties is to provide for a joint commission, or something equivalent, to study the common problems together, to determine the facts in the light of the knowledge on both sides, and to suggest to both governments and peoples the constructive proposals for agreements, laws or treaties calculated to remedy the present difficulties and remove the causes of present irritation.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

Motion Pictures and the Country Church

Taken from Chapter V of "Tested Methods in Town and Country Churches"

DURING 1922 the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys studied successful town and country churches.

Forty churches were made the basis of field investigation. The experience of a dozen of these churches which used moving picture machines is interesting.

The moving picture as an instrument of religious work is winning its way more slowly than the stereopticon; but none of the churches using one would be without it. Two or three machines of excellent make are obtainable. Advice as to which is best in any given case may be obtained from the local moving-picture operator or from the extension department of the State university.

Machines of a number of makes can be purchased for from $400 to $550; and as most of these are fireproof, they may be used without booths, provided the proper authorities are given opportunity to test them thoroughly. It is necessary, however, that they be submitted to this test and that the fire insurance agent who handles the policy of the church be notified in order that the proper underwriter's permit for showing pictures may be obtained.

The machines are used for various purposes. Most of the churches do not hesitate to show, on Sunday evenings, films picturing incidents from the Bible or such pictures as "The Stream of Life," "Modern Samaritans," and the like. The picture, when used for evening service, is almost always preceded or followed by a short talk by the pastor, and is often made a part of a religious service.

At community meetings, or gatherings for recreation, such educational or entertaining films are shown as "Our Daily Bread," "The Land of Cotton," "Consolidated Schools" or "Gravel Road Construction." Of all the churches studied, the Methodist Episcopal Church at Rolla, Missouri, had the finest selection of general pictures. They included last year: "Miles Standish," "The Last of the Mohicans," "Mistress of Shenstone," "Ann of Green Gables," "Daddy Longlegs," "Les Misérables," "Evangeline," "Turn of the Road," "The Servant in the House," "Shepherd of the Hills," "Little Women," and various Tarkington comedies.

The cost of film service varies with location. A church in a county-seat town on the main line of a railroad has to pay far more for its films than one miles back in the mountains, or on the prairie, which does not enter into competition with moving-picture houses. Virtually all these churches, however, and many others, have found it possible to pay for the machine with the profits from a number of week-night entertainments; after which either pictures may be shown at cost or the proceeds may be utilized for other purposes. A film from a commercial distributor seldom costs a church more than fifty dollars; and a large number of good films can be obtained for from five dollars to twenty dollars each, plus transportation expenses.

Of almost a score of organizations which at present furnish films to churches, all have been employed by one or another of our group of churches. A number of concerns, commercial in character but serving only non-theatrical organizations, include the International Church Film Service, the Sacred Film Corporation in America, Community Motion Picture Bureau, and others. All these companies, too, have been utilized by at least one of these churches.

These churches also obtain films from commercial distributors who have been brought to understand the situation, and who send only suitable material. The Famous Players Lasky Corporation, controlling Paramount Pictures, has a non-theatrical department for churches, schools, and community organizations which furnishes excellent films such as "The Old Homestead" and "The Little Minister." Similar departments either have been organized or are being organized by several other commercial distributors.

Certain State universities, State libraries, and similar public agencies sent out on circuits to schools, churches, and community organizations excellent films at charges sufficient to pay expenses.

In a number of cases a church that does not own a moving-picture machine has the use of one belonging to a school; and two churches obtain them at commercial moving-picture theaters. One church has agreed not to purchase a machine so long as the quality of entertainment offered by the theater in the community continues to be good; and another has promised to refrain from showing pictures on Sunday evenings so long as the village moving-picture theater is closed on that evening.

Land Reform and the Church

THE question of land reform in the Czechoslovak Republic presents a very complex and difficult problem, both in its social and financial aspect. For this reason it is not surprising that it is but very imperfectly understood abroad and motives are imputed which were never in the minds of our lawmakers—and the actual practice gives full proof that the law is both just and reasonable.

It may not be generally understood that there are in our republic vast estates whose very ownership and extent was a constant reminder of a crying injustice and criminal violence perpetrated upon the original Bohemian nobility, as well as upon cities and individual peasant population after the battle of the White Mountain in 1620.

Anti-Reformation, or rather anti-Protestant, bigotry of the Hapsburg government, under the pretext of political and social necessities, led to the confiscation of property of persons only remotely connected or only suspected of rebellion or persons otherwise unacceptable. So that during the seventeenth century thirty-six thousand families which remained faithful to their Protestant faith were forced to leave the country and go into exile. Their estates and farms were given or sold for a song by their cruel dictators to foreign adventurers, to Catholic hierarchy, religious orders or to native Catholic nobles whom it is not possible to clear of sharing the responsibility for this vast and cruel devastation of the land of Huss. Way into the eighteenth century continued this ruthless land grabbing by the unprincipled nobles, who with sinister motives and under various pretexts have swallowed up whole villages, going into the hundreds, and added them to their vast estates.

So it is that to this day fully one-third of the land remains a proud possession of the descendants and heirs of the former nobles who have acquired it by injustice and cruel oppression while the descendants of the exiles for their Protestant faith remain landless in a foreign land, earning their living by handcraft and in the homeland thousands of descendants of well-to-do Protestant land owners are among the landless poor proletariat.

The land reform therefore has two objects in view.

First, as far as possible at this late date, to make amends for the former wrongs, and return the land into possession of the thousands of poor laborers to whom by right it belongs. And second, to make possible in some small way the return of the sons of the former exiles, who under old cruel laws have lost their title to the land because of their Protestant faith.

Thus our land reform is in part an act of historical justice, seeking to undo the injustice and wrong of the former days.

In part, it is a matter of social justice seeking to build barriers to landless discontented proletarianization of the state. Finally, it is also a matter of political justice seeking to create by means of land a condition favorable to the solidifying and upbuilding of the state and nation.

This does not mean that the land is being confiscated by the state or taken outright. It simply means that the land is being taken by the state for a reasonable price stipulated by law, and for the same price it is being resold under long-term payments to laborers or small farmers who need it.

Not in a single instance has the state taken land outright from the men whose forefathers have enriched themselves by rank injustice perpetrated upon helpless people. Not even in the case of Liechtenstein, whose fathers were counselors to Ferdinand II and executives of his cruel orders, and as a reward secured immense estates, has any land been confiscated.

It is then not a matter of revenge, but rather a spirit of justice that has prompted this move on the part of the Czech government to help improve the living conditions of its impoverished people. And certainly no man of Christian spirit can offer any objection to this. If any loss is occasioned to those who for centuries have grown fat on the land unjustly held, it is not unjust, nor does it in any case seriously threaten their existence, nor does it in any case form a very serious handicap. The Parliament has refused to pass a law that would give the state a right of confiscation without giving equivalent in value.

Let us look at one concrete case.

At the very beginning of our independence the feeling prevailed in many quarters that as a matter of pure justice we ought to make it possible for the descendants of the exiles for their Protestant faith to return to their liberated fatherland.

A very conservative figure places these descendants who have kept their faith and language at twenty thousand, scattered over Eastern Central Europe. More than eight hundred families of these have formally expressed a desire for such a return and requested our assistance. The idea is to form new villages of such of them that have for centuries maintained their Protestant faith, language and national consciousness. The action is being promoted by the "Constance Union," the headquarters of the Czechoslovak Protestants.

President Masaryk looks favorably on the movement. A mere beginning has been made. On New Year's day, 1923, the first seventeen families of the exiles actually arrived and were given a hearty and joyous welcome by the representatives of the Protestant churches and of the government. Rev. J. Krenek spoke as representative of the American Presbyterian churches. These newcomers were settled near Zábreh upon a land bought for this purpose from the estate of Lichtenstein, which was formerly owned by Zerotin, a member and protector of the Moravian Brethren church.

Here history plainly speaks her word to the present day. Faith in the justice of history and of God is being renewed. The liberated motherland is stretching forth her hands to her children, carried afar by cruel persecution, and invites them again to take refuge under the protection of her wings, in order that she may warm them by her affection.

And men from afar hear the invitation and heed it. We will cite but one notable illustration.

After the news of the bloodless revolution of 1918 was carried abroad and the name of Czechoslovak Republic was being published, word came to us from a man in Southern Africa, Figulus by name, a descendant of John Amos Comenius.

No one in Czechoslovakia up to this time had knowledge of the fact that in far-off Africa there still lived a lineal descendant of one of the greatest men of our nation and of the world. And that in his possession are some of the heirlooms of the great pedagogue bishop, especially his ring. Mr. Figulus, a mining engineer, a descendant of the daughter of Comenius (for he had no sons) came to Czechoslovakia in June, 1921, and was in Praha upon the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary of the public execution of the twenty-seven Protestant nobles who had taken part in the revolution and the battle of the White Mountain.

He brought with him his little daughter, Gertrude, aged ten, whom, when he returned, he left here in the family of a Czech Brethren pastor. But the liberated mother country is calling and blood has made reply. Mr. Figulus has definitely decided to remove to Czechoslovakia. His little daughter meanwhile has learned again the mother tongue of her great ancestor, while, of course, she keeps her German and English which she has learned in South Africa.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Maude Royden on Prayer*

THIS little volume is a series of Sunday evening addresses by one of the strongest women preachers of the present day. The style is rather informal and bears many marks of its extemporaneous character. Occasionally sentences are faulty and should have been corrected in the manuscript, but these faults are more than made up for in the directness and vigor of the language. In a short pre-paratory note the author says of these addresses: "The point of view they suggest is that prayer is (at least) as real and living a force in the world as any of the great forces revealed to us by natural science."

Miss Royden could hardly be called orthodox in the narrow sense of the word, but she has one of the most real and living convictions concerning the dignity of man and the sufficiency of God that can be found in present-day speakers. She draws a close distinction between religion and worship, and declares that "the impulse of worship comes only when God is seen to be worshipful." An again, "Worship must be disinterested." She has an extraordinary way of going to the root of the matter of the earnest desire of plain people for reality and sincerity in life, and looks with great scorn upon the exploitation of God. Her conception of the divinity of Christ lays much more emphasis on His identification with men than His separation from men. She insists that the way to perceive the divinity of Christ is to begin by following him and then we shall find it out clearly for ourselves. "It is not the divinity of Christ that I call in question, but I want to affirm the divinity in ordinary men and women, and I am persuaded that Christ himself sought all His life to recall us to our Father because it is so hard for us to believe that we really are the children of God." She claims that our emphasis on the divinity of Christ as a mark which separates us from Him has made us quiescent under circumstances where we should have been active. "We do not expect to turn the world upside down, we do not expect to exercise that divine authority and that divine love, because we are not divine, we are only human. Yet we shall not learn to work miracles, either material or moral, until we have got hold of the idea that there is within us the power of God, that we are all the children of God."

Having laid this general basis for the discussion of prayer, Miss Royden proceeds to stress the necessity of "intensity of asking," and points out the poor conception that the average person has of the value of prayer. "People who would hesitate to trouble me to write a letter, who would hesitate to ask me to give them £5, will often ask me to pray for them, as though it were a little thing." She believes that one of our difficulties in prayer is that our words do not represent our true desires. "Do not ask for what you do not really want and then go about and say that God does not hear your prayer." "Is it not true that sometimes in the recesses of one's mind one does not desire to be made whole?" "You want all the graces of humility with the advantages of advertisement." Again and again she declares that according to our faith is it unto us, and she answers many of the difficulties that people find in praying by warning us that many of the difficulties found in a doubting world need not be there in a world of faith. She draws a fine illustration from swimming and points out that we must believe that the sea is going to keep us afloat. In another place she points out our over-emphasis on our own petitions in prayer, and advises us, "Try to spend longer in realizing what God is like and less in asking Him for things."

One of the finest chapters in the book is that on "Prayer for Others," where she shows that intercession is really a test case for prayer. "So far as I can discover," she declares, "very few people believe in intercessory prayer to the extent of taking any part in it." She points out that she herself has experienced, first, that in praying for other people she frequently discovers something she can do for them; second, that she is making herself a channel for the power of God; and third, that she can direct that power to the person she desires.

The whole book is of real value in dealing with the spiritual meaning of life. It represents a deep faith in God and a strong emphasis on human action. The practical sanity of the author and her deep trustfulness are well illustrated in the brief quotation with which I would close the review of this important book.

"It is difficult to bear in mind that love must conquer; that God is in heaven and His love in the world, without losing something of that power to rebel against wrong; that instinct to fight against injustice, that is characteristic of our Master. There are people who are so removed from the world's suffering, so complacently sure that everything is all right and nothing wrong, that I confess they sometimes make me feel I would rather have any physical disease in the world than that mental disease of indifference to the world's suffering!"

Stephen and Martyr

ACTS 6:8-15; 7:54-60.

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?"—Rom. 8:35.

IT is the life and not the death of the martyr which is impressive. When death comes as it did to Stephen, its glory lies in the witness it bears to an unflinching loyalty to truth. In the case of Jesus, His death has meaning because it reveals the quality of His life, and it is the life itself which is made radiant by death. It is the life which was crowned by a martyr's death which should fill our thought.

"So he died for the truth, that is fine;
More than most of us do.
But stay, can you add to that line
That he lived for it too?"

It is easy to die;
Men have died for a whim;
For bravado, passion or pride.
Was it harder for him?"

But to live every day, to live out
All the truth that he dreamt
While his friends met his conduct with doubt:
The world with contempt.

Was it thus that he forged on ahead:
Never turning aside?
Let us talk of the life he lived.
Never mind how he died."

Of course we do mind how a man may die, particularly if his life has been given in heroic sacrifice for the truth or in defense of his friends; but we need to guard ourselves always from a slightly morbid tendency to exaggerate the suffering side of a great experience like that of Stephen or of his Master before him. The sufferings endured in a persecution have no beauty or value in them. Every healthy minded martyr who has given his life as a witness to the truth would have avoided death if he could. No one in his right mind could court persecution or long to suffer merely for suffering's sake. What we sometimes call a martyr-like spirit may be a morbid desire to atone, by a dramatic death, for the failure in living achievement. Francis Thompson has a phrase, "Pierced by thorns that formed no crown." This would seem to be the most pitiful experience imaginable. Suffering for suffering's sake has nothing admirable about it. Thorns become a crown only to the life which in loyalty to the truth and unselfishness in service has had a kingly-quality.

"Let us talk of the life that he lived.
Never mind how he died."

might be paraphrased to read,

Let us think of the life that we live,
Never mind how we are to die.

That is where the emphasis always should be laid. In loyalty to the truth, in fidelity to the purposes of God, every man may build his life on the same heroic lines as that of Stephen or any other martyr. If persecution or death are to be part of the witness he is to bear, that remains altogether the concern of those who may oppose his course. Such things are not to be feared, and will not be feared by any loyal champion of a great cause; but those whose death has really been "the seed of the Church," have in reality sown such seed by the force and faithfulness of their living message.

All of this is not to take away anything from the glory of the martyr's crown. Our Christian traditions are incalculably richer because there have been those whose heroic lives stand out vividly against the dark background of hatred and persecution on the part of the enemies of truth. In the lives of those who have made the supreme sacrifice we see our faith proclaimed as a possession dearer than life itself. Nothing in our own experience may ever bring us to just such a realization, but the value we place upon our faith cannot but be immeasurably heightened by the striking witness of those who have willingly counted all things but loss, if only they might win Christ. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews urges us to "consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." Very few are ever called upon to resist unto blood striving against sin, but the knowledge that others have done so, when occasion made it inevitable, cannot fail to impart a truer and more heroic quality to our own faithfulness.

No one can read the account of Stephen's life without feeling that he had exceptional qualities of courage and loyalty. The narrative does not leave us thinking of the poor broken body of a man carried away to burial. Rather does it leave us with a fine image of a zealous apostle of the truth. The whole account tingles with life. Everything about Stephen suggests unusual virility and activity. At the first mention of him he appears as a man full of faith and the Holy Spirit. No sooner was he appointed to his important office than again the record reads that "Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people." In debates which arose between the representatives of the synagogue and Stephen we read, "They were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake." Here is a picture of a man full of enthusiasm for his faith.

It seems a remarkable thing that one of such power in witnessing for Christ should have been discovered outside the circle of the disciples. There is a tradition that he was one of the seventy at one time sent forth by Jesus himself. But the point to be made is that Stephen appears before us as a man overflowing with the energy of a tremendous conviction. He is in no sense a man seeking trouble or courting death at the hands of the persecutors of the faith. He is interested in living, and in those achievements with which he crowded the days of his ministry.

It is not strange that there should be so much similarity between Stephen, the first of Christ's followers to die for his Name's sake, and Jesus himself. Jesus did not seek death, but he sensed the inevitable conflict between himself and the foes of God's truth. He marched straight up to that issue and flung his challenge into the face of an entrenched hypocrisy and selfishness. Jesus proclaimed himself to be "the light of the world." The whole world was his legitimate domain. He claimed the whole world for God and for himself. He could not be satisfied with merely a part of the world. He could not share his kingdom with any other influence, not of himself. And we thrill when we read "He steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem."

He might have avoided Jerusalem, he might have lived long years doing good, and the world might have been enriched by his teaching and the record of his life; but it was the very heart of his faith that it was for all mankind. To limit its sway or to allow it to be limited, would be to repudiate its one great sanction, that it was of God. And if of God, it must be for all. And so when the time came, Jesus of necessity approached the seats of the mighty and challenged the mind and the heart of the world with his truth. His death put the seal of his conviction on the universality of his gospel. It was as one who claimed the right to rule everywhere, that he challenged the priests in the hollow formalism of their religion, the aristocratic Pharisees in their hypocrisy and the leaders of the people in their blind statesmanship. What was the good of it all? some one may ask. Did it help in healing the sick, or liberating the captives, or spreading the gospel of the Sermon on the Mount? Does it not seem like an unnecessary seeking after trouble? It might, to one who thinks of Jesus as born to be a provincial leader, with a limited following of those who might choose to be in his church. But the whole course of Jesus in going up to Jerusalem, gloriously emphasizes his unwillingness to accept a limited sway.

Stephen manifests a similar zeal to that which we find in Jesus. His main concern in life was to make Christ known wherever opportunity might open; and when the occasion came, when the truth that was his very life was challenged, he met that challenge with a boldness that thrills us all. How he did thrust the truth home to those hostile Jews who were denying the faith! Marshaling his facts in masterly fashion from their history, he builds up his case against these incorrigible opponents of the truth. "Ye stiffnecked . . . ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did. . . . Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?" No wonder they raved against him! His attack was a sharp and penetrating thrust.

But we can hardly feel that it was gratuitously severe. The issue was there joined, and anything less than Stephen's fearless declaration would have been a concession to the enemies of Christ. And so, soon after Christ's own death, Stephen, his heroic follower, laid down his life for standing unflinchingly and aggressively by the truth that Christ was the Holy One of God.

And the fact of his death and his own heroism through all those trying scenes must have left an unforgettable impression on their hearts.

So the Christian faith has come down from the very beginning by the way of such sacrifices as these. We have these gifts of freedom and of faith, only because there have been so many faithful even unto death.

Is there any truth that needs more constant emphasis? Men fail to measure up to life's opportunities because they have no adequate sense of the value of life's most familiar privileges.

He who appreciates anything of this truth will live in daily reverence for even the common things of which life is made up. "The sentiment of honor," writes Professor James, "is a very penetrating thing. When you and I, for instance, realize how many innocent beasts have had to suffer in cattle-cars and slaughter-pens and lay down their lives that we might grow up, all fattened and clad, to sit together here in comfort and carry on this discourse, it does, indeed, put our relation to the universe in a more solemn light. 'Does not,' as a young Amherst philosopher once wrote, 'the acceptance of a happy life upon such terms involve a point of honor?' Are we not bound to take some suffering upon ourselves, to do some self-denying service with our lives, in return for all those lives upon which ours are built? To hear this question is to answer it in but one possible way, if one have a normally constituted heart."

Surely the honor of every man is involved. From the beginning life has been prepared and built up for us through innumerable sacrifices. And we are not beggars in life asking alms carelessly of these our benefactors. Honor demands that we enter into a partnership with heroic men and women to preserve and further improve what has been furnished us.

The Christian with the glorious history of the faith before him has always felt the force of Paul's declaration, "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price."

"With generous hands they paid the price
Unconscious of the cost,
But we must gauge the sacrifice
By all that they have lost.

No lavish love of future years,
No passionate regret
No gift of sacrifice or tears
Can ever pay the debt."

A FARMER ON EVOLUTION AND THE BIBLE

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

From my youth up when I joined the church in England I have been interested, and agitated, by the higher criticism and the Darwinian theory of evolution, which sprang into prominence about the time of my conversion. I read most everything bearing on the subject for many years. Wells' "Outline" I am going through the third time. It seems difficult to give up the Mosaic account and harmonize our Christianity.

And so our Sunday schools are kept in ignorance of the later discoveries. When later the information is given through the press, something of which appears every day, our pupils must certainly lose faith. The situation seems very difficult to harmonize satisfactorily, but people are reading very widely, which makes it easier to change their mental attitudes.

One year ago while in Lincoln, Neb., I visited the State University and called upon the State Geologist, Professor Barbour. In the Museum are prehistoric mammoths, one excavated from the basement of a school house in western Nebraska, said to be at least twenty-five thousand years old. While the professor was gone to secure me a guide through the Museum, I said to the young lady left there: "What effect do these prehistoric specimens have upon your visitors?" She said: "Many are astonished and some get mad at us, as though we were to blame. But," she said, "We cannot help it." It seems strange that so few are interested in the subject. The professor told me that not five per cent. of the students visit the Museum. The amount of material stored up would fill four such buildings as the Museum.

If some able mind could harmonize or excuse the account of Genesis of the origin of things with geology and evolution (something on the basis of which Dr. Fossdick speaks), it seems to me, with the indisputable evidence of Christianity, a foundation might be laid that could be more generally accepted. I have just gone through Mr. Gladstone's "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture," but while like Mr. Bryan it is the result of anxious thought for the good of mankind, yet it does not meet scientific requirements of to-day.

AN IMPORTANT STEP TAKEN

The Chinese Chamber of Commerce in the city of Chefoo has done something no other city in China has done, that is, passed the program of the Shanghai Christian Conference which contains briefly three articles: 1. No child under twelve to be employed. 2. One day's rest in seven. 3. Adequate safeguarding of the lives and health of employees. They have also appointed a committee to put the program into practice. This was due to the efforts of Mr. Eddy during his campaign in Chefoo. It is a tremendous step forward and of all China are in a bad condition. Our a lot of work will be required to put it Christian business men can do and are into execution as the industrial conditions doing a great deal to ameliorate conditions.

When you buy movable partitions remember this

THAT, after all, rolling or folding partitions are to be used only when wanted, and out of the way the rest of the time. But that you never can tell when they'll be needed. So you must be sure that they will operate quickly, silently and easily every time you want them to. For nearly half a century we have made rolling and Sectionfold partitions. Today there are thousands of churches equipped with them. That experience is built into every contract we execute.

May we send you both an illustrated booklet and a brochure entitled "Evidence"? In both of them you will find much to enlighten you on the subject of church partitions.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

CO-OPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT

In connection with the developing interest in co-operation, it is worth noting that Illinois co-operators are establishing an educational department which will conduct a magazine on co-operation, distribute literature, arrange for entertainments within the various local co-operatives, and in course of time establish a school for the training of managers and executives of co-operative organizations. This is a part of the move of a large number of partially co-operative stores in southern and central Illinois to establish themselves in complete harmony with the Rochdale co-operative plan. These organizations have hitherto been for the most part miners' union stores very closely tied to the Central States Co-operative Wholesale Society of East St. Louis, Ill. They are now gradually reorganizing themselves. Individuals will own the stock of the concerns, goods will be sold at the market price, the stock will pay interest, and the profits will be returned to the members in proportion to the amount of their trade with the co-operative. This plan is the one generally accepted among co-operative consumers' organizations throughout the world as the wisest and safest method of action. We have recently noted the President's endorsement of co-operation, and the National Catholic Welfare Council calls our attention to the fact that the Bishops' Program of Social Reconstruction issued on Lincoln's Birthday, 1919, by the National Catholic War Council, strongly recommended consumers' co-operation to reduce the high cost of living. The passage reads as follows: "More important and effective than any government regulation of prices would be the establishment of co-operative stores. The enormous toll taken from industry by the various classes of middlemen is now fully realized. The astonishing difference between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer has become a scandal of our industrial system. The obvious and direct means of reducing this discrepancy and abolishing unnecessary middlemen is the operation of retail and wholesale mercantile concerns under the ownership and management of the consumers. This is no Utopian scheme. It has been successfully carried out in England and Scotland through the Rochdale system. In addition to reducing the cost of living, the co-operative stores would train our working people and consumers generally in habits of saving, in careful expenditure, in business methods, and in the capacity for co-operation.

PRESIDENT HARDING VS. SECRETARY WEEKS

The National Council for Prevention of War, with its Bulletin of March 3, circulated a chart prepared by the

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

United States Bureau of Efficiency showing that more than eighty-five per cent. of our national budget for 1924 would go for past and future wars. The figures were sharply challenged by the Secretary of War, who attacked the group of organizations functioning through the National Council as a pacifist group "preaching revolution and the establishment of a communist government . . . who seem to believe that an army and navy are unnecessary." According to Mr. Weeks, the figures were misleading, as only 13.5 per cent. of the budget was being expended for national defense. He refused to consider the cost of past wars, asserting that the pacifists used it "as a means of propaganda only." President Harding could hardly have been ignorant of a controversy given such wide publicity. But he said at Salt Lake City on June 26: "When you stop to think that, when divided up, eighty-five per cent. of American taxes, eighty-five per cent. of the enormous public fund of which I have been speaking, goes to the expenses and obligations of war and only fifteen per cent. to the promotion of the ideals and practices of peace, do you not think we ought to play our part, my countrymen, in helping the world to abolish war?" Then Mr. Weeks publicly expresses surprise and disappointment, and the "Army and Navy Journal" is plunged into despair, complaining bitterly that "not since Theodore Roosevelt occupied the White House has there been a President with a comprehensive and clear view of the question of national defense. . . . President Harding . . . not only made a contribution to the pacifist propaganda, but repudiated the budget system and the Secretary of War."

WHO CAN AFFORD A CAR IN 1935?

In the August number of "Our World" Charles Merz paints a dark picture of conditions in the United States a generation hence if the distribution of oil control remains unchanged. We are the great producers of oil to-day, he states in "Behind the Scenes in the Oil War," but the rest of the world has the great reserves. Seven-eighths of the world's supply of oil lies outside our frontiers, and of this only three per cent. is under American control. This does not make any appreciable difference in time of peace, but it is incalculably important in case of war. A wise man, who knows oil as most of us know coffee, said this about it: "The world has lots of oil. And the world has lots of ways to use it. The hitch comes in the fact that most of it instead of being right where it is wanted, lies in precisely the wrong place. It is true, the experts tell us, that we produce within our own frontiers well above sixty per cent. of the world's supply of oil. Last year, for instance, 550,000,000 barrels in a world total of 850,000,000. But for years we have been prodigally wasteful in our methods of production. On an average less than twenty-five per cent. of the oil underground has ever got into the pipe lines. And to-day the demand for gasoline is increasing so rapidly that we may face continually higher prices and perhaps an actual shortage. Our petroleum supply is not inexhaustible. And meantime we are discovering new ways to make it work. Ship after ship on the high seas is being changed from a coal to an oil burner. Land transportation is increasingly dependent on the same fuel. Already we are importing heavily to meet expanding needs. 'The United States' own reserve of oil is not illimitable," said Sir John Cadman, chairman of the Inter-

Allied Petroleum Council, during war days. 'On the contrary, one official survey after another during the past decade has definitely suggested that they are approaching exhaustion. . . . Before 1930 the United States may easily be relying upon foreign sources of supply for at least half, possibly more than half, of the oil demanded by her domestic requirements.' We do not ring the world with oil-bunkering stations and rich seaboard fields. On the other hand, says the Federal Trade Commission, 'a British steamer leaving New York for a voyage around the world, calling at every important point of Europe, along the Mediterranean, in India, the East Indies, Japan, the Philippines, Australia, and the west coast of North America, and then returning to New York through the Panama Canal, would find oil-bunkering stations operated by a member of the Royal Dutch-Shell group at every important port of call.' 'It appears obvious,' the commission adds, 'that a nation having widely distributed supply and storage facilities, and owning the means of distribution, will have certain advantage in world trade against one having a concentrated supply.' Meaning, of course, the United States. We are to-day the great producers. But the rest of the world has the great reserves. Seven-eighths of the world's supply, presumably, lies outside our frontiers. And each day we have more imperative use for that eighth we own."

THE ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN PREACHERS

The International Association of Women Preachers will hold its annual assembly August 28 to 30 at the Chicago Training School, 4949 Indiana Avenue. Miss Madeline Southard, Winfield, Kansas, the president, announces that eight denominations will be represented on the program and that women from sixteen denominations are members of the Association. The Rev. Victoria Booth C. Demarest, Chicago, a granddaughter of William and Catherine Booth, will speak on "The Virgin Mary." The Rev. Stella B. Irvine, Riverside, California, who is the national and world superintendent of the Sunday-school work for the W. C. T. U., will speak on "Women Preachers: Why?" Miss Culla J. Vayhinger, Upland, Indiana, is in charge of the Americanization work for the W. C. T. U. and will speak on "The Woman Preacher and the Immigrant." Brigadier Annie J. Cowden, Chicago, is in charge of social work for women in the Salvation Army in fifteen States. Her subject is "The Woman Preacher and the Outcast." The Rev. Mary Lyon, Cleveland, Ohio, a missionary secretary of the Disciples of Christ, will speak on "Women, as Home Missionaries." "The Woman Preacher and the Child" will be discussed by the Rev. May E. Bullock, Dayton, Ohio, in charge of children's work of the Sunday-school Board of the Christian Church. "Echoes from the Field" will be given by Miss Lee Anna Starr, Bellevue, Pennsylvania, of the Methodist Protestant Episcopal Church.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

derip and many other nationally known men and women have been invited to take part in the bi-ennial session of the National Council of Congregational Churches at Springfield, Massachusetts, October 16 to 23. This will be the first meeting of the Council in Springfield and the first to be held in the East for ten years. This meeting will be of more than ordinary interest to eastern people, as the Congregational Church has been influential in the life of the people here since the Mayflower landed at Plymouth. In the early days the Church was the leading influence in the community. Only its members could vote in town elections and its own affairs were managed not by the communicant members of the Church alone, but by the Ecclesiastical Society, made up of responsible men, and later of women also, in the community. It was independent as were the settlements and went its own way as the people wished. As the scattered communities began to join together in towns, in states and finally in a nation, so the churches began to fellowship in small groups known as "Associations;" later in state conferences and lastly, nearly a hundred years after we had become a nation, the churches of the country formed a National Council. When the National Council was formed its field of interests was very narrowly confined. It was feared that some overhead organization might be built up which would interfere with the freedom and autonomy of the local church. For these are the prized possessions of each congregation and are guarded most zealously. But as the years have gone by and churchmen have realized more and more the vast forces against which the Church must exert its spirit, and as tasks to which the churches wished to address themselves were found to be nation-wide as well as local, the need and value of some national organization through which the churches might work both for fellowship and service, have led to the strengthening of the Council in many ways. The freedom of the local church, however, has been preserved.

CO-PARTNERSHIP FOR RAILROADS AND MINES

The Department of Social Action of the National Catholic Welfare Council has issued the following statement on co-partnership for railroads and mines: Government agencies are threatening legal measures to break railroad and coal strikes in the future. The dangers foreseen in this are causing greater interest in plans to reorganize both industries in such a way that strikes will be unnecessary. Partnership of miners and railroad men in their respective industries is being held out as the first requisite. Railroad men face the threat of an injunction, if they strike again the arrest of their leaders and the tying up of their funds. This has come about because the temporary injunction against the officials of the striking shop men has been made permanent. If the recommendations of the U. S. Coal Commission on anthracite workers are put into effect and made applicable to bituminous workers the miners, in case they strike, face indictment for conspiracy and government seizure of the mines. The Coal Commission thinks that a charge of conspiracy can be sustained under the present laws, but if not, it will recommend such a law in its final report. It also recommends that in case of strike the President should declare a national emergency, seize the mines and operate them. The railroads and mines are held so necessary that a strike in either industry takes on the proportions of a national emergency. Since a direct legal veto on strikes is considered inadvisable and probably legally impossible under the Constitution, indirect measures are relied upon, such as injunctions, the Presidential proclamation of a national emergency, and temporary government operation of the industry. While such measures are recognized as extraordinary and not in keeping with the right of freedom of contract, the public, it is said, will not be squeamish about breaking strikes which interrupt railroad service and the coal supply. The miners and railroad men declare that they will not give up without repeated struggles. This unfolds the possibility of open defiance of the government in future railroad and coal strikes and labor troubles, such as have not been seen in this generation in the United States. The reason for their strong opposition is that to them collective bargaining is their sole hope as employees and without it they look forward to gradual reduction of wages, worsening of working conditions and complete subjection to the railroad and coal companies. Yet the public will not go on suffering the hardships of railroad and mine strikes. The situation is not serious yet. The government did not enforce the injunction against the officials of the striking railroad men and the procedure against the miners is only in the recommendation stage. But the trend is all towards denying in practice the right of collective bargaining to employees in essential industries. Among labor some are considering only how to hold on to collective bargaining in these industries. Others are planning how labor can attain such a partnership in these industries that strikes will be unnecessary. More of the general public are favoring such a move as an alternative to the troubles which will arise from trying to take collective bargaining away. The hope is also held out that if the employees are made partners they will do better work than now and the cost of living will decline. Partnership of employees in these industries is looked forward to, also, as the means of establishing a counterpart of the guilds of the Middle Ages in modern times.

CONDITIONS OF THE BOK PEACE AWARD ANNOUNCED

The first announcement was made recently of the conditions of the $100,000 award created by Edward W. Bok for the "best practicable plan by which the United States may co-operate with other nations to achieve and preserve the peace of the world." In making the first public statement of the award in early July the committee in charge of the award stated that the conditions would be announced within a few weeks, or at some time before August 1. All plans received by the committee up to now have been returned to the senders, who have been notified that they will receive copies of the conditions when published. The conditions define broadly the scope of the plan sought, as follows: "The winning plan must provide a practicable means whereby the United States can take its place and do its share toward preserving world peace, while not making compulsory the participation of the United States in European wars if any such are, in the future, found unpreventable. The plan may be based upon the present Covenant of the League of Nations or may be entirely apart from that instrument." The conditions set forth that the competition is open to every United States citizen, whether by birth or naturalization. Plans may be submitted not only by individuals, but also by organizations, national, state or local. Every plan submitted must be accompanied by a summary of not over five hundred words. The total length of the paper, exclusive of the summary, is not to be over five thousand words. Manuscripts must be typewritten. Manuscripts must not bear the author's name or any identifying sign. Each manuscript must have attached to it a plain sealed envelope containing the author's name and address. All plans must be received at the offices of the American Peace Award by midnight on November 15 next. The names of the Jury of Award will be announced as near September 1 as possible. It is possible that in addition to the main award of $100,000, several smaller awards may be made. The Jury of Award may select a plan which is a composite of the best plan and of ideas or sections taken from each of several other plans. If the jury decides to select a composite plan of this kind there are also offered by Mr. Bok a second, third, fourth and fifth award of $5,000 each, for any plans or portions of plans used by the jury in a composite plan. If, however, the Jury of Award accepts one plan in full, making no additions to it from other plans, no subsidiary awards will be made. The main award of $100,000 is to be made in two payments—$50,000 will be paid to the author of the winning plan as soon as the Jury of Award has selected it. The second $50,000 will be paid to the author if and when the plan, in substance and intent, is approved by the United States Senate; or if and when the Jury of Award decides that an adequate degree of popular support has been demonstrated for the winning plan. The above is merely a summary of some of the principal conditions. All contestants should have the conditions in full, which after July 25 may be obtained on request at the office of the American Peace Award, 342 Madison Avenue, New York City.

AN ADDRESS TO THE RULERS OF THE WORLD

The following statement was unanimously adopted by the International Christian Citizenship Conference, recently held at Winona, Indiana, and cabled to twelve rulers of nations in Europe. Copies are being mailed to the eighty-three rulers of the world: Humanity is staggered by the possibilities of another world war. Homes in every land, over which the shadow of sacrificial death still hovers, are saddened by the prospect of still further heart-break and suffering. The people in these lands have already given millions of their sons in the belief that their supreme sacrifice would make the world safe for democracy, create a high idealism and end war for all time. None of these hopes has been realized. Men hate each other as intensely as ever. Chaos reigns in every human relationship. Economic and political conditions have sunk to low levels. Nations have been guilty of promoting selfish and ignoble loyalties. Efforts have been made to avert the disaster which is inevitable if present tendencies continue. Every such method for adjusting these difficulties has failed. The time has come to try Christianity. It has never failed in any field when given a fair chance. And civilization is entitled to every opportunity to free itself from its present predicament. There is an inescapable obligation on the part of every nation to make its contribution to consummate this desired end, even at great sacrifice to itself. The nations of the world must depart from selfish individualism and inhuman isolation. They should unite in creating new standards which are based upon the teachings of Jesus. He must be acknowledged as the Supreme Arbiter in every national and international difficulty.

Loyalty to Him should be the chief desire of the nations. It should be recognized that nations are accountable to the same Christian principles as those which pertain to all Christian men and women as individuals. There is no double standard of morality and ethics—one for men and another for nations. There is only one morality, one honor, one righteousness. We believe that the State belongs to God, and that He is the ultimate source of all civil and political authority. We believe that the divine right of sovereignty and civil authority is vested in the nation, and that the nation is an intelligent moral entity which God holds responsible for the use of the sovereignty and authority which he has vested in it. We believe that God's judgments can be averted only by national repentance for sin and by national obedience to the laws of love and brotherhood and fair play, as taught by Jesus, and that such obedience will bring peace to the world, and a restoration of prosperity and happiness to all the peoples. We further believe that civil rulers are his ministers as certainly as are the rulers of the Church, and that these rulers are directly and immediately responsible to Him for their official conduct. It is because nations and rulers have held themselves above all moral law, becoming a law unto themselves, as far as their civil lives are concerned, that present day world conditions have become so chaotic.

SPEAKERS AVAILABLE

The Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches has arranged a list of men and women prominent in fields of social work who will be available this autumn and winter to speak in churches on themes connected with the relations of the church to community life. This list includes employers and leaders of organized labor, prominent churchmen and well-known leaders of thought in the country. Some of the subjects announced are: The Church and Industry; Sketch of the Development of Organized Labor; The New Race Relations in America; The Aims of the Labor Movement; The Coming Seven-Day Church; Christian Co-operation that Counts for the Community; Shall Employers and Labor Fight or Co-operate? Child Labor and Welfare; Is the Idea of White Supremacy Christian? It is hoped that these problems, especially those relating to industry, may be widely presented and discussed over the country by the churches in connection with church forums, Sunday evening services, organized men's classes and brotherhoods. The commission will be glad to send this list to directors of forums. The names of some fifty forums have already been received at the office, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York. The commission desires to add to this list and will be glad to receive information concerning any forums now in successful operation. A pamphlet on the organization of church forums will be sent upon request.

Russia has turned into a federal government, the United States of Russia, and has just adopted a constitution which gives any of the constituent states the fundamental right of secession. The Ukraine, which has been more or less independent, will give up its diplomatic mission in Czechoslovakia and hereafter none of the individual republics will have representatives abroad. Citizens of the federation will travel in foreign countries with federal passports. Such, at least, is the statement sent out by the Associated Press from Moscow.

Does Senator Johnson's New York Address Mean a Third Party

THIS is the question everybody is asking since the big banquet in New York on Wednesday evening, July 25th. Many things pointed that way. Among the thousand men present were many Republicans who have been greatly displeased with the present administration. They cannot go with the Democrats, for they stand for the League of Nations. They cannot stand President Harding, for he advocates entrance into the World Court. Nothing seems left for them but some new party which will stand for American isolation and devote itself entirely to home affairs. Then there is Senator Johnson himself. He has put himself outside the present Republican group by his attack upon the President and Secretaries Hughes and Hoover. He also announced his intention of fighting their policies to the bitter end. It is impossible to conceive of Senator Johnson going over to the Democrats; he cannot support the present Republican policies. Does it mean a third party with him as candidate? Or does the dinner mean the splitting of the nation into two sharply defined groups, those who, on the one side, believe in America's participation in world affairs, and those who, on the other hand, believe in absolute isolation? Will Mr. Johnson and the other irreconcilables be able to so influence the Republican party that President Harding will abandon his plea for our entrance into the World Court and thus the party stand for absolute isolation while the Democratic party stands for association? This is what may happen if the Republican party goes with Senator Johnson, for his position, now fixed and unalterable, is absolute isolation, not even participation in the World Court, which he insists is a part of the League of Nations. The one thousand men at the banquet were of both parties, Republicans and Democrats, but they were of one mind evidently on the question of foreign policy.

Whatever may happen, Senator Johnson has rendered a great service to the country—to the world, for that matter—in clarifying the issue. He has come out unequivocally for the United States having nothing to do with the rest of the world. We should have no part in the World Court, and of course not in the League of Nations. We should sit in no European councils. They do not want our wisdom or advice; they do want our money and our power to help them in their fights and quarrels. It is doubtful if we have any advice or wisdom to give them; they do not think so. How eagerly they took our soldiers; how arrogantly they spurned our advice in the peace-making. The European nations have not changed; there is no sign they ever will; they do not want to. Let us keep out of it. Let us not even send soldiers to help them in a war that is not ours.

This is straight talk and everybody knows just where Senator Johnson and his followers stand. We are glad he has taken this stand. Frankly, we admire him much more than we do Mr. Hughes and Mr. Hoover, and even President Harding in this regard. No one knows just where either one of these three Republicans stand on foreign policy. Mr. Hughes and Mr. Hoover signed a letter urging people to vote for Mr. Harding so we could get into the League. (Senator Johnson reserved his finest scorn in his address for this act and its renunciation.) They have been quiet on the League ever since. Now they are urging the World Court, but insisting that it is independent of the League. President Harding once talked about an association of nations, but we have heard nothing of that lately. Then he advocates our entrance into the World Court, but soon he gets frightened over that and begins to weaken and suggest reservations that make it impossible for us to enter. The support for it is more and more indifferent. This is in keeping with the whole foreign policy of the Administration. There is none of this in Senator Johnson. He has a policy, and personally he has backbone and conviction. He has a stand, and he stands there. His speech the other night had more real stuff in it than all President Harding has made on his tour put together. No one knows where the Administration really stands on the relation of the United States to Europe; everybody now knows where Senator Johnson stands, and evidently a good many Republicans stand there with him if the enthusiasm of Wednesday night means anything. Will the whole party move that way as 1924 approaches? We are rather inclined to think so. There are also indications that the Democratic party will move as decidedly the opposite way and come out squarely for recognition of our place in the family of nations. If this happens there will be a realignment of voters. Many Republicans will vote the Democratic ticket and many Democrats following the isolationist leaders in that party—such as Mr. Hearst, Mayor Hylan and Mayor Curley will vote the Republican ticket. (It will be hard for them, but it will be a blow against England, and they would even vote the Republican ticket to get that in.) We expect to see the Republican party take the strict isolationist stand as the power of Senators Johnson, Borah, Lodge and La Follette grows. We hope to see the Democrats take as definite stand for participation in world affairs, as Justice Clark, Professor Fisher and Dr. Hamilton Holt are now urging them to do.

With the facts in Senator Johnson's address we agree; with the deductions we are utterly at variance. From the facts he draws what is to us an utterly heathen conclusion; we draw the Christian conclusion. He says rightly that Europe is full of strife, feuds, traditional hatreds, jealousies, selfish nationalistic policies, therefore let them alone. We say that because of this it is our duty to teach them a new and better way. Europe has taught us a hundred things; we have this new way of co-operation of races as we have practiced it here, to teach Europe. We take the missionary point of view to be a national principle as much as it is an individual ideal. Mr. Johnson says Europe is sick, therefore stay out. We say for that reason go in, and we have good authority behind us. It is they who are sick who need the physician. Senator Johnson is wrong, too, in saying that Europe does not want our instruction, advice and wisdom—only our money and soldiers. He is expressing the heart of governments, not of the peoples. We found the peoples of Europe looking with longing to Mr. Wilson's Fourteen Points; it was governments that spurned them. The people of Europe would welcome us to-day, and were we there we could make all their councils much more democratic, and we could, were we immediately related to the League and to the reparations councils and all other groups with voting power, lift all the discussions out of the realm of petty European squabbles up onto a world plane. Who can doubt but the reparations problem between Germany and France would have been settled long ago had we been there? We never found anybody in Europe who doubted it.

But even from the point of view of our own welfare we believe Senator Johnson is all wrong. There cannot be a prosperous America with an impoverished and crippled Europe. With a Europe in the grip of the bloody war which Senator Johnson saw coming, who is going to buy our goods? Who is going to buy them even now with France upsetting the whole of Europe by her futile occupation of the Ruhr. Can the United States afford to have Europe sick forever? What have we been hearing from the farmers of Minnesota who cannot find a market for their grain? Their grain rots in bins while Europe starves. We would ask our readers to read the speech Senator Underwood made in Birmingham at the same hour Senator Johnson was speaking in New York. Listen to these words: "You must bear in mind that fifty per cent. of our cotton must be consumed in Europe, and that one-third of our meat and wheat must be consumed in European markets. In the future, if American business is to survive and our products are to be consumed, there must be a European market. The trouble is not that they are not ready and willing to purchase, but that they have not the ability to pay. Before her World War, Europe had gold with which to pay and it also held five billions of American securities. To-day it has none of these. The energy of man is the only way by which to produce. Half of Europe is not working. Stability of government no longer exists in Europe." The whole point of Senator Underwood's address was that the United States should take a hand in straightening out affairs in Europe for its own sake. F. L.

Our Journey

HOBAB belonged to a wandering tribe that roamed in the desert. Moses, we are told, invited him to join him and his people in a definite journey towards a promised and a desired destination. The Christian Church uses the old word as an indication to those outside it to join its ranks. It is impossible to do so, however, without putting new meaning into the old words, "Come with us and we will do thee good." The word "good" ought to mean something very different to the Christians from what it meant to the Israelites in the old times. To inherit a land of milk and honey, at the expense of driving out those who dwelt in it, was to them a "good." We ought now to look upon that as an evil. White people who call themselves Christians have often done that kind of thing, thought it very good, indeed, to go and take the land of other people because it was rich; but no one would dispute now that, however much it may be done, the exploitation of native races is a wicked thing. We could not in sober moments believe that the Lord had given to us to enjoy the property of people whom we had exterminated or driven out. Again, the ancient Israelite always considered it a "good" which God gave him if his enemies were defeated or scattered. Christians, too, alas, have too often regarded that as "good."

But the real Christian good is not the scattering or defeating of enemies, but the rooting out of the enmity and making friends of the men. So, if we use the old words of Moses, it must be understood that we put the Christian meaning to them. The good we want to do is the good realized in character by the Christian standard, the good we want to reach is the good of the Christian ideal. We do not think first of all of journeying to a place, but to a spiritual condition of life. There must always be some place, of course, but the place is a secondary consideration. Our heaven will consist in what we are, our paradise in the happiness and the joy of our relationship.

How may the Church offer good to the world? In the first place, one of its main aims should be to put into human life a definite sense of direction towards a high goal of character. We do not claim to have attained it, but to be journeying in its direction. It is no part of our desire to prove ourselves better than other people; the very recognition of the Christian ideal makes us feel that we are very imperfect and very full of faults; but we are not complacent in view of them; we aim at something better. We want to make clear the difference between roaming in the wilderness and journeying through the wilderness. The old story of the Israelites may be taken as a sort of spiritual parable. The tribes of the wilderness were at home there; they were content, moving here and there and rounding back on their starting point, without any idea of getting out. But the Israelite, while he sojourned here and marched there, moving to-day and resting to-morrow, taking here a straight way and there a circuit, all the time felt that he did not belong to the wilderness, but was going through to another and a higher destination. There is a tremendous difference between the two kinds of character, that of the man who takes life piecemeal and from hand to mouth without submitting details to the control of any great principle, without considering fragments in the light of any great whole, and without estimating movements in relation to any high direction, and that of the man who has in his mind a goal towards which he is ever journeying, a supreme achievement he is always attempting. He may tarry here and there, stop in this scene and in that, he may do this and the other, but in his soul there is an ever onward-going, a great sense of belonging to the unattained, a definite sense of direction in all action, and an endeavor to make all things subserve the higher purpose. The first man is a native of the wilderness, but the second is a native of heaven; the first roams, but the second journeys. One thing the Church should want to do is to put this sense of journeying in the souls of men; to help them feel that they belong not to this or that or the other, but to a great whole which includes all these; that they therefore can never reach satisfaction so long as life to them consists of a number of unrelated fragments unharmonized, and with no helpful relation to the great ends of character.

Once men get the sense of direction it will enable them to deal with practical matters in a very different way from that in which they would deal with them without it.

How will the nations deal with the question of armaments? It all depends upon the direction, the ideal of the nations. If they are really set in the direction of world peace, there is no doubt as to how they will deal with armaments. If they are bent upon a balance of power and watching their own advantage, they will deal with them in a very different way.

Now, it is so in our individual lives, in our own small circles. All little matters are treated quite differently when a man is serving an ideal. All circumstances assume different aspects to the man who has a high goal of character to make for, than what they do to the man who has not. It is an essential part of the ministry of the Church to keep our hearts and minds alive to the ideal ahead of us.

And then the Church as a whole must try to do this for the world. Whatever men may say about the impossibility of the world working its way out of the chaos created by men's passions, and working itself clear of those passions themselves, and creating a world of peace and truth and beauty, whatever scepticism may be prevalent on this subject, there should be none of it in the Church. The very meaning of the Church is that these things are possible. We have joined together in the belief that we are journeying towards a life very different from the life the world has known. We have slums, but we are not content with them; we have had wars all along the course, but we mean to put an end to them; how much will be accomplished in our day we know not, but our utmost must be done. We must not subscribe to the finality of the wilderness—we are journeying through.

Moses rested his confidence on this: "God hath spoken good concerning Israel." Is it not our confidence, too, that the Lord hath spoken good concerning man? Is not the higher destiny of mankind the Divine destiny? Does it not so announce itself? If we are asked where God hath spoken good concerning man, where is the promise that mankind shall achieve anything like the glorious destiny that some people dream of we can readily answer. God hath spoken this good concerning man in man's own heart. It is when man behaves in such a way as to help create that better world he gets the highest and best for himself, and he knows it; it is the word of God within him. When men act upon what we call their better nature, when their life goes out in pity and mercy and self-denial and love, it wears for them the stamp of the highest, and they get the approval of the world in a way that no one who acts selfishly ever gets it. When a tramp jumps into a river to save a child he does not know everybody feels that he has done the human thing. In the common heart God has written good concerning man, hath plainly indicated the wonderful possibilities that lie in the life of human kind.

Then God has spoken good concerning man very specially in the lives of all good men, the best-known, the less-known, and the not-known-at-all. The choir invisible is a very large one "whose music is the gladness of the world." We cannot read the story of the great servants of God in all ages who have devoted their lives to the good of mankind, who knew that their own souls were fed from the springs of eternal life in God, without feeling that their word is a true word of God, speaking good concerning man. We cannot believe that all such men have been deluded, and that they have lived and died in vain. Such lives are a promise and a prophecy. We who inherit the great Christian tradition ought to find ourselves able to believe that the better world is here for the having, if we could but turn the minds of men to it. The Kingdom of God is at hand if only men change their minds. It should be one of our endeavors to make the Church a bulwark of faith in a true international ideal, resting on a faith in the divine nature of man and in the eternal redemptive purposes of God. We cannot regard man in the totality of his nature without believing that God hath spoken good concerning him. This good is to be realized in the individual and in society. Whatever the wilderness may be to-day, whatever the obstacles in our way, we can journey through and overcome all, humanity may realize a life in which God's word is power and man's word is peace.

Observations at Lausanne

THERE are many observers here. They tarry for a time to meet some of the leaders, to learn what they may of the work being done and to sense the spirit of the Conference.

"The observer," of course, is the Hon. Joseph G. Grew, Ambassador of the United States to Switzerland. He comes from Boston and impresses an observer as a rather hard-working, zealous and efficient representative who takes his responsibilities seriously.

There will be peace for a time at least. Nobody wants war. Turkey knew this from the beginning and has taken full advantage of that fact. Perhaps no one except Turkey will be satisfied with any other issue of the Conference. The Turk has proved himself a master diplomat by playing the selfishness and jealousies of the great nations one against the other. He has gained a great victory. From the beginning it was "peace at any price." The price has been a high one. Can we pay too much for peace? Theodore Roosevelt thought so when he taught us that righteousness is first. He learned that from a noble source.

Greece is to be credited with making a great sacrifice for the sake of world peace. Yet left alone, what else could she do? She has armies, but is so impoverished by her long wars that she is now anxious to demobilize and to go to work. She has no money for war munitions and little for food. The condition is deplorable in the extreme, as I can testify, often observing it from her far eastern boundary—Mitylene in the Aegean, near to Turkey, to her western reach, Corfu in the Adriatic. Most of her land is thin and much of it is rock-bound. There is a population of five million upon whom another million has been cast over night. This last is made up almost exclusively of old women and little children, all of whom are in the direst poverty and many are ill. In a single big camp there were only fifteen men. The Greek government has done its very best for all who have been thrust upon its shores, treating Armenian and Greek impartially. Every city and village in the whole nation has its quota to care for. All possible help and encouragement are given to the Near East Relief, for whom there is universal gratitude expressed in every possible way. It was in this spirit that one of the old historic palaces of Athens and one of the great, beautiful exposition halls was turned over to the relief workers. America could more easily care for and absorb twenty-five million of non-producers, all coming in a day. Would it shock us?

Politically, Greece is in a precarious condition, the government being in the hands of a military group that came into power after killing off the Royalist leaders—six being sentenced at seven o'clock and shot and buried before eleven o'clock of that day. The people accept it as a necessity following the disastrous defeat in Asia Minor, when their hopes of a Greece as glorious as that of its long since past perished forever. They lay their defeat to the alleged betrayal of Greece into the hands of the Turks by the Royalists. We saw a great spontaneous demonstration of the people in Patras in behalf of the present government.

King George II is in place, for a time at least, but certainly with no power. He is there merely to placate the Royalist sentiment. Elections will be held very soon to choose government leaders. After this it will be due time for our government to recognize the government of Greece, certainly not before. To do so would be to give too large a measure of endorsement to the many governments out here set up over night by revolutionary means. Let us be very slow to do this. Bulgaria will probably be the next seeking recognition. Let all these wait until they prove themselves worthy of association with orderly civilized society. Bolshevism still threatens many nations of the continent. They certainly need all the real help we are able to extend.

The great outstanding figure of the Conference is Eleutherios Venizelos, the Greek statesman and diplomat, honored and trusted by all. He longs for peace that his nation may disarm and repair as rapidly as possible the ravages of war. He said to me that his people must forget the past and surrender some of their most cherished hopes. He declared a nation cannot live in the past. He has no bitterness toward his nation for its base ingratitude for all he has done for his people. Twice it set him aside and has persecuted and murdered his followers and once threatened his own life.

When I referred to this as indicating the instability of the Greek character, he replied that all the nations had set aside their rulers who conducted the great war, mentioning Lloyd George, Woodrow Wilson and others. He says he will have no place in the new government or any future one, but will serve his people abroad in any way he may be able. M. Venizelos with his growing years has lost none of his zeal. He has a rarely charming personality and is big enough to be a plain man with a heart for all human welfare.

As to the Turk, who can understand him? What is his future? I believe no one can answer. His nature must be given first consideration in dealing with him. He is an Oriental and not a Westerner. Democracy is a great ideal, but many peoples are not fitted for it. A long and gradual process of education is necessary. Sinning and sinned against, the Turk elicits execration and pity. He is naturally cruel and revengeful and wholly devoid of all the finer instincts. He is deeply religious, and the more religious, often, his kind is the worse he is. Of course, there are notable individual exceptions. In common with all nations he has certain rights, but he has yet to learn that he must not use his privileges to the detriment of other peoples—to plunder, burn, murder vast populations at his own liberty. Here is where he is a victor and the Lausanne Conference fails and disappoints the world.

Before this is in print the Conference will have adjourned and not a word of protest of the murder of millions will be found in its conclusions and not a line will give the semblance of guarantee for the safety of the Armenian in the future. When the worst is said about the Armenian, still he has the primary right to life, to say nothing of liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

At the first Conference the great powers pleaded with Turkey to provide somewhere in its wide domain a home for the Armenian. This was refused, with the assertion that the Armenian was a citizen of Turkey and could live anywhere he chose. Now driven out of his old home, he is refused the right to return on the penalty of death and no recompense is made for his loss of everything.

When in Smyrna a few days since I was told by one who heard it from the Turkish governor of Smyrna himself that no Armenian who had escaped with his life should ever repossess his home. Why? Building requires effort, work—a thing the Turk is not over fond of. Armenians had thousands of quiet, beautiful, well furnished homes. The Turks occupy them now. It's an easy way to get a home. Conscience does not stand in the way. His religion has taught the Turk that his heaven will be surer and sweeter from having slain a few "Infidels"—Christians.

It should be kept in mind that Asia Minor is not the original home of the Turk. He is a foreigner there. The Greek was there more than a thousand years before he came and had built a mighty civilization which the Turk has destroyed. The Armenian never had another home. He is the old original inhabitant.

Of course, Greece should not have attempted to occupy western Asia Minor following the war. But it is never to be forgotten that she was asked to do so by England, France and the United States. Two of these in her crisis hour of destiny deserted her—the other betrayed and crucified her. It is an awful truth, but it is undeniable. That is a story the world ought to know well.

The Conference leaves the Armenian, who was an ally in the Great War, hopeless. The countries into which he escaped are overcrowded. Our country will not receive him except in very small numbers. He is a homeless wanderer on the earth. Has he had justice at Lausanne? Is he "thrice armed whose cause is just," or does any man get justice under the old order who is unable to fight for it?

Certainly nobody wants war. It should not have been necessary. The great powers only needed to put away their jealousies and greed and to let Turkey understand that there must be reparations for past atrocities, justice to the remaining Armenians and satisfactory guarantees for the future or they would back Greece to the limit. The Conference would have been over long ago and with far different results. It has dragged on through weary weeks because certain rich holders of Turkish bonds, eighty-five per cent. of them French, demand payment in gold, while Turkey dis-claims her ability to pay in gold. What is the murder of a million Armenians compared with payment in gold? Then there are concessions to be secured. The greatest hoax of all are the so-called "Chester concessions." What if America had been at the table instead of "an observer"? America has had full opportunity to be heard. She was heard in behalf of the open, free Dardanelles. There has been much more zeal for "Chester concessions" on the part of some charged with big responsibilities than in giving voice to the feelings of America touching eternal justice and right.

I wish my observations here might prove incorrect. I fear they may not. It is the same old pre-war way. Have we learned nothing? Is Christian America satisfied?

Senator Johnson Back from Europe in Belligerent Mood

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recording the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view.]

SURELY no such motley crowd was ever brought together at a banquet in America as that which gathered in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Wednesday night, July 25th. One thousand strong. There were the Republican irreconcilables sitting side by side with the followers of William Randolph Hearst; there were the adherents of the Progressive movement under President Roosevelt hobnobbing with Mayor Hylan, who claimed them as long-lost brothers; there were the radicals sitting at the same table with the strictest sect of the Republicans, brought together by their common hatred of the League of Nations. In fact, the whole assembly were united on just one thing, namely, the insistence that the United States should live purely to herself alone and have nothing to do with the rest of the world. Only such a lofty motive as this could bring the Irish agitators and the old Republican group together. One group wants to keep out of the League because England is in it, and the other because they wish the United States to live in splendid isolation.

The post prandial exercises were devoted entirely to Senator Johnson's long and most engrossing address. To be sure, Mayor Hylan said a few words in welcoming Senator Johnson home. There seemed to be almost as strong a bond of sympathy between Mayor Hylan and Senator Johnson as though they belonged to the same political party. It is to be remembered that Mayor Hylan has recently been hinting at a third party, and there are many who feel that the address which Senator Johnson made at this dinner also means a third party. Also, there was a short address by Mr. James T. Williams, Jr., of the "Boston Evening Transcript," who devoted his few minutes to an attack upon the League of Nations. After these introductory addresses, Commissioner Payne, the chairman, introduced Senator Johnson with the sneering remark that "descendants of the old colonists were preaching a loose internationalism and were trying to drag us into the political lazare of Europe." He said that "our sentimentalist internationalist friends were trying to accomplish their ends by making patriotism unfashionable." He contrasted with these Senator Johnson, who stood for patriotism and for the ideals of the forefathers.

Senator Johnson's speech has been reported almost as widely as the speeches of President Harding, so I need say nothing more here than simply point to one or two fundamental issues on which he touched. It was a very graphic and pessimistic description of the conditions in Europe to-day. He said that for four and one-half months he had been wandering about Europe and while he did not pretend to have comprehended all its vast problems, as so many Americans seem to be able to do in a few days' visit, yet he was able to see the chaotic and almost hopeless condition in which Europe has fallen. He felt sure that Europe was plunging into another great war. Everywhere about him were the signs of it and everywhere the nations were pursuing the one policy and course that would lead them to it; everywhere preparations were being made for it. He could not see that the European nations had learned any lesson whatever out of the great conflict, or that there had been any change whatever in their national policies. He said that England to-day was pursuing the same course she had marked for a century and a half. The commercial supremacy of England was always at the bottom of her political policy, and her course was kept by that and by that only. She was the enemy of France because France stood in her way. France had only one thought, and that was her continental position and her world power. Germany, disarmed and helpless, sees her fairest industrial province seized and dreams of a future day of reckoning. Italy thinks of nothing but herself. The Balkan states still retained their capacity for involving their greater neighbors in war, and everywhere was ferment and strife. He saw no signs anywhere that the Europeans were changing their habits or their ways of thinking. "Europeans will continue living and thinking in the European way." "On every hand, in every land, are distrust, suspicion, hostility and hatred; hostility and hate of one another, distrust and suspicion of us." There was no sign of change in Europe, or that anyone wanted change. The general impression throughout the whole of Senator Johnson's speech was that we were far better off to keep out of the whole matter, and that we could not do good even if we went into it.

The second point which Senator Johnson emphasized was that Europe did not want us for any advice that we could give or for any help we might render the contending nations—they are not the least bit anxious to have us come and render impartial justice or help in any process of reconciliation. The only thing that the nations of Europe have no desire for is reconciliation. One could even get the impression from Senator Johnson that they would not be happy if they were not hating each other and engaged in war and preparations for war. He found nowhere any desire whatever for American advice and no appreciation of it, should it come; but he did find everybody in Europe terribly anxious for America to enter the League of Nations and the World Court simply that they might use our money and our armies and our power for their own selfish designs. Several times Senator Johnson referred to this fact that they did not seek our advice—they sought simply our money and power as they did in 1918. It is to be remembered how gladly they welcomed our soldiers at that time, but when we offered them advice in Mr. Wilson's Fourteen Points (and, by the way, Senator Johnson seemed to think that that was pretty good advice), they turned contemptuously away from that and insisted on organizing the world on the same old basis that had preceded 1914. This is just exactly what would happen again, according to Senator Johnson. We are much better out of the whole thing, he said. Senator Johnson insisted again and again that it was not American wisdom that France and Great Britain wanted; in fact, they know that we have no special wisdom to offer. They know that they could get better special wisdom about the Ruhr, for example, from Denmark than they could from the United States. But they do not say that Denmark is essential to the League. They do say that the United States is essential to it. The difference is, that while Denmark is wiser about European affairs, the United States is the world's largest reservoir of money and one of the world's largest reservoirs of potential military man-power. "I will not take our country into this clash of selfish ambitions and the yet existing racial feuds which have written the bloody pages of centuries of European history. If we become a part of what is happening abroad, we would be but the dupe or the prey of one faction or the other. So earnestly and so firmly do I believe that the future of the Republic depends upon keeping out of the turmoil, the strife and the controversies, the schemes and machinations of Europe, that we can have no higher resolve than to dedicate ourselves to the patriotic duty in the days to come of maintaining the distinctive American policy and keeping our country free from every entanglement which would destroy that policy. In my humble fashion, without limitations of politics or candidacies I dedicate myself to maintaining America just as America has ever been."

The third point that Senator Johnson made was that of the World Court. He said that he had come home prepared to fight it to the last ditch. He criticized the President severely, although using the most respectful terms. He did not say that the President was a hypocrite. He said that the World Court was simply an appendix to the League of Nations, and that entrance into it meant entrance into the League; but he did intimate that the President was being misled, and that it was a great crime to say such things to the people of the United States. The Court was nothing but a branch of the League—entrance into it meant the League. Everybody in Europe was laughing at the President's remarks that it did not mean entrance into the League. Everybody in Europe thought that such a course was an attempt to hoodwink the people of the United States; that there was no one in Europe who was interested in the matter but he considered the World Court was a part of the League and the idea of divorcement of the two as merely a matter of jest. In our own country the same thing is true. The people who have been working for the League of Nations are now endeavoring to get us into the World Court because they know, and openly say, that it is a step into the League. It is to their mind but a preliminary move for entrance into the League. Every phrase which is being used to-day by advocates of the World Court is a paraphrase of the words which were used for entrance into the League of Nations. Furthermore, the World Court was absolutely useless as an instrument for preventing war. Senator Johnson seemed to feel that there was some power in the League itself for those nations which were in it, but that the World Court as at present constituted, was an innocuous and perfectly powerless institution. Even the nations which had set it up at the last moment practically refused to give it any power whatever. The four greatest member nations—Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan—specifically declined to submit to its compulsory jurisdiction. To have a court set up by the nations to which they were not bound to take their disputes Senator Johnson implied was a laughing stock and a joke. He paid his compliments to Secretary Hughes and Mr. Hoover in the most sarcastic part of his address. He called attention to the fact how in 1920 they signed, with several other very distinguished gentlemen, a paper in which they pledged their faith to the American people that if the Republican candidate was elected we would enter the League of Nations. Of course, when they became a part of the administration they changed their mind about the League. "It is obvious if they had not changed their views that their pledge to the American people so emphatically repudiated they could not remain members of the present administration. I congratulate them, and I congratulate the people of the United States that they have seen the error of their ways, and that to-day they would not take our country into the League, and I congratulate them upon their confession to the American people." Then Senator Johnson went on to say that they were believed in Europe even if they were not in America. They are considered in Europe the present sponsors for the United States entry into the World Court. Senator Johnson then asked his hearers whether it was not wise to accept with a bit of question their views upon this present matter when one remembers the vehemence of their views three years ago upon the League of Nations, which was infinitely more important.

Senator Johnson closed his address with a tremendously vigorous plea for America to live its own life, keep absolutely clear from European feuds which had existed for centuries and would exist for centuries more, where "another bloody war is in the making. I would prevent it if I could, but if that bloody war is no concern of ours, and comes from causes of which we are no part, I would not send a single American soldier again across the seas." God has given us the dividing oceans, he said—there people must live in the days to come as in the centuries past. Europe must put her political house in order before she invites guests to cross its thresholds. We do not view the Europeans with indifference, but we can render no help by becoming part of them. We should have a foreign policy; it is a great pity that we have none. We have had Presidents who were big enough to have one. (This was evidently a reference to Presidents Cleveland, Roosevelt and Wilson.) We ought to have a foreign policy again, but it should be our own. It is to be regretted that Senator Johnson did not intimate what this foreign policy might be, for here many would be in thorough agreement with him, that even those of us who would like to see the United States in the World Court and the League of Nations would like to see us have a splendid foreign policy. I wish Senator Johnson could have gone on and given us some idea of what this foreign policy might be. One thing would be, that the United States would insist that France submit the question of reparations to an impartial jury, and that the United States would have nothing to do with her until she did. Not only on the question of right, but on the basis that France, nor any other nation, has the right to plunge the world into another war or to upset the whole economic condition of the world as France was now doing. There are times when even nations have got to forget their own rights for the sake of humanity.

I close this letter with no other comment on Senator Johnson's views. I have written simply of what happened. It was a very significant address and I wonder if it does not mean that the country will not now line up so far as the next Presidential election is concerned, not along the old party lines or policies, but in two great camps—those who believe the United States should live by herself and for herself alone and those who believe the United States belongs to the family of nations, being an integral part of the great world movement, and both for her own sake and the sake of the world should associate herself with all nations and peoples for the establishment of an order of which the conditions of which Senator Johnson speaks truly will be no part.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Baccalaureate Sermon

By President W. H. Faunce of Brown University

"They shall be afraid of that which is high."—Eccle. 12:5.

THAT is part of the biblical description of old age. The writer in memorable metaphors notes first the physical changes wrought by the passing of the irrevocable years. He mentions the whitened hair—"the almond tree shall flourish"; the failing eyesight—"those that look out of the windows be darkener"; the quavering voice—"the daughters of music shall be brought low." But he pierces most directly to the heart of the matter when he writes, "They shall be afraid of that which is high." To be afraid is to be old. Age has nothing to do with the calendar. It is not measured by the ticking of the clock or the running of sands in an hour glass or the spinning of the earth round the sun. It is a matter of inward change, of social and spiritual attitude toward life.

We have heard much about the mental age of Americans, but the moral age is a vastly more important factor in achievement. We are told that the mental age of the average American is about thirteen years, but such a statement may be entirely misleading. We need to test more than intelligence if we would evaluate human beings. We should ask primarily as to a man's courage, tenacity, capacity for labor, willingness to do or die. The man or woman who, when facing the difficulties and dangers of life—and only those who live dangerously live happily—the man who facing life says: "That thing is true, but I cannot follow it; that is right, but I dare not do it"—that man, whether he be seventeen or seventy, is already in dotage and decrepitude. But the man who says, "That is true, therefore I accept and follow it; that thing is right, therefore I do it"—that man, whatever the calendar may say, has discovered the fountains of eternal youth and has qualified as a leader of men.

As you young people go out into a world far more perplexed and chaotic than that which your fathers faced before you, I bid you not to be afraid of hard work. Will you find your joy for the next forty years in doing as little as you can for the greatest possible reward, or in doing as much as you can and letting rewards come as a by-product? Will you find your gladness in clever escape, in holidays and vacations and exemptions, and the prospect that some day the work will be over? Or will you find your joy in penetrating to the core of every task, extracting its secret, and triumphing over difficulty? Shall life for you mean "getting by" or "going over the top?"

Laziness is an acquired vice, unnatural to human beings. Every unspoiled child loves work. He is inwardly driven to construct and create. He builds a snow fort in the winter and puts together a cart or a kite in the summer. When he grows older he delights in inventing difficulties in order to surmount them. On the golf links he constructs bunkers and hazards, setting traps of sand and water, in order to keep out of them, matching his skill against artificial difficulty. In business and professional life there is no need of creating hazards—they are there already. The secret of perpetual joy lies in turning our difficulties into adventures. We must go at our financial worries, our family problems, our business barriers in the same spirit with which the golfer leaps into a sand pit and holes out the ball. He is a poor player who gives up the game and seeks other links where the hazards are few and the course is everywhere smooth. For him the joy of playing or living has departed.

Thousands of men are rolling about the world constantly seeking a new position because they fail to explore the possibilities of the position they have. "Few places," said R. L. Stevenson, "are good enough to attract us for a whole day, but almost any place is good enough to spend a life in." The humblest village, if we settle down in it, get acquainted with its history, its inhabitants, its opportunities, may prove an El Dorado. The greatest city is a closed volume to the man who merely views it from a sight-seeing automobile. Be not afraid of your task! Settle down into it as the horseman settles into the saddle when a long ride is before him. We need not a new task, but a new mind; not a change of location, but a change of heart. Kipling was right when he said, "If you can keep your head, when all around you are losing theirs and blaming it on you, you'll be a man, my son."

Of course, this attitude of adventurous devotion is impossible if we are really convinced that the work we are doing is not worth while. It is impossible if we are simply working for wages or salary. If the pay envelope is the only connection between the man and the job, the man will soon come to hate his work. No increase in pay will bring contentment to the man who can see no outcome to his labor. The motivation of toil is the great need of the modern world. But when once we see a worthy outcome, when once we are convinced that what we are doing is of value to the social order of which we are a part, then we can face all obstacles as "gentlemen unafraid."

The great leaders of men in the Old Testament were all men who felt their own littleness, but believed in their mission. They were constantly scared, but never afraid. When Moses was summoned to face Pharaoh he cried, "O Lord, I am not eloquent." The boy Samuel when he heard the call ran trembling to Eli. Gideon cried, "I am poor and the least in my father's house." David, called to a crown, said, "I am but a little child." Amos said, "I was no prophet, nor a prophet's son." All those men, summoned to high endeavor, shrank back and pressed forward. The flesh was weak, but the spirit triumphed. They saw a thousand difficulties, but they "marched breast forward, never doubting clouds would break."

I bid you also not to be afraid of truth. None of us, of course, fears dead truths, things settled long ago. We repeat them over and over with satisfaction—the phrases in the Declaration of Independence or in the Prayer Book or in Longfellow's "Psalm of Life." But when the old phrase suddenly comes to life, and the old truth proves to have a modern application—then we feel as did the excavators in the tomb of the Egyptian Pharaoh, Tutankhamen, when amid the dried up furniture and mouldering vestments they thought they had encountered a living germ. The living truth may hurt us, and is quite sure to rebuke us. The Ten Commandments may leave the stone tablets on which they were inscribed and begin to rummage about in our daily lives. The phrase in the Prayer Book, "there is no health in us," which we repeat so complacently, may rise up in new meaning as a description of the theater we visited last evening or the social set in which we move. The sentence in the parable, "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear," which we have heard since childhood may suddenly appear a description of the cosmic process of the whole doctrine of evolution with its reinterpretation of state and church and home and school.

Dogmatism is the mental and moral attitude which is afraid of truth, because of the necessary rearrangements that truth imposes. Dogmatism in religion produces and diffuses constant panic. At the present time it is engaged in precipitating an imaginary conflict between science and religion. It says to the student, "There is the creed of your fathers—take it or leave it. Do not allow it to grow, for whatever grows is not a part of the eternal truth." To which we reply, "Whatever truth fails to grow on the horizon of man's mind, whatever truth fails to unfold new meanings and obligations, whatever conception of the universe fails to enlarge from year to year, is not truth at all, but a mere dead formula."

The ancient conception of human history was that this world started in complete perfection and has been on the down grade ever since, and can only be rescued by physical convulsion. An old divine embodied that conception in a tragic sentence, "Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens the rudiments of Paradise." The infinitely nobler, richer conception is that of the slow ascent of man from the lowest forms of life, climbing, struggling, hoping, winning, under the tuition of the Infinite Spirit, until at last the image of God comes clear in human reason, conscience, and we become partakers of the divine nature. That conception of the slow ascent is as old as Lucretius with his doctrine of the atoms, as old as Genesis with its doctrine of man arising out of the dust of the ground. What God makes in a thousand centuries is not less divine—rather much more so—than what He makes in a fleeting instant. The oak, struggling up through stormy years, reveals more of the divine than the mushroom created over night.

But dogmatism may also be found in the realms of science. The assumption of infallibility by scientists is quite as bad as its assumption by ecclesiastics. The whole realm of theological literature does not contain any book more absurdly dogmatic than Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe." Science may construct a closed system and be afraid of any truth that would disrupt the system. When medicine becomes dogmatic, then all sorts of healing cults appear, for nature will have its ironic revenge. When physicians ignore the powers of the will and the imagination, then Coué crosses the ocean. When psychology refuses to investigate certain phenomena, then Conan Doyle finds a world-wide hearing. When economics declines to consider new aspects of society, then come all the social quackeries offering to heal instantly our economic diseases. The economic determination of history means the closing of the eyes to all the spiritual history of mankind, and materialism in all its forms is a condemnation to perpetual imprisonment. Agnosticism, which may be the hesitation of a candid and noble spirit, may also be a species of inertia or cowardice, the futile despair of an irresolute and unmanly soul. "Religion," said Donald Hankey, "is betting your life that there is a God." Certainly, those who are incapable of staking their lives on any conviction can never be sure of God or immortality or duty. They have passed into old age and are fearful of that which is high.

Let us not be forgetful to entertain strangers. The new and strange idea knocking at our door may be that of an Atlantic cable, scoffed at as impracticable until it was actually laid. It may be the airplane, whose failure broke Professor Langley's heart, but could not destroy his faith. It may be the abolition of slavery, which came to Wendell Phillips when, as a young lawyer, he saw from the office window the slave dragged by the mob and chose the slave as his client. It may be the idea of Christian missions unfolded by William Carey in the church assembly until the moderator arose and cried, "Young man, sit down!" If the young man or woman does finally sit down, in science or religion or economics this will be a dead world and a prison for souls.

Now we come to the dominant fear of our own day, the fear of anything like international co-operation. Nations that five years ago were marching shoulder to shoulder, all differences forgotten in a supreme devotion, have now fallen asunder and each one surrounds itself with the barbed wire of suspicion and animosity. These petty nationalisms are all of modern origin. St. Paul journeyed from nation to nation in Europe and in Asia, and as a Roman citizen found no barriers. The division between Orient and Occident he did not recognize. A poet of the Roman Empire wrote, "Nothing human is foreign to me." But now certain fiery poets seem to say, "Nothing foreign is really human to me." Every tribe in Africa dreams of self-determination, and every nation in Europe suspects its neighbors of some sinister design. The world has fallen apart, like a picture puzzle which has dropped from the table to the lower level of the floor. What shall lift it again, what shall recombine the shattered pieces into an ordered and significant design?

This is the great task of the new generation just coming upon the stage. Official diplomats cannot learn the new lesson. They remember only the old outworn methods of self-aggrandisement. They honestly believe that the way to promote peace is to prepare for the next war. They believe that statesmanship consists in weakening competitors, and they still trust in "reeking tube and iron shard." But you men and women of the new generation have seen with your own eyes that victory cannot bring peace. You know that in a World War neither side can win—both sides lose immeasurably and forever. You know there is a better way—the way of law, not war; the way of settlement by reason, not by carnage. You have heard the dying declaration of Edith Cavell that "patriotism is not enough," and you who fought and toiled for victory in 1917 must now dedicate yourselves to international understanding and co-operation.

Booker Washington's most telling story was derived from the experience of his youth. He said that when he was a small boy he used to delight in selecting some other boy, overpowering him, and then holding him down in a ditch. One day it occurred to him that the only way he could keep the other boy down in the mire and muck was by staying down there himself, and after that discovery there was no fun in doing it.

No race can hold another in subjection without sharing the degradation. No nation can weaken another without becoming internally weak. By what right do we assume superiority to others? The finest types of physical manhood to-day are to be found in China and in India. Each of the European nations has been a bearer of precious gifts in music and art and literature and science. These gifts are international in scope and meaning. The Nobel prizes go each year impartially to men of all nations. We welcome the Moscow players to our halls, we cure our sick through the discoveries of the French, the Italians, the Japanese. Commerce is international; the postal union overleaps all barriers; music is a universal language. The racial and political animosities in which men indulge are belated survivals from a savage past, and it is for the younger generation, trained in the passionless methods of science and the larger views of history, to come forward now and help the world into a better day. Youth still can believe in the high, can rally around the ideal and attempt and achieve the impossible.

Our Secretary of State, a graduate of this university, is now asking that the great American republic shall be true to all its professions of faith in arbitration and shall bear its part in maintaining the International Court. I cannot see how any man can call himself an American and oppose acceptance of that responsibility. There is no taint of politics about it—there is the plain duty to justify ourselves and aid the broken world. We are not a craven people. We are not accustomed to refuse all responsibility until guaranteed against every possible burden. We are not by nature selfish and coldly calculating. We are the people that once rescued

China from partition and Cuba from tyranny. We are the nation that once sent ships against the pirates of the Mediterranean, that sent Commodore Perry to the gates of Japan, that sent Dewey to the Philippines.

Are we valiant only when fighting? Are we brave in khaki and cowardly in a business suit? Are we willing to place two million men in Europe for the purpose of war and afraid to send one man for the purposes of peace? I do not believe it. The heart of America is as courageous to-day as ever, but its voice has been muffled and drowned in partisan politics. The day of release now approaches.

"America first," we say, and rightly. But its deeper meaning we should cherish. It means a land not only first in wealth and power, in mines and mills, but first in love of liberty, first in succor to the needy, first in championship of the oppressed, first in the bearing of national responsibility, first in the love of man and the love of God.

"But," says some timid soul, "does entrance in the court mean that we are taking a step toward the League?" We can only answer that every treaty with other nations, every international agreement of every kind, is a step toward the permanent organization of mankind. For names and forms we care nothing. But every conference or court is a step toward the Parliament of Man. Every friendly act among the nations is a step toward the enduring friendship already attained among the States of the American Union and some day to be attained by the warring powers of the world. "The world is ruled," said Joubert, "by force and right; by force till right is ready." Shall we help the right to get ready in our lifetime?

As I passed through the stricken regions of France a year ago I came to the most impressive of all the war memorials—the simple grave of Quentin Roosevelt. Surrounded by a white wooden paling, the single shaft of stone looks out from the sloping hillside over wheat fields and emadows and a smiling landscape bounded by quiet mountains on the horizon. That grave marks the place where the radiant young soldier dropped out of the sky after his last combat in the air, buried where he fell. On it is one sentence only, "He has soared beyond the shadows of our night." The shadows are everywhere to-day, but youth can still soar.

Ambassador Jusserand, opening the general course on French Civilization at the summer session of Columbia University the other day, revived a bit of humor from the eighteenth century. Admiral Rochambeau learned English while in America, but sometimes made distressing mistakes, said Ambassador Jusserand. In writing to Washington, telling him of the marriage of Count de Grasse, he said that de Grasse had "married a woman of very bad character." He meant to say "bad temper." Washington replied sympathetically, regretting that his friend had married beneath him.

According to the Home Economics people at Cornell, a good mark in school often depends less on how hard a child studies than on what he is eating. Especially is this true in cold weather when the right food is necessary not only to supply the energies for play and for activities, but for keeping warm.

The Roman Catholics of Rhode Island have been conducting a campaign for three million dollars to build parochial high schools in the State. What a pity that we are losing the opportunity for Roman Catholics and Protestants to become acquainted with each other in the public schools!

Little Children W

THE situation among the orphans and other children of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia now in exile in Eastern Europe is so distressing that I am led to make the following suggestion:

If the readers of "The Christian Work" will supply a special fund for work among children—quite separate and distinct from the Russian Refugee Fund now in successful operation—I will go to the borders of Bolshevist Russia immediately to organize the work and place it in good running order.

I had intended to go again to the Russian frontier later on, to assist Anne Louise Howard to enlarge the scope of the relief industry that she and I put into operation, with our own funds, last Winter. I had made plans for the business of my ships with that end in view, always bearing in mind, however, that if anything came up by which my trip were delayed, the work would be carried forward, just the same, by thoroughly capable hands.

The dispersal of the Russian refugee orphanage, with the taking over of its building for use as a Jewish school, as already described in these pages, has decided me to set aside my business plans and go to the relief of the orphans at once—provided that the readers of "The Christian Work" will supply the necessary funds for the work.

The disaster to the orphanage has brought up for immediate determination a special work of relief that should have been undertaken long ago. I could not take it up last Winter, because I could not see any way by which it could be placed on a self-sustaining basis. It was necessary, at that time, that the few thousand dollars that I was able to put into Anne Louise Howard's relief industry should serve as the nucleus of a self-perpetuating fund which to give work and wages to destitute Russian gentlewomen; therefore, there was nothing left for work among orphans and other destitute children. Work for orphans cannot be made self-sustaining. The orphans cannot give anything back.

Anne Louise Howard is besieged by thousands of destitute Russian gentlewomen, whose eyesight has been so impaired by hunger, ha-ship and grief that they cannot do the exquisitely fine hand-embroidery required in making blouses. I want to employ these women in a knitting industry, and to distribute the products of that industry to Russian refugee orphans and other destitute children.

Freezing weather and snow come to that far outpost of civilization in October. Homeless orphans and starving children must be provided with shelter and food and warm clothing before that time if they are to enter the winter season with a fighting chance for life through the long, dark months of swirling snow and bitter cold.

It took me twenty-one days of constant travel to return to New York from that far-away place last March. I cannot expect to make the east-bound voyage in shorter time. If I sailed from New York next week I could not hope to reach those orphans before the first of September. That would give me only four or five weeks in which to organize the work before the coming of cold weather.

You will understand, please, that this projected work for children will not be self-sustaining, because the products of the work will be given away in direct charity to starving, half-naked children; but, that it will give work and wages to destitute gentlewomen who cannot see well enough to make hand-embroidered blouses. At the least it will be a work of two-fold beneficence: It will give knitting work to destitute women and warm articles of wearing apparel to destitute and helpless children. It may be that I shall be able to give work to still other women by buying raw wool and employing them to wash it and card it and spin it into yarn for the knitters. I cannot tell until I try; but, you may be certain that I shall do all that may be done under the circumstances.

The children of Bolshevist Russia have been fed at a cost to America of scores of millions of dollars. Bolshevist orphans have been gathered into orphanages and provided for. The sick and suffering have had medical attention. The children of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia have been left to starve and freeze and die of hunger and disease. Is it America's way?

The readers of "The Christian Work" can make at least a beginning of the desperately-needed work of relief. They can set up "The Christian Work" Orphanage immediately.

The Christian Church and the League of Nations

By Lord Robert Cecil

[The following address was delivered by this distinguished visitor to America at a luncheon tendered to him by the Commission on International Justice and Good-Will of the Federal Council of the Churches.]

I AM most gratified to be received by representatives of the churches and to have an opportunity of saying a few words upon a subject which is of interest to us all.

In my country there is no body of men who have been of greater service to the League of Nations than the representatives of the Protestant churches. In the work that I have been trying to do in my own country, I owe a deep debt of gratitude to the churches, and I doubt not that you will also play your part in the great cause of international peace, which surely is the cause of our religion. Surely a religion which rests the whole of its moral precepts on love, which declares that the chief of all virtues, must find itself hostile to the practice of war as the encourager of hate.

The ministers of all Christian churches preach love and brotherhood amongst men. Love and brotherhood—those are the foundations of any scheme for establishing peace amongst the nations of the world.

The League of Nations has as its very first words of the Covenant—"by promoting international co-operation," Those are the first words it sets out. The rest is the whole scheme of bringing the nations closer together, teaching them to co-operate with one another, teaching them that they are parts one of another.

It is a definite, conscious and deliberate application of the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount to the relations of the nations of the world.

There are only two grounds on which it might be said that the Christian Church ought not to take an active part in promoting, I don't say this particular scheme of the League of Nations (that, of course, is a matter of debate), but a scheme which is going consciously and directly to work for a closer union of the nations of the world and the elimination of war as a means of determining international disputes.

The first of those grounds is a doctrine which found great support in Germany before the war. I don't know whether it finds any support in this country. It finds a little, though very little, in my own. That is, that the moral law which applies to individuals doesn't apply to nations. The argument is put in several ways, but it is something like this: The nations—Germany, France, England, America—are mere abstractions. What you mean is the executive power of the nations—the people who determine the action of the nations, the minister, president, king or whoever he may be. And the argument goes on in this kind of way: The duty of the executive power is only to its own people; it can't be generous, or even just, at the expense of its own people. It has a trust from them to carry on their affairs to the best of its power, and it is a poor form of morality which, in the guise of generosity toward other people's interests, sacrifices those interests which have been confided to its care.

That is the more subtle way of putting the contention. The Germans put it much more brutally and clearly. They merely said that the only rule or law that governed nations was the law of strength and might; that the state was essentially a non-moral entity.

Whichever way you put it, I do not deny that you may confuse yourself with a number of subtle arguments in favor of such a doctrine; but I believe that in point of practice no decent human being would ever wish the government of his country to be carried on in defiance of moral law. I believe, as a matter of actual fact, that it would not be even advantageous for the government of a country to attempt such a policy. I believe it would lead them straight to disaster.

But for my part I am content to rest my complete repudiation of any such doctrine on what appears to me to be the whole teaching of the Bible. It seems to me that the whole of the history which we read has been written in vain unless we are taught this great national truth that a nation that despises and rejects the law of God will inevitably be punished for it by destruction from the face of the earth. That appears to me to be the absolute truth, and if that is so, no Christian teacher can consistently contend that a state is not amenable to the moral law.

The only argument that is left to him is this: He may say, "Well, I grant that peace is a great Christian object, I grant that the moral law does apply to international relations, I grant that it is part of my duty to preach and work for the application of that moral law to the doings of the government in my own country; but this particular scheme that you suggest will not be of practical advantage to peace, and therefore I am not bound to support it; indeed, if I take any action at all I am bound to oppose it as a fraudulent proposal."

I am not going to weary you with a long dissertation as to the constitution and working of the League of Nations, but I do think that any impartial person who examines the record of what it has done since it came into existence three years ago must concede that it has in fact promoted peace in a most essential manner on more than one occasion and in more than one country: that it has promoted international co-operation and international good understanding; that it has increased the happiness (as far as material prosperity can increase happiness) of many millions of human beings; that it has promoted the destruction of great social evils, and that, as a matter of actual historic evidential fact, you do find flourishing at Geneva, and in what has been well called the atmosphere of Geneva, a new spirit of international brotherhood and friendliness, a new spirit limiting the fierceness of national fear, and setting up the duty of every national, not only to his own nation but to humanity at large. And I say that if you find that spirit existing, if you see these achievements actually made, then you have no right to say that the League of Nations is ineffective. You are bound to say, if you are an honest and clear-sighted man or woman, "Here is a good thing: it may be improved, cultivated and made to grow into a solid tree. But the plant is a sound one, it is well planted, and it is our duty to tend it and cultivate it and improve it, but by no means either to neglect or to destroy it."

I want to add one other thing: The Covenant of the League of Nations is a piece of international machinery, and it is nothing more; it can be nothing more. It is a framework into which may be fitted the new spirit of which I have spoken, and in which that spirit may grow. It may prove of great value to the world: it may, after a feeble or brief existence, perish. Whether it is to be of permanent value or not, depends, as it seems to me, entirely on the spirit which is to guide it.

The last Assembly at Geneva began with a great service in the Cathedral there, lent for the purpose, in which the Archbishop of Canterbury preached a very remarkable sermon advocating the principles of the League and dwelling on the importance, the vast and overwhelming importance, of the leaders of religious thought in relation to the League.

He said it was their part to give a soul to the League. That is true. If the League is left merely as an ingenious piece of international mechanism, designed to prevent nations from cutting one another's throats and perhaps to encourage nations to work together, it may be of some value—indeed, I hope it will, even so—but it will never do that which is essential if you are to establish peace in the world, namely, change the spirit of those who have in their hands the direction of the government of the nations.

For that we must look to the religious forces of the world. They, and they alone, can accomplish that. And it is, therefore, to my mind, not only of enormous importance in each nation that the religious leaders should for the benefit of the national conscience be forward in supporting this great movement, but it is essential for the success of the movement itself. It is essential, if it is to have the strength and the courage and the spirit to discharge the great duties and functions which are laid upon it, it is essential that we should sanctify its action by linking it closer with the faith which we profess, and for that purpose we must appeal to the Churches of Christ throughout the world, for it is only they who can give that gift to suffering humanity.

An Appeal to the United States Government for Justice in the Near East

By Bishop James Cannon, Jr.

LAST September, October and November while the Turks were exterminating Greeks and Armenians in Asia Minor by fire and sword, and later by ruthless deportations, the State Department of the United States Government was literally deluged by letters of appeal from individuals, church bodies and philanthropic societies from all sections of our country urging the Government to take action to protect innocent helpless non-combatants.

Many believed then, and believe now, that a prompt appeal by our Government to the Allied Powers to unite with it in a positive clear-cut demand would have put an end then and there to Turkish atrocity and arrogance. But those appeals and protests of our people resulted in no effective action on the part of our Government, and the Turks perpetrated outrages and massacres upon Armenian and Greek men, women and children in the very presence of American and Allied troops and in full sight of the Allied warships in the harbor of Smyrna.

The Turkish general, Nourod-din Pasha, in command at Smyrna, on the testimony of French eye-witnesses, which testimony has been printed and vouched for by the said eye-witnesses, ordered the Metropolitan Bishop of Smyrna to come to his headquarters and, after denouncing him, ordered his assassination without any form of trial. This order was carried out in the most brutal and horrible manner conceivable. The bishop's beard and hair were torn out by the roots, his eyes were gouged from their sockets, his ears and nose cut off, and then, after being stabbed to death, his body was dragged through the streets until it was simply a mass of pulp.

Smyrna convinced the Turks that neither the Allies nor the United States would, under any circumstances, fight to protect the Greeks or the Armenians from outrage, torture and death. And from that date the Turks have not hesitated to work their savage will upon the Christian populations left in Asia Minor, by wholesale deportations carried out largely in the very dead of winter, and necessarily resulting in the death of thousands from cold and starvation.

The Turks literally kicked out upon the doorstep of the Christian world those bona fide residents, whose ancestors had lived in Asia Minor centuries before the Turks conquered the country, saying especially to America, "There they are, feed, clothe, care for them or let them die. We want their houses and land; we do not care what becomes of them." And neither the Allies nor the United States took any effective action to prevent the perpetration of this cruelty. The deportations took place and we did, as the Turks bade us, and saved the lives of as many of them as we could.

Moreover, the Turks at the Lausanne Conference angrily, insolently refused even to consider the claims of the Armenians for a place to live and for compensation for confiscated property, because of that same conviction that neither the Allies nor the United States would fight the Turks in order to redeem the definite solemn pledges which the said

Allies had made to the Armenians—guaranteeing to them a separate national home.

It has been indeed a cowardly, shameless betrayal of a brave and worthy people. It will be reckoned in the future as a black page in our national history. Certainly it will not match well with the statements made during the war that one of the greatest results hoped to be attained by the war was to drive Turkey out of Europe and to free Armenia absolutely from Turkish rule.

We rescued Cuba from Spanish cruelty and oppression. We have refused to recognize either Mexico or Russia because of disorder, violence, unsettled conditions in those countries, because of confiscatory property laws contrary to the international code of the world. We vigorously protested against the assassination of Francisco Madero, president of Mexico, and also against the trial and execution by the Soviet government of the Roman Catholic priest accused of treason (compare the horrible assassination of the Metropolitan of Smyrna by the Turks noted above). We sent two million men across the sea to fight against German imperialism, and spent billions of dollars to equip them and make them efficient. These things we have done. But now, although we know that Turkey—the ally of Germany—has committed far greater atrocities than Germany ever committed, for which Germany has been ordered to pay heavy reparations; although we know that Turkey confiscated the property, the houses and lands of the Armenians and deported them by hundreds of thousands to certain death in the Mesopotamian desert (the Bryce report puts the number of those who were exterminated in the 1915 deportations at nearly a million, men, women and children, which report cannot be discredited in the slightest by the horribly cynical and materialistic misrepresentations of Rear Admiral Chester, retired); and although we know that since the close of the war, notwithstanding the fact that France, Great Britain and the United States had not only solemnly pledged protection to the Armenians, but also an independent Armenian national home, the Turks have continued to massacre the Armenians, although all these things are known to the whole world, what do we see?

To-day Turkey is sitting at Lausanne, facing the great powers of the world, not as a defeated ally of Germany, Austria and Bulgaria, not that she may be adequately punished and required to make full reparation as her allies have been, but she sits there like a victor fixing the terms of the treaty, not in accordance with the views of the representatives of the great powers, but in accordance with instructions sent from time to time by the Grand National Assembly at Angora, representing seven millions of people, mostly untrained and half civilized. And Turkey has assumed this attitude because she is absolutely certain that, notwithstanding all the pledges made by the Allied and Associated Powers to the Armenian people, neither the Allies nor the United States will compel Turkey by force to satisfy the just claims of the Armenians, nor indeed to do anything which Turkey decides that she is unwilling to do. And the Turk respects nothing but force.

For many months a multitude of humane, liberty-loving, pledge-keeping Americans have watched the development of Near East conditions and settlements and they finally decided that silence was no longer possible. On May 10th a meeting was held at Madison Square Hotel, New York, attended by representatives of twenty organizations, at which meeting there was a full discussion of justice for the Near East. The sentiment of the meeting was strongly and unanimously in favor of action. A committee was appointed consisting of James Cannon, Jr. (chairman), S. M. Cavert (secretary), Stanley White, George R. Montgomery and W. C. Emhardt, which committee was instructed to prepare resolutions to be presented to the various denominational assemblies and also a statement for presentation to President Harding. The committee prepared the resolution and later the statement for the President. On Monday, June 11th, a delegation consisting of Bishop W. F. McDowell, Bishop-elect James E. Freeman, ex-Governor Henry Allen and Drs. E. O. Watson, W. C. Emhardt, Barclay Acheson and George R. Montgomery presented to President Harding a copy of the statement and thus placed before the Executive of the United States Government an appeal for justice for the Near East from the representatives of a great multitude of generous-hearted, justice-loving people of our country. It is hoped that those who read the letter to the President, which is given in full below, will write to the State Department and urge:

1. That our government invite Great Britain, France and Italy to unite in the appointment of an international commission to consider promptly and thoroughly the entire refugee problem; that if France or Italy, or both, temporize or refuse, our government and Great Britain proceed without the other countries; and that our government state positively that, if no other country will participate, then our government will take prompt action alone.

2. That our government resume immediately diplomatic relations with Greece, our faithful ally in the war against Turkey, and that our government pay to Greece the balance of the loan granted to her, of which we have paid less than one-third, to enable Greece to care for the penniless and homeless Greeks whom the cruelty of the Turks has driven to her shores.

3. That our government refuse to make any treaty with Turkey or to resume diplomatic relations until Turkey agrees to make ample reparations to the Armenians for property confiscated by Turkey, and agrees to assign to the Armenians territory for a separate home, apart from Turkish misrule and tyranny, or at least until Turkey binds herself to submit the question of justice to the Armenians to an international commission for prompt and final settlement.

It is held by some that such action on the part of our government will do no good, that the Turks do not care whether our government signs a treaty or not, and that such action on our part will result in still more suffering to the Armenians still left under Turkish rule. With this position the writer cannot agree. The Turks have continued to rob, outrage, deport and massacre the Armenians as they have willed, until now, including those in the Russian Caucasus, there are less than two million left, and any agreement by Christian nations to make treaties which ignore the wrongs already perpetrated by the Turks will simply encourage them to continue their brutality and cruelty. On the other hand, the refusal to recognize unrepentant and unpunished Turkey will brand Turkey as the outlaw nation, which she has shown herself to be.

A statement recently made by the former French Premier, Monsieur Viviani, concerning the Great War is emphatically in point as applicable to Turkey: "Since the life of the world is based on justice, no greater incentive to collective murder among nations could be provided for future generations than the scandalous spectacle of a war which remained an unpunished crime." Of all those engaged in the Great War the Turks were guilty of the greatest, most deliberate "collective murder" in the deportations and massacres of the Armenians. What greater incentive could be given to other barbarous nations, or to Turkey herself, to repeat such "collective murder" than for a great, liberty-loving nation like the United States to sign a treaty with Turkey in the face of Turkey's refusal, not only to make adequate reparations for the atrocities which she has perpetrated, but of her refusal even to discuss them.

Germany has been punished. Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria have all been punished. Russia and Mexico are still under the ban of non-recognition. Our government declared last September that to protect innocent helpless non-combatants from Turkish atrocities would require force, which the government declared it had no mandate from the American people to employ. But it will not require force to-day to refuse positively to enter into any diplomatic or treaty relations with Turkey until she has made reparations for wrongs committed. It will simply require a determination on the part of our State Department to stand for justice and righteousness in our dealings with Turkey, as we have done with all other nations in our past history.

Why should there be such tenderness in our treatment of Turkey? Of course, it is well known that there are financial and commercial interests which are pressing for the speedy ratification of a treaty. Righteousness and justice do not concern them. The sufferings and death of the Armenians are dismissed with shocking heartlessness by men like Rear Admiral Chester, retired. But this writer believes that the great mass of the American people who have given out of generous hearts over eighty million dollars to save the lives of these persecuted people prefer that our government stand unwaveringly for justice as the prerequisite to recognition. Certainly it is as much the duty of our government to represent those of our people who have invested their money for the preservation of human life without hope of monetary return as it is its duty to represent those people who are planning to invest money in Turkey in purely commercial enterprises for no purpose but monetary gain, some of whom to curry favor with the Turks and to change the attitude of the American people have printed and circulated shameless misrepresentations of the horrible conditions under Turkish rule.

The letter to the President follows:

THE HONORABLE WARREN G. HARDING,

President of the United States, Washington, D.C.:

SIR: On May 10 a meeting of representatives of fifteen denominational and philanthropic organizations interested in obtaining a just settlement of Near Eastern questions was held, and the undersigned committee was appointed to forward to you the point of view of that gathering. A list of the representatives and of the organizations is appended herewith.

We were requested to make clear to the Administration at Washington that there is a large and increasing element of our citizenship who are in favor of our resuming diplomatic relations with Greece, and who feel that our government should take a more definite stand for the securing of justice in behalf of the oppressed peoples of the Near East.

We represent those who look with grave apprehension on the apparent acquiescence by the Allied Powers in the abandonment of the Armenians to their fate without any just reparation for the wrongs that have been done them.

While we realize that the United States Government cannot be expected to assume the championship of oppressed peoples in all parts of the world, we feel that our duty in the Near East is peculiarly clear. Secretary Hughes' note to the Allied Powers on the subject of mandates in Mesopotamia is reported in the press to have taken the position that the United States, because of its part in the common victory, has "certain rights, interests and equities, none of which can be surrendered without the assent of the United States." We believe that with these rights, interests and equities come responsibilities which cannot be evaded.

An increasing number of American citizens feel that the refugee situation in the Near East is a part of the wreckage incident to the Great War, and that our government shares with other western powers a responsibility to take care of that wreckage. Those who feel in this way are ready to voice and vote to aid our government in any efforts that it may make in behalf of these suffering people. We venture, therefore, to emphasize the following point and to urge our government to include them in its program:

First, we recall that on March 30 last the Secretary of State sent a note suggesting to Great Britain, France and Italy the formation of an international commission to take care of the refugee situation in the Near East. We urge that this point be vigorously pressed until a definite reply is received from the Allies, and that our government champion the idea until some sort of favorable action results. Delay at this critical moment means actual death to thousands. We further believe that our government should bear its share in any financial provision that may be necessary to establish these refugee peoples in some place of safety and opportunity.

Second, we urge that our government should interest itself in the nine hundred thousand refugees who had been driven from their ancestral homes in Asia Minor and who are now crowded into refugee camps in Greece without money, without property, without clothing, food or shelter, except as provided by the charity of the world. The Greek government is unable financially to meet the problem thrust upon it by this extraordinary catastrophe. It is an aftermath of the war. We understand that our government pledged itself to loan Greece $48,000,000 under agreement with Great Britain and France, only a part of which has been paid, and that against this pledge the Greek government issued currency for the full amount. We recognize that there may be conditions unknown to us why this loan has not, or may not, be fully paid, but we request the President to consider favorably the possibility of doing so, either by obtaining authorization for the rest of this loan to be paid, or by offering a new loan to furnish additional funds on condition that Greece will use it in caring for those refugee peoples.

Third, we view with grave apprehension the action of the first Lausanne Conference which seemed to abandon the project of the Armenian National Home, and we urge upon our government that in negotiating a new treaty with Turkey it revive the project as presented to the first Lausanne Conference by our delegation, and that it be so insistent in pressing the matter as to make its ratification of a new treaty dependent upon the recognition of the justice due to the dispossessed Armenians.

We ask this in the name of moral right and justice, and we feel that our government could in no way more surely win for itself the approval of the people of America than by a clearly defined and constructive plan (and plea) in this matter. Yours respectfully,

SAMUEL MCCREA CAVERT, Secretary.
JAMES CANNON, JR., Chairman.

Colonel Bell, of Syracuse, after nearly two years in the work of the American Relief Administration in the Bushkir region between European Russia and Siberia, makes this comment on Russians: "The Rusians are all right if you treat 'em decent and give 'em a sense of responsibility, and don't let yourself say 'all right' to arguments, but decide, one way or the other, quick, and stick to it." Colonel Bell should be a good councilor to the chancelleries of the world.

The church at Forest Hills, Long Island, is said to have been the first Community Church in the United States. Now it has entered the Presbyterian fold. Is this a straw suggesting that the idea of the Community Church is not permanently satisfying?

A Reply by Chauncy B. Brewster, Bishop of Connecticut, to an Open Letter of the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth

MY DEAR DR. SMYTH: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of An Open Letter. Your purpose in addressing it to me you state to be in order that I and my clergy might have opportunity to correct any misunderstandings before the meeting of your General Conference. An Open Letter was received June 9th. The General Conference, I understand, was held on the 12th. Those three days were filled with engagements of imperative duty. After a series of appointments at a distance I take my earliest opportunity to reply.

At the outset, let me express my conviction that you have been in important respects a true seer, and my recognition that you have hitherto manifested a spirit of large-hearted generosity and magnanimous understanding of positions other than your own.

In a letter of May 14th you wrote that you would be compelled to lay the whole matter before the public. I replied, "I have no objection to the public knowing the facts." The facts, however, have not been made public. This has been, I dare say, unintentional and through misunderstanding, although the facts were plainly stated in my letters to you.

As a consequence of your Open Letter and subsequent action in your Conference, much has been said in the press about my refusal to ordain Dr. Bainton. Your Open Letter refers to his "application." As a matter of fact, he never made written or oral application to me. Your Open Letter on its first page quotes from your letter to me "under date of April 3rd." The date of that letter was April 23rd, with a postscript dated April 24th. In this letter you wrote of "a possible application of the new canon."

This letter was received at my busiest time in the year, amidst my preparation for the Diocesan Convention. Far from turning the cold shoulder upon the proposition, I took my earliest opportunity myself to seek and secure an interview with Dr. Bainton, having first arranged that our Standing Committee remain after the Convention to consider this case, their "advice and consent" being required by the Canon. The Rev. Dr. Beardsley I called in to the interview, he being a member of the Standing Committee.

At the outset of our conference Dr. Bainton said that he had not read the Concordat or Canon, nor understood its details, until then, and that upon further knowledge he found he was not ready to accept its requirements. All the objections to procedure came from him. We parted with a mutual understanding of each other's position. Dr. Beardsley's impression and memory will bear me out as regards the interview. To this interview your Open Letter makes no reference except in the following particular.

In my report to you of the interview and of my consequent decision I wrote, in order to make my position clear: "Nothing came up which caused me to have doubt about his doctrinal views." Your quotation of this has produced the impression, stated in the public press, that I conducted an examination. Of course there was no examination into the doctrinal belief of a gentleman who had stated he was not ready to proceed under the Concordat.

Having upon this interview based my decision, I wrote you on May 11th: "You will, I know, be much disappointed at this result. You may be interested to know that on my return home I find a letter from Bishop Lawrence, to whom I wrote in regard to the proposition. You well know Bishop Lawrence's spirit and his position, which is far removed from anything extreme. He writes me as follows:

"Immediately after the last convention I received two applications from ministers wishing to be considered subject to ordination under Canon 11. After studying the Canon I made up my mind that as the General Convention had not made provision for carrying out the conditions, I did not feel at liberty to take any action in the matter, and I wrote those two men to that effect."

This position of Bishop Lawrence was quite apart from my own decision of the case. You had suggested my consulting other bishops, particularly Bishop Manning, our most conspicuous champion of the Concordat. His statement I sent to you. It appears, with verbal changes, on page five of your Open Letter. Bishop Manning writes: "If no action had been taken by the Convention in regard to this I should hold that we were at liberty to make the changes which the Canon calls for. The fact is, however, that action was taken. As you will remember, the matter was discussed in the House of Bishops and we took action authorizing these changes in the Ordination Service. Greatly to my surprise, the House of Deputies did not concur in this action, but rejected it by a very decisive vote. The Convention having therefore definitely refused to authorize these changes, I should not feel at liberty to make them, and I do not see how we can proceed under the Canon while the matter stands as it does."

At the end of my letter of May 17th I wrote: "After this legal question of canonical authority has been raised, and raised by those who have championed the Concordat, I see I ought not to take action, were action desired by Dr. Bainton, without further light." I intimated that I might bring up for consultation among the bishops at our Provincial Synod, not, as you say, "Professor Bainton's application," for he had made none, but this legal question that had been raised.

It is not to be wondered at that there should be difficulties and delay in carrying into effect an arrangement which was far from receiving the unanimous approval of our clergy and people. I pointed out to you that the House of Bishops did take action and adopted a canon authorizing certain variations from the prescribed ordination services which would be required in such cases, but which apparently had not been foreseen by the committee. This canon was not concurred in by the House of Deputies and, without such concurrence, failed to be enacted.

In the Episcopal Church there is a traditional cherishing of liberty and jealousy on its behalf. It is a liberty secure.

by law. Thus the bishops, far from having unlimited authority, are, as I wrote you, "under the law." You refer to "the Bishops in Council." Their so meeting, let me explain, is exclusively for counsel, and no action could be there authorized which would be inconsistent with their obligations under the constitution and canons of the Episcopal Church. You write that in the Lambeth Appeal "no mention at all is made of the Church of England." It is, however, there distinctly said that action in carrying out its suggestions must be taken by the authorities of national, regional or provincial churches.

A fair review of all the facts affords no warrant for your intimation, on page seven of An Open Letter, that there has been an evasion of the issue. I must express surprise at your desire that the bishops should act by themselves without the consent of the people. Such a position I had supposed altogether inconsistent with the Congregational theory, wherein we on our side recognize a true principle to be embodied. In my letter of May 14th I reminded you that half the members of the House of Deputies are laymen, and I added, "This whole process is educational."

In the movement toward Christian unity there is continuous need of patience, the patience of faith. There are conceivable results which might be merely superficial. My own people I have more than once warned to beware of short cuts which might soon bring us to a chasm impossible to cross, but to trust rather in the more patient process of building roads to unity. I myself cherish faith in the outcome of scholarly research, and hope in the possibility of thus at length reaching positions which might enable Christians from different standpoints and by different approaches to come together on what might be found to be common ground.

In my belief the paths to unity are the ways of openness, of utter fairness, of mutual consideration for positions conscientiously held, of fraternal conference, and of prayer. Surely we may cherish faith in the ultimate issue if we rise to the height of that great prayer, "that they all may be one."

I am, sincerely yours,

CHAUNCEY B. BREWSTER.

The Russian Incident—A Plain Statement

By Bishop Edgar Blake

INASMUCH as many inaccurate and misleading reports have appeared in the public and religious press concerning my recent mission to Moscow it may not be improper for me to give the Church a plain statement of the facts in the case.

Let me put at rest at once certain statements that have been given wide prevalence that have no foundation in fact whatever. The story that I had my pockets picked in Moscow is a pure fabrication. It is too false to have been written, too silly to have been believed and unworthy of repetition in any reputable religious journal. My pockets were not picked in Moscow or anywhere else. In no way was I molested or interfered with at any time while I was in Russia. Moscow was as quiet and orderly as an American city. Person and property were probably safer from theft, holdup and murder than in New York or Chicago.

The report that I said of the Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church, "Tikhon has lost the game and must pay the penalty," has not the slightest truth in it. I gave no interview, nor did I have any conversation on any subject whatsoever with the reporter who sent out the story. It was the creation of a low and vulgar mind whose purpose was to create something sensational regardless of the truth. The only interviews I had in Russia or elsewhere regarding the Patriarch were with representatives of the Soviet government, with whom I interceded in the Patriarch's behalf, and with certain leaders of the Council, whom I urged to use their influence to prevent any personal harm coming to Tikhon.

I did not endorse the Soviet government, nor did I commit the Methodist Episcopal Church to its support in any way whatsoever. Insofar as the present Russian government aims to abolish ignorance and poverty among the masses of the Russian people, to deliver them from the exploitation and oppression to which they have been subjected for centuries, to secure for them the full and rightful fruits of their own toil, and to bring them those blessings and comforts which nature and God intended for all men and not for a privileged few, with such aims I am in fullest sympathy, as I believe every Christian man should be. It is my sincere belief that the Christian Church should dedicate itself to the realization of these aims without any hesitation or reservation whatsoever. This is not Bolshevism, but ordinary Christianity, as I understand it. The present form of government in Russia and the means and methods used for its support I do not approve, and have not at any time or in any way endorsed or given them my support. Unless the present social and economic and political policy of the Soviet government is radically modified I do not think it can or should succeed.

When the Board of Bishops accepted the invitation to send representatives to the proposed Moscow Council, Bishops Nuelsen and Bast and myself were assigned to act in that capacity. At that time the Council was announced to meet in February. Later the date was changed to April, and when our delegation met in Berlin on April 15, ready to go into Russia, we were notified that the Council had been postponed again without date. Under the circumstances the delegation could do nothing but postpone its visit to Moscow, which it did. It seemed desirable, however, in view of the conflicting reports coming out of Russia, that some one should go and, if possible, find out the actual situation as to religious conditions in general and the proposed Council in particular. Also, in view of the misgivings which had been created within and without our Church as to Bishop Neulsen's report on Russia, and the invitation conveyed through him to the Board of Bishops and accepted by them, that some one should go into Russia and make another and independent investigation. Therefore, at Bishop Neulsen's own urgent request I went to Russia to restudy the situation. I went, however, with the understanding and intent that should the Council meet during my stay in Russia, and should I find it to be a free Council, representative of the Russian Church, I would attend its sessions and discharge the duties to which I had been assigned by the Board of Bishops.

Dr. Hartman of the "Zion's Herald" was my companion during the entire trip in Russia. No one could have had a more capable and agreeable associate than he on so difficult and delicate a mission. I wish to acknowledge my very great indebtedness to his keen insight into men and affairs, his invaluable counsel and his unfailing patience and determination under most trying conditions. But, as I do not wish to involve him in any way in what was said and done by me, I shall speak only of myself in what follows.

On my arrival in Moscow I learned the Council was to convene on Sunday, April 29. I immediately wired Bishop Nuelsen of this fact. On account of his episcopal engagements he was unable to come to Moscow, and, as Bishop Bast was ill, I was left alone as the only member of our delegation in Russia when the Council met.

My first effort in Moscow was to develop the facts concerning the Council, especially its status with reference to the Russian Orthodox Church and its relations, if any, to the Soviet government. I found the facts to be substantially as follows:

When the Czarist régime was overthrown M. Lvov was appointed Procurator of the Holy Synod, or head of the Church, by the Kerensky government. The new Procurator immediately summoned a Church Council to deal with the situation created by the revolution. This Council was composed of the bishops and archbishops of the Church, ex-officio, and certain delegates chosen by the diocesan conventions. The diocesan conventions were made up of delegates chosen by the district conventions within the diocese. The district conventions were composed of delegates chosen by the local parishes within the districts. Among other things, the Council re-established the Patriarchate and elected Archbishop Tikhon to that office. It also provided that the Council should meet every five years thereafter. Since then, however, no Council has been called until the recent Council of Moscow.

When the Patriarch Tikhon was placed under arrest in May, 1922, he was waited upon by a group of the clergy who discussed with him the crisis that had arisen within the Church. According to them, the Patriarch suggested and requested that a Council should be assembled and asked this group to act as a committee to call it. The committee added seventeen other members to its number, making a committee of twenty-one, under whose supervision the Moscow Council was called. The regulations governing the selection of its membership were the same as those governing the membership of the Council of 1917, the validity of which has never been questioned. The local parishes first elected delegates to the district conventions, every member of the church being allowed to vote provided he had partaken of the communion within one year. The district conventions elected delegates to the diocesan conventions, and the diocesan conventions elected the delegates to the Council. The bishops and archbishops of the Church were ex-officio members of the Council. It is difficult to see how a Council could have been selected in a more democratic manner or by a method better calculated to make it truly representative of the Church as a whole. There was no evidence that the elections had been controlled by the government or that coercive influence of any kind had been used. That personal ambitions and party interests may have been factors in the elections no one would doubt who is at all familiar with ecclesiastical politics. Our own General Conference, one of the freest and finest ecclesiastical bodies in the world, has not been able to rid itself entirely of such influences. Within the Council there was no evidence that the Soviet government had packed it or controlled it. On the contrary its deliberations and decisions appeared to be the free and untrammelled expression of its own mind and conscience upon the questions before it.

The sessions of the Council were deliberate, dignified and devout. Its spirit was free and progressive. There was a clear determination to free the Church from those relations, practices and superstitions that had brought the Church into disrepute under the old régime and made it the tool of the state and an agency of oppression, ignorance and superstition.

The Patriarchate was abolished and the direction of the Church placed in the hands of an Executive Council chosen by the representatives of the people and responsible to them. The separation of Church and State was recognized and approved. Celibate restrictions were removed from the higher clergy and the sacredness of the home and married relations recognized. The worship of relics was denounced as a superstition and an evil to be abolished by enlightening the people. Measures were taken to provide for an educated clergy and to restore preaching in the Church, which was forbidden under the Czarist régime, except as sermons were censored by the government. The Council recorded itself as aggressively favorable to the largest program of social justice for the working class. It repudiated the anti-religious platform of the Communist party. It pledged full support to the social aims of the revolution.

In several matters the action of the Council did not appear to me to be either wise or expedient. The unfrocking of Tikhon seemed to be both unwise and unnecessary. Likewise the language of the Council in defining its social program was too much affected by its immediate atmosphere to be a judicial definition of Christian duty for all times. In spite of its defects, however, there was much in the Council to commend it to an unprejudiced observer.

There were five groups or parties in the Council—the Living Church, the Apostolic, the Resurrection, the Old Régime and the Non-Partisan. The first three groups were reformist. They differed in matters of theology, liturgy and internal government, but they were one in their purpose to separate the Church from the State, to democratize its control, to spiritualize its message, to socialize its ministry, to purify its practices and to energize its life. The Non-Partisan group had no platform, but generally acted with the Reformist groups. The Old Régime party was for the restoration of the old order, both in Church and State. Its spirit was reactionary and monarchistic. Its numbers were few and its influence was limited. The Reformist groups constituted the working majority of the Council and controlled its actions. It may fairly be said that the Russian Orthodox Church is now under the control of the liberal and progressive groups and will continue to be unless the Czarist régime is restored, which seems altogether improbable. Whether these groups have the wisdom and balance to guide the Church through its present crisis is yet to be determined. That they may succeed and the Church be saved from disaster every friend of Russia and religion must devoutly wish and pray.

The attitude of the Soviet government toward religion at the present time appears to be one of tolerance toward those churches and priests that confine their activities to the duties of their calling and content themselves with the spiritual and social ministry of the people. It is avowedly hostile toward those churches and priests suspected of counter-revolutionary activities against the government and suppresses them with an oppressive hand.

In order to understand the situation it should be remembered that under the old régime the Church was the creature of the state. Through the Procurator of the Holy Synod, the Czar's personal appointee and representative, the Church was controlled by the state for the state. It was the chief support of the monarchy and the principal bulwark of absolutism. The Procurator of the Holy Synod was the most powerful and sinister influence in the political life of Russia. The Church was feared, hated and cursed by those who were struggling for liberty against the Czarist régime. When the revolution came under Kerensky the leaders of the Church refused to recognize it. When the Soviets came to power they were anathematized. The leaders of the Church stood for the restoration of the monarchy. And certain of the bishops went so far as to inaugurate a movement for the restoration of the old régime under the Grand Duke Nicholas. The Church was the only organization in a position to successfully challenge the Soviets, and certain of its leaders did not hesitate to use it as a counter-revolutionary agency against the new government.

It should also be remembered that the Soviet leaders are frankly atheistic. They regard religion as a product of superstition and look upon the Church as an enemy of intellectual and social progress. It is the institution the Soviets fear most and the one of which they have most reason to be afraid. At the beginning they took an attitude of hostility and oppression toward the Church. Priests who were suspected of counter-revolutionary activities or sympathies were often ruthlessly and brutally dealt with. The oppressive measures of the government went far beyond the necessities of its own safety, and the Church suffered far beyond its deserts. It is one of those sad and brutal chapters that are written in every revolution.

A change of attitude has taken place both within the Church and within the state. To be sure, the Russian clergy outside of Russia is as hostile to the Soviets as ever, and from their position of safety are carrying on their warfare as actively and bitterly as in the past. But within Russia open opposition to the government has practically ceased and the Church is accepting the situation and adjusting itself to it.

A change has also occurred within the government. The Soviets have discovered that religion cannot be killed by oppression. They have learned that persecution intensifies devotion. Hence the change in the policy of the government and the adoption of an attitude of tolerance toward churches and priests that devote themselves to the duties of their sacred calling and refrain from activities against the government. The churches of Russia are not closed. Fifty thousand priests are doing their work as usual. I attended a service in the Cathedral at Moscow where more than ten thousand people were present and there was no interference of any kind whatever. I preached twice in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Petrograd to crowded congregations. Our people have carried on their activities throughout the revolution without any interference from the government whatever, and their work is more prosperous to-day than ever. It is the universal testimony that more people are now attending the services of the Church than before the revolution. It was only ten days ago that Protestant Bibles were publicly burned in Rome as immoral literature. The ceremony was blessed by a bishop of the Roman Catholic Church and eulogized by a deputy who had previously attacked the Methodists in the Italian Parliament and called for their expulsion from Rome. So far as I know no such an edifying spectacle has yet occurred in Moscow. There is undoubtedly a larger measure of religious tolerance in Russia than in any country of Europe and America that is dominated by the Roman Catholic Church.

This will doubtless be strange reading to those who have accepted as trustworthy the propaganda that has filled the American press since the execution of the Roman Catholic priest. It may be well, therefore, to state with entire frankness certain significant and sinister facts. When the Soviets decreed that the jewels and treasures of the churches should be taken for the benefit of the famine sufferers the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics again refused to recognize the authority of the government, and the archbishop issued a letter to his priests instructing them to disregard the decree and resist its execution, which certain of them did. Immediately the Soviets accepted this challenge and placed the archbishop and certain of his priests under arrest and brought them to trial for resisting the civil authority. Their trial was public and lasted many days. Its proceedings were published in full. Nothing was done in a corner. During the trial documentary evidence was introduced showing that M. Budkiewicz, a Russian citizen of Polish extraction, had had incriminating relations with the Polish government at the time when Russia was at war with Poland. He was found guilty and sentenced to death, not because he was priest or because he had taught the catechism to children, as certain of the public and religious press have said, but because he was convicted of treasonable acts against his own government.

The public press, particularly of England and America, was filled with lurid accounts of this incident. The Soviets were charged with murdering priests because they were priests, in order to destroy religion and the Church. Public opinion was profoundly stirred. Meetings of protest were organized and resolutions were passed without number. Probably a more astute and effective campaign of propaganda was never conducted. Political influences were brought to bear upon the foreign offices of Europe and America. Governments were moved to file protests against the Soviets as persecutors of religion, and one government went so far as to threaten war. Even Washington so far forgot its policy of international timidity as to file a protest against the Russian government. It is an interesting fact that the Vatican did not file a protest; it merely asked for the facts. So long as the Soviets confined their hostilities to the priests of the Russian Orthodox Church not a newspaper raised its voice, not a foreign office filed a protest. But immediately a Roman Catholic prelate was brought to book the matter became an international incident. When I asked the reason for this the Moscow correspondent of the "Chicago Tribune" volunteered the information that the present campaign of propaganda against the Soviets was instigated, inspired and directed by the Roman Catholic authorities. He stated that it was due to the fact that the Soviets had dared to lay their hands on Roman Catholic ecclesiastics as they had done with the priests of the Russian Church. In this connection it is an interesting fact that the Moscow representative of the Associated Press, through whom much of the present material has come out of Russia, is an active Roman Catholic. The representative of the "New York Herald," whose stories have been of an especially lurid character, is likewise a Roman Catholic, as is also the Russian correspondent of the largest and most influential newspaper of Great Britain. It is not without significance that a large part of the news that comes to the outside world from Russia comes through Roman Catholic sources. One does not need to be an expert in secret service to discover the hand of the Jesuit in the present propaganda. He has only to look at the facts to find abundant evidence to justify the rather frank statement of the "Tribune's" Moscow correspondent.

It is not alone the Soviets who have been misrepresented. Others, and particularly the Methodists, have received their full share of misrepresentation. We have been accused again and again by the Catholic controlled press of being in league with the Soviets and supporting their efforts to destroy religion and the Church in Russia. One newspaper has gone so far as to declare that the Methodists instigated and are responsible for the Bolshevik revolution itself. The unfortunate and inexplicable thing is that certain Methodist officials in America were caught in the Jesuit net and unwittingly allowed themselves to become the tools of the Vatican game.

The greatest danger to the Russian Church at the present time, as I see it, does not arise from the persecution of the Soviets, but from the lack of an adequately trained priesthood. Before the war the Orthodox Church had more than fifty theological seminaries and academies for the training of its clergy. These schools were swept away in the revolution. Not one of them is left. Seldom if ever has a great church been placed in a more pitiful plight than that in which the Russian Church finds itself to-day with reference to theological education. It requires 3,500 new priests annually to recruit its ranks, and it has not graduated a candidate for the priesthood for five years. It has been obliged to fill up its forces with untrained men, and many of its churches are without priests of any kind.

Under the old Czarist régime priests were not allowed to preach to the people except their sermons were first censored by a government official. Under the Soviets this restriction has been removed and the people are now demanding that their priests shall preach to them and interpret and defend their faith. The priests are not prepared for this new duty and a strain is being put upon them for which they are not equal. Unless a way can be found by which the Church can train its priesthood for this new responsibility the outlook is dark for religion in Russia. The Church must have a trained priesthood or lose its leadership of the people. If the program of the Soviets succeeds and Russia becomes a literate nation, as seems likely, and the educational work of the Church collapses, as seems certain unless outside aid is given, Russia is likely to drift into atheism and irreligion. The leaders of the Church are keenly alive to the peril that confronts them and are doing their best to meet it. They have no money to re-establish their theological schools; therefore, as a temporary measure, they are creating courses of study for their candidates somewhat after the plan of our Methodist Conference courses. They are also preparing special courses for priests already in service to help them meet the spiritual and intellectual demands of the new day. These courses are to be given by correspondence under the direction of competent theological faculties composed of the best and strongest teachers of Russia's former theological schools. These faculties will also be used for extension lectures and for district and diocesan institutes in which the priests and candidates for the priesthood will be brought together for intensive training. In this way it is hoped that the Church may be brought through the present crisis until it is in a position to re-establish its schools.

Unfortunately, the Church is not in a position to finance even this modest program. It has no resources. It must have help or its plans will fail. The situation is a critical one. Aid must be given. Believing that it is vastly better to hold the Russian Church to Protestant contacts than to permit it to turn toward Rome, or to drift into its own decay, Dr. Hartman and myself underwrote its educational program for $50,000 and agreed to raise this amount in America during the next three years. With what the Church can do for itself this will enable it to establish and maintain its study courses until a better day dawns. There is no "mystery" about this pledge, as one of our official advocates has represented. The character of the pledge is perfectly clear, likewise the motives and the necessity that prompted it. None of our denominational boards are involved. Not even the Methodist Church is responsible for this gift. Only Dr. Hartman and myself, who made the pledge, and Bishop Nuelsen, who approved it, are responsible for it. The obligation and the burden are ours alone and having gone forward we shall not turn back.

Methodism faces a great opportunity and a great responsibility in Russia. It is within our power if we will to shape in a large measure the evangelistic and social ideals of the Russian Church and to determine in a large degree the lines of its future development. Sympathetic contacts are already established. If we now have enough of the spirit of denominational sacrifice to forget ourselves, and bigness enough to build for the Kingdom of God and not for Methodism; if we have the statesmanship to grasp and guide a great opportunity, we can save the Russian Church and in so doing save Russia. Personally, I have a profound faith in the unselfish idealism of American Methodism. Leaders may hesitate and officials become afraid, but I have never known the great rank and file of our people to hesitate or hold back in a great emergency when the call of God was sounding for advance. I do not believe they will fail now.—The Christian Advocate.

It is not only to-day that men have been deceived by foreign propaganda. The French Ambassador told his hearers at Columbia at the opening of their summer session this month that the English taught Americans in the days before the Revolution that Frenchmen frizzed their hair and painted their cheeks. "So," he commented, "Americans were much surprised when they found that the French who helped at Yorktown were real soldiers."

Bulgaria is a peasant country. Nevertheless, there, as in much of the world, the towns are of increasing importance. The overthrow of the Stamboulisky Cabinet in Bulgaria and the subsequent shooting of the Premier are incidents in a revolt of the towns against domination by the peasants, and is a temporary victory for the militarists. King Boris is said to have aided the revolutionists, who were supported by the regular army, and civil war is now in progress between them and the Agrarians. The official announcement was that Stamboulisky was "shot while attempting to escape," a formula familiar in Mexican revolutions. Bulgarian Nationalists had hoped at Lausanne to reacquire some of the territory which they had lost in Macedonia. Their disappointment largely explains the uprising. The new provisional Cabinet of Bulgaria is dominated by the commercial and middle class interests of the country.

The Church of the High Threshold

By Rev. F. C. Hoggarth

IN his autobiography, Father Tyrrell speaks of the shock he experienced over his easy admittance into the Jesuit order. In his reading he had conceived the order and its members soaring above earth on wings of sanctity, yet they were willing to admit him after "a perfunctory confession," though he had never shed a tear over his sins except from occasional disappointment or vexation. They appeared ready to accept any material, undertaking by the efficiency of the system to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. He thought every member would be governed by the zest of Ignatius, the founder of the order. He was disillusioned. The methods of prayer he found wooden and unreal. The "exercises" were petrified by a prevailing lack of mysticism and those who were most loyal to the system he found the most disagreeable and the least charitable. Nor is the case of the Jesuits exceptional. Their failure is part of a widespread imperfection of all orders and churches. As soon as they are organized the disciples begin to lose the spirit of the Master—the vision fades, the early simplicity and sincerity is lost. They trust in organization, where he trusted in the Spirit. And though as one writes, "they may join the Order of St. Francis, they will not call the birds their sisters, nor the sun their brother."

Tyrrell's experience is not uncommon. Youth is the age of idealism. It expects in the Church a deep intensity of devotion, a large inspiration, and is all too often disappointed. Anxious to secure "converts," to link up the young in fellowship, the Church often unwittingly shocks their idealism. There has been and is a certain facility of entrance that dismays them. There are some at least of our young people, potentially among the finest we have, who regret that they ever joined the Church. Some, like Tyrrell, have been astonished at the lowness of the threshold. They expected that a big demand would be made of them, but there was nothing of the kind. All that was asked was a rather unheroic conventionalism. They have been disillusioned. The apparent indifference and dissatisfaction of not a few is born of that inner failure of the Church. One young fellow at least I know who joined a church and would have responded to a big challenge, especially to the clarion note of social service, but it was never sounded. The church was lax and members apparently loved to have it so. That youth, still nominally a member, has lost interest. Virtually, the church has lost him through its failure to challenge his idealism.

In such cases it has been customary to blame the young—for their worldliness, their indifference, their selfishness. But there is more than that in it. What if after all the real worldliness and indifference is in the middle-aged? Are we not convention bound? Is there not a curse of middle-class respectability on us? Is not Christianity, as we profess it, a compromise between Galilee and the world, not at all like the original in its fervor and purity and power? We sing about "Onward, Christian Soldiers," yet in the light of France and of Flanders on the meaning of "enduring hardness" and of the discipline of obedience, do we really and intimately know the meaning of Christian soldiership? And if we do fail to speak the big challenge to youth's idealism, is not the reason to be found in our failure to live the challenge? The laxity of the threshold is thus simply a symptom of a laxity within the Christian order. The only church with a future, says Dr. Hutton, is the church with a high threshold. And that presupposes that those already inside, those who have succumbed to the conventions and formalisms and indifference of middle age, must come out and step over the same high threshold.

In other words, the Church needs more spiritual discipline—not of church courts, but of the life and the spirit—the burning discipline of a great contagion and a worthy ideal. We must regain the soldier's discipline of the single aim, for we have tried to serve God and mammon. The soldier entangleth not himself. He casts aside every weight. Early in the war there were cases of men who took small cameras with them to the front. Photographic firms at home persuaded them of their great advantage. But once in the fighting zones cameras were thrown away. Face to face with the real things, with life or death as the stakes, a camera seemed an impertinence. In any case, the soldier on service has no room for luxuries in his kit. There was a great unburdening as men came near to the conflict. A great array of otherwise desirable things had to be fired out, because men too heavily burdened cannot fight effectively.

In describing their Christmas Day banquet near the trenches and how it ended at nine o'clock a soldier friend of ours added an explanation, "We soldiers must get our sleep." At the base things were different often unworthily different. In the line men had to keep fit, ready for stern and unexpected demands. To go to bed at nine o'clock, like children, was part of the discipline of fitness. A little thing, of course, yet eloquent of how different an attitude from that of the piping days of peace.

To be at our best, as fit and unburdened as may be, for the great campaign of righteousness in the land and on the earth, should be the ideal of every Christian. For as a Christian he is pledged to a campaign. To win such fitness will be no easy task for the Church. It will call both for courage and sacrifice. Six years ago Mr. A. E. Burroughs said that "the question which faced us was whether we should have the courage and the faith to be consistent and to make the volte-face in a thousand details of life which such consistency will demand." The words are still true. The volte-face has not been made. Whatever weakens our effectiveness must go, not only the entanglements and distractions of worldliness, but of routine and of ecclesiastical organization. So much energy is spent on trivial things and on obedience to the letter that the great order and object is forgotten. The Church too often has lived its life without ever coming up against the "real thing."

Of such new discipline will be born new strength, a fine consciousness of purpose and of power, and with it the ability to speak, as it should be spoken, the great Christian challenge to youth. For their sakes we ought thus to sanctify ourselves.

What the League of Nations Has Done for Austria

I BELIEVE that the most important achievement of the League is its operations in behalf of Austria. As the League thought its duties were to take counsel to evolve a scheme which would rescue nations from economic ruin, it brought forth such a scheme in favor of the Austrian Republic which appeared just at the right moment.

It may be permitted here to state quite briefly wherein the general distress of Austria consists. Among the number of small states new-born by the peace treaties, the weakest of all is the Republic of Austria. Even the old Austro-Hungarian monarchy was not capable of feeding its population of fifty-two millions by the products of its own soil. Before the war the imports of corn, after deducting the export, amounted to sixty-one million kronen, and there was a shortage of corn amounting to 0.13 quintals per head a year. The new Austrian Republic numbers six and one-half million inhabitants, thirteen per cent. of the former number. As the largest part of the new Austria is a hilly and mountainous country, the harvest is comparatively smaller than in former days. Thus the republic is in a substantially worse position. She needs a much larger import and has, on the other hand, a currency entirely ruined.

If there had been carried through the third of the points stated by Woodrow Wilson in his address to the Congress, January 8th, 1918, which reads, "The removal so far as possible of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance," Austria's situation would be a good deal better, indeed. More than any other state Austria is obliged to carry on the most extensive foreign trade, and she is obviously not able to unfold her productive powers as long as these limitations of trade are maintained. Nevertheless the people, whose aspiration only is to live in peace with their neighbors and peaceably within their boundaries, repairing as far as possible the wounds of the war from which they are suffering, made gigantic steps toward self-help, trusting that the League would assist their own endeavors.

Curtailed of all the big textile, glass and porcelain industries as well as the sugar refineries with which the monarchy was abundant, the population trod the thorny path of building up all these branches of industry anew without foreign support. Furthermore, Austrian industry doubled the electric water plants and is going to quadruple them. Already by this the amount of imported coal will remarkably decrease, if not now, certainly within a year or two.

Of course, we must not conceal from ourselves that all these performances have been started only on account of the certainty of the League's help. The existence of the League restored the hope to get what had been promised in the treaties and strengthened our energy. And the League, on the other hand, gained the conviction that Austrian people are able usefully to employ every help offered to them. Government and industry working together gave the best example of improvement by self-help out of a quite despairing wretchedness. Then under the League's auspices the new national bank was established on a sound basis, and in consequence of this the currency has been stabilized.

Whoever did not have the experience of the most desolate conditions of living in Austria for seven years will scarcely perceive what this act of the League of Nations meant for the whole of a population which saw their currency being depreciated from week to week. Senator Marsal, former French Minister of Finance, was absolutely right at the meeting in the Paris High School for Political Science on the 4th of May in saying that at the table of the Peace Conference, where all the new-born states brought forward their demands with extreme passionateness while Austria alone was excluded, Austria's interests have been immolated entirely, and therefore "this fact is the cause of Austria's financial condition." It is a mere miracle that in the dissolution of the succession states not even a bit of Bolshevism came into appearance in the Austrian Republic, whereas the Bolshevistic movement earned triumphs all around. There would have been cause for extreme unrest, however, because all these years the Austrian people had no opportunity of saving money. Whatever they would save would soon be worth only a very small percentage of its original value. From this most miserable condition the new note bank, authorized by the League, freed the population.

In addition to all this, the League made the further resolution that an international loan be granted to Austria.

Since the date of signing the treaty Austria hoped to get this promised credit. Already in 1920, before the republic's admission into the League of Nations, the Austrian boards of trade and boards of handicrafts joined in making an appeal to the League asking for credit that might enable industry to become really productive again. And there is no doubt that Austria's industry should accept a credit. However, not for industrial purposes is this international credit to be given. The government, which is very anxious to use the credit for covering the state's deficit, will receive the money.

And at the same time the League did one important service by appointing the Mayor of Rotterdam as financial controller. It did not take a new step by sending this financial "counselor" to Austria. When Haiti received the sixteen million dollar loan from the United States last year, this state had to take a financial controller, and the same happened to San Domingo. The League itself has applied the same measure in answering the report of the Albanian Commission. For Austria, Dr. Zimmermann's mission means an important assistance in an enterprise of very great difficulty, namely, the extensive and swift dismissal of state's employees. It is self-evident that this aim is a very unpopular one, and in many single cases a cruel one, too, for the men affected by it. But it is a necessity that cannot be delayed, and it is convenient for government to have this assistance from the League.

Biographies of Missionary Heroes*

WHAT memories the name of Andrew Murray conjures up! That mystic and saint of South Africa is known throughout the Christian world. Multitudes in other lands have heard his voice in the pulpit and in conferences on the Christian life; while multitudes more have read his numerous books and pamphlets. Few other men within the last century have had a wider ministry. The Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa is by far the largest and strongest denomination in the country, and in it he was virtually an unmitred archbishop. He was six times elected to the highest honor in its gift, the Moderatorship of the Synod. His activity in founding and supervising schools, his interest in young men, his promotion of missions, and his prominence as a patriotic citizen combined with his eloquence in the pulpit to give him a unique position of leadership. The intensity of his piety sometimes carried him to positions that his brethren deemed extreme. He was called "ultra conservative," and in his later years he became a strenuous advocate of "Perfection" and "Faith Healing." In his pastoral visits, his catechising was so often so searching and his rebuke of laxity so stern that some of his parishioners anticipated his calls with trembling. But his ability was so commanding, his sincerity so manifest, and his own life so blameless that he was everywhere revered and honored. A minister who knew of Andrew Murray's church methods in Worcester (1860-1864), wrote: "His pastoral visitation carried terror to the hearts of his parishioners. If his preaching was like thunderbolts from the summit of Sinai, what would personal rebuke be like? People felt under the earnestness of his individual dealing that they were being ground to powder. On one occasion, at the close of a prayer-meeting, he proceeded to deal with each individual present. One lady, observing how her pastor drew nearer and nearer to where she sat, became gradually more and more uneasy, until, as Mr. Murray turned to her, she fell upon her knees, ejaculating, 'O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' This, however, I must add, that there is a wide cleft between the stern Mr. Murray of those days and the loving and gentle Mr. Murray whom we knew in later years."

While in his local ministry he was thus actively interested in various movements for the betterment of his fellowmen, his ministry to the Church at large was individualistic rather than social. Although he often appealed to the unconverted, his type of preaching and writing was not calculated primarily for the "man in the street." He was the apostle of the inner life of men and women who have already confessed Christ and whose spiritual lives were deepened by his persuasive teachings. The Keswick and Northfield Conferences gave him the audiences that he loved, and in them he was a prime favorite as he also was in similar conferences in his native land.

His literary output was amusing. Two hundred and forty titles are listed, of which sixty-eight are books ranging from 106 to 552 pages. One wonders how he found time for so much writing amid all his pulpit, pastor, educational and public labors. It was not poor literary work either, as witness the fact that his works have been translated into fifteen languages. They belong to the class of devotional books that are seldom read by many Christians and by those outside of the churches, but that are highly prized by followers of Christ who seek a fuller spiritual life.

There is a place and a large place for such men as Andrew Murray. There is danger that in the hurly-burly of our modern life, with all its strain and pressure and tumult, men may not think enough and pray enough. We need the Andrew Murrays to remind us that the springs of the outer life are in the quiet places, and that he who would exemplify the Spirit of Christ must not only be with Christ down in the dusty ways of life amid the toiling, suffering and sorrowing multitudes, but that he must often go apart into "a desert place" to commune with God.

Professor Du Plessis has rendered a service of large value to the Christian people of every land in this notable biography. He has ample knowledge of the man whose life he describes, for he was long and intimately associated with him, and he himself is an eminent minister of the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa, where he is professor in the Theological Seminary at Stellenbosch. He, therefore, had rare opportunities for gathering the materials for his book, and he has used them with admirable skill and discrimination. He has written with clear insight and rich human sympathy. It is good to know that such a volume as this is available. Dr. Murray died January 18, 1917, at the ripe age of eighty-nine. "Of him who, during his life, was pre-eminently a man of prayer it may be truly said that he died praying. In his last moments, so we are informed, he fell to praying, magnifying the Lord's goodness and glory and grace, and rejoicing aloud in the God of his salvation. The current of spiritual life, which had flowed out in prayer during all his earthly days, set in the same direction still when his faculties were overclouded at the approach of death. At the very last, when the members of the family were grouped around the bedside in silent expectation of the end, they observed his forehead contracting—as was customary with him when he closed his eyes to pray—and waited for the words of praise or intercession which should issue from his trembling lips. But the voice was silent forever. The contraction of the forehead was his last perceptible movement. He was gone—praying!"

The place of Alexander Duff is secure not only in the history of missions but in the history of India. He was one of the great constructive leaders of his time. Many men who have achieved fame have builded on foundations that other and less known men have laid and have simply carried a

Barnabas, the Great-Hearted

ACTS 4:36, 37; 9:26-30; 11:19-30; 12:25; 13:1; 15:12; 35:41; GAL. 2:13.

"He was a good man, and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith."—Acts 11:24.

WE become acquainted with Thomas through a few words spoken by him. Three deeds sufficiently characterize Andrew. Philip is revealed by a few requests he made. Barnabas is described through his deeds.

We know him by his surname. His real name was Joseph, a name honored by the Jewish people. He was a Levite, and therefore if he used his privilege he may have joined in the temple services. Tertullian, the North African scholar, ascribes to him the authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, the writer of which shows such a sympathetic appreciation of the ritual and significant ceremonies of the Jews. It is a suggestion worthy of consideration. Barnabas was from the Island of Cyprus, and hence was familiar with the cosmopolitan life of many parts of the Roman Empire. This prepared him for the part he was to play in extending the Kingdom among the Gentiles.

We first learn of him through his generosity. In the days when disciples needed financial help, we are told that many that possessed lands and houses sold them and gave the proceeds that such might be distributed at the discretion of the apostles. Joseph Barnabas is the only giver designated by name. His gift must have been especially noteworthy, not necessarily because of the amount, but certainly because of the spirit it evidenced. From this time on we find him interested in wise forms of charity. When later the church at Antioch wished to send to the poor in Jerusalem, Barnabas was chosen as one of the administrators of the relief fund. Organized benevolence finds in Barnabas an example of the wise blending of practical ability and religious devotion.

He generously gave of his property. He gave freely of his confidence. He trusted where others suspected. In the second scene, where the Book of Acts presents Barnabas, he is the sponsor for Saul, the convert of the faith so recently and so rigorously persecuted. The Christians at Jerusalem naturally were afraid when the young Pharisee endeavored to join them. They remembered what he had done to many of their friends. Barnabas thought rather of what had been told of the experience of Saul on the Damascus road, and how he had preached Christ in that city. He was willing to give Saul a chance to prove himself. He preferred to judge men not so much by their past as by their present. And this same confidence he once gave to Paul he later wanted Paul to extend to John Mark, his own cousin, the companion of himself and Paul on part of the first missionary journey. Mark had left the party. Paul found it hard to forgive him. When the second journey had been suggested and Barnabas wanted to take Mark again, Paul refused. But Barnabas had confidence in his relative. Paul's later kindly references to Mark (Col. 4:10; 2 Tim. 4:11) indicate that he had revised his own opinion and justified the trust of Barnabas. And as he had formerly trusted Saul, as he later believed in Mark, so at this critical time he believed in the Hellenistic Jewish Christians who were preaching to the Gentiles, and he trusted the sincerity of the converts themselves.

In this, his early life in Cyprus had its influence. He had been among the non-Jewish peoples. He knew their good qualities as well as their evil. Because of his sympathetic understanding of Gentile life he became with Paul the first missionary to be sent out by any church. Other men had preached as they had journeyed upon business or through enforced exile. Barnabas and Paul were the first to be definitely assigned by a church for this specific purpose.

The former stood with the latter at the council at Jerusalem when the status of the Gentile Christians was discussed. The two missionaries knew whereof they spoke. Theirs was no academic opinion. They spoke of that which they had seen as they pleaded for the acknowledgment of the freedom of the Gentiles from the details of Jewish ceremonialism. Barnabas' consistency in these forward movements had only one flaw. Later, at Antioch, he hesitated to take the final step and stand with Paul for the elimination of all social barriers between Jew and Gentile. With Peter, he was ready to eat with those who were not Jews, when there was no one present to criticize. But when the fault-finders came from Jerusalem he did not hold his ground. This failure makes us conscious of his limitations. He, too, was human. He had, however, played his part in leading up to this final stand. Complete religious and social equality was to be the battleground for Paul.

The great-hearted Christian had performed one other service. It was he who brought Saul from Tarsus to join the work at Antioch. Without Barnabas, Saul might have been lost to the mighty forces that were leading Christianity out from its provincialism of possible confinement to Palestine as a local Jewish sect. The ardent, converted Pharisee was remembered. And it was no accidental meeting that recalled his worth. "Barnabas went forth to Tarsus to seek for Saul; and when he had found him he brought him unto Antioch." Once again, as Dean Farrar has said, "Barnabas saved Saul for Christianity."

We can but imagine the feelings that later might have entered the heart of Barnabas as he saw the leadership in Christian work gradually pass from his own hands into that of the man whom he had introduced. It was the supreme test of his greatness. He fades into the background of the Book of Acts, as the greater human light of Paul shines the brighter. He had been a forerunner of one who was to be greater than he. He must decrease while Paul increased. But surely in this, as in other tests, he would not fail. He had been generous in giving his property; he was ever generous in giving his confidence; he would be generous in sacrificing himself.

He was no weakling. At Lystra, in their zeal to worship those who had come into their midst with such marvelous power of healing, the Lycaonians termed Barnabas "Jupiter." Contrasting this with the name applied to Paul, we may imagine that the former had the more imposing physique of the two. He spoke less than Paul; he was more quiet in action; he had the mental qualities of courage, and the moral stamina to carry out his visions of service in new ventures. The initiation and completion of that first missionary journey demanded spiritual hardihood. Men must have had faith in their cause and faith in themselves to do as those pioneers did.

little higher a structure that was already started. Other famous men were so fortunate as to live at some crisis in the development of mankind which gave them their opportunity. But what shall be said of pioneers like Alexander Duff, who found no foundations laid, no plans for superstructure drawn, who did not appear at any crisis when notable change was imminent, but who laid their own foundations, drew the plans for their own superstructure, created their own opportunity, and did great things for humanity and God. Surely Duff was one of these men. Born in Scotland in 1806, he sailed for India in 1820. The record of his achievements there has been written in several biographies and in scores of other volumes. But this little book by Mr. Paton, acting secretary of the India Missionary Council, is worthy of a place of its own. It is indeed perhaps the best for the general reader. It tells the story of a wonderful life with remarkable clearness, with all the comprehensiveness that could reasonably be expected within the limits of 234 pages, and in a style delightfully readable. The Student Christian Movement of Great Britain and Ireland and the United Council for Missionary Education are rendering a service of great value by publishing "The Modern Series of Missionary Biographies," and it is well that this second volume in the series should be devoted to the great missionary whom Gladstone characterized as a "remarkable man," "one of the most eminent of the noble army of confessors of Christ."

WHAT THE RADIO MIGHT BRING

By Frances L. Garside

In almost every home in the land there are shelves dedicated to dust-catchers. No other word describes the bric-a-brac that represents an accumulation of years, and the expenditure of much money. Some one painted a china plaque it is placed beside a Dresden china figure of a girl with a lamb at her feet, a vase or two, more china figures, ornaments of silk and satin, all furnishing resting places for the dust. Yet, for some sentimental reason, we never throw them out. They are wiser in China (A secretary for the Young Women's Christian Association writing from Mukden, tells of the organization of a Married People's club. After a speech on home decoration, the members adopted a resolution that once fortnightly the members would throw away all useless things about the house.) Now if you would throw out that painting in the dining room looking like an over-ripe watermelon, but intended by Cousin Susan, who painted it to be "Venice at Moonlight," how much prettier your dining room would look. boasting, we don't seem to have the courage of the Chinese.

Again, we Americans think that every public enterprise, and many private ones should begin with music and close with fire-works. In Foochow, China, Miss Steinbeck, secretary for the Young Women's Christian Association, conducted a campaign for raising money that netted more than three times her fondest hopes. She didn't make an effort to attract public attention she called, with a translator, on those who might give, and they gave. But, of course, they might not have given so generously did they not realize the importance of the work the Association is doing in China.

The Student Union in Peking is an organization of six churches, and the two Christian Associations whose aim is that the Christian students and faculty members, the churches and the Young Women's Christian Association and the Young Men's Christian Association may jointly share the responsibility of carrying on Christian work in the middle schools, colleges and universities of Peking. It was organized two years ago and is doing most effective work.

In one of the private schools in Hangchow, if the students do not like a teacher, they wait on her in a body, and tell her to "pack up and go." In many of the schools the students strike so frequently as to cause alarm to their parents. At the bottom of the strikes lies a passion for justice and freedom. There was a time when the Chinese student was taught by a teacher who came to the house and kept tired little youngsters over their books from early morning till late at night seven days in a week. Now the student has learned the modern word 'freedom,' but, as Miss Ethel Hartley, of the Hangchow

Y. W. C. A., says, "He has not learned the laws of freedom."

In China the Young Women's Christian Association at eighty-nine student centers is developing Christian leadership in non-Christian schools; in twelve great cities it is providing practical education, recreation and wholesome social life; it conducts a Normal School of Physical Education at Shanghai, the only school of its kind in China, it supplies health education secretaries in government and mission schools. A number of associations conduct their own training school, and many of the secretaries and leaders are Chinese.

INDUSTRIAL JAPAN.

Sherwood Eddy writes of working and living conditions in Japan in the INTERNATIONAL TRADE-UNION MOVEMENT (Review of the International Federation of Trade-Unions). A summary of his observations follows:

Japan's industries have developed tremendously since 1914, when they had an opportunity to secure markets. Japan is handicapped by her limited area, the poor quality of her farm land and the tremendous competition between the still cheaper labor of India and China and the great industrial organizations of the United States and Europe.

In 1914 the Japanese Government was in danger of bankruptcy, but with the increase in exports over imports from 1915-1918 the national debt was reduced until it is now the smallest among the allied nations. Within twenty-five years there has been a ten-fold increase in her foreign trade and a 400 per cent. increase in the volume of business done by the banks. The per capita wealth which was $250 in 1904 was estimated at $765 in 1919 and the national wealth at $43,000,000,000. Yet with this tremendous increase in wealth, in 1918 92 per cent. of the population had an income of less than $250 per year. In the slums of Tokyo, Kobe and Osaka thousands of people are crowded into little alleys with one-room hovels for entire families. Osaka and Kobe have the highest death rate in the world.

Working conditions in Japanese factories and mines are very bad. The ten to twelve-hour day is prevalent though a few progressive employers have granted the eight-hour day. Many of the cotton mills still keep the fourteen to seventeen-hour day. Child labor is general. Wages are very low (though we have not at hand the means of comparing "real wages" in Japan with those of the United States). Women workers receive an average of twenty cents a day. According to a study made by one of the leading economists of Japan the average wage in Tokyo is less than fifty cents a day with a minimum of twenty cents and a maximum of one or two dollars a day for skilled labor.

The labor movement is growing slowly with much opposition. The first unions were started about forty years ago under Christian leaders. Most of them are now under radical leadership. Labor unions have no legal status, so that the number of unions and their membership fluctuate with conditions in the country. The latest returns give 300 organizations with 365,700 members. The employers have several organizations with large sums of money for propaganda.

The labor leaders are chiefly state socialists, guild socialists or communists. One of them is reported as saying: "To be frank with you we are all radicals and out to abolish the present system, because the government, the capitalistic courts, and the big business men are all united against us.

We have arrived late upon the scene in the labor world and we have started with advanced ideas and principles. We are persecuted, hounded, and betrayed, but we will win."

The following letter received by the American Reindeer Corporation, whose work was described in The Christian Work for April 21, shows the widespread interest in this plan to build worthwhile industries in localities where missions are stationed:

The American Reindeer Corporation,
342 Madison Avenue, New York, U. S. A.
Dear Sirs:

In THE CHRISTIAN WORK for April 21, 1923, I read of the work you propose to do in Labrador, and am considerably interested.

May I say that we too in Central America are very eagerly longing for the advent of able Christian business men, who will—as in your plan—establish staple industries on a firm basis, and help our Indians towards economic independence, instead of making them the victims of unscrupulous corporations, or pawns in the game of company-promoting.

Wishing you good success under God's blessing,

I am,

Yours very truly,

GEORGE REINKE HEATH.

YOUNG PEOPLE MOBILIZING FOR HOME MISSIONS

The Student Fellowship for Christian Life-Service, organized a year ago for the promotion of enlistment in home missions and in Christian service for the world, has members in fifty institutions of higher education. A Southern Regional Conference was held in Atlanta, Georgia, April 6 to 8, an Eastern Conference in the University of Pennsylvania, April 14 to 15, and a group of leaders meeting in conference at New Haven, April 20 to 22. A New York Student Fellowship Union has been organized which plans a conference to be held in Yonkers, October 12 and 13. A unique feature of the Atlanta Conference was the presence of delegates from the colored educational institutions of the city. During the summer the Fellowship will be represented at the conferences and summer campaigns under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and the Religious Education Movement. The Executive Committee, which is composed of representatives of nine colleges, will meet at Lake Geneva, August 28 to September 2. An advisory council, with representatives from the Home Missions Council, the Council of Women for Home Missions, and the Council of Church Boards of Education, aids the movement.

HOME MISSIONS INSTITUTE AT CHAUTAUQUA

The Home Missions Institute annually held at Chatauqua, N. Y., by the Council of Women for Home Missions will be on August 11 to 17, inclusive. This year Chatauqua will hold its fiftieth annual Assembly, and this will be the thirteenth last year and the year before, the registration at the Institute was over 1,250. An equally good program has been arranged for this season.

The Home Mission theme for 1923-24, "Saving America through Her Girls and Boys," will be presented in study courses; one led by Mrs. D. E. Waid using "The Debt Eternal" by Dr. John H. Finley, and "The Child and America's Future" by Rev. Jay S. Stowell, the other led by Mrs. W. A. Wheaton, using the textbook for leaders of Junior groups, "Better Americans" by Miss Joyce C. Manuel. Mrs. Wheaton will demonstrate story-telling. There will be a class in Methods led by Mrs. Dan B. Brummitt. Missionary Radiograms will be given in the Hall of Philosophy, and Mrs. Arthur B. Strickland, author and dramatist, will give Character Sketches.

Dr. John H. Finley will deliver a lecture in the Amphitheater on August 14 in the morning on "The Debt Eternal." Mrs. H. Osgood Holland will give a lecture on "The Four Square Child," and Dr. George L. Cady will give an illustrated lecture in the Amphitheater on "California and the Japanese."

A Ritual and Worship for the Youth of America will be presented in the Amphitheater on Friday morning, August 17, under the direction of Prof. H. Augustine Smith.

There will be a Choral Competition with a chorus of over 1,000 voices in the Amphitheater on Saturday evening, August 11, Prof. H. Augustine Smith, Director.

Music Week will be from August 13 to 18, and so those who attend the Home Missions Institute will have the opportunity to avail of the special musical features of that week. The New York Symphony Orchestra, Albert Stoessel conductor, will give a concert every night and Wednesday matinee. George Barrere, the world's great flutist, will be a member of the Orchestra.

During the Home Missions Institute there will be a special camp for young women with Mrs. L. C. Knapp as Director and denominational camp leaders. Bathing, boating, hiking, and golf are among the many sports that will be enjoyed.

The Home Missions Institute is a wonderful opportunity for old and young for conference and fellowship, mission study and inspiration amid beautiful surroundings. The Assembly Grounds are a natural forest of over 300 acres on the shore of a twenty-mile lake, 1,300 feet above sea level, easily accessible, and there are practically no mosquitos. Physical, mental and spiritual uplift will be gained by attendance at the Home Missions Institute.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR AND HOME

MISSIONS FOR INDIANS

Hon. Hubert Work, Secretary of the Interior, has recently invited one hundred men and women of national vision, including publicists, educators, governors of states, churchmen, and outstanding citizen Indians to advise him in reference to the methods of changed policy on the part of the government in its treatment of Indians.

The Secretary recognizes the importance of determining on such places for the Indian's welfare as shall insure his own participation in those plans and ultimately lead to an educated, self-sustaining Indian citizenry.

Some of the Indians of today have individual wealth (the value of all Indian property is estimated at $1,000,000,000) 227,000 out of 340,917 have allotments of land totalling 38,000,000 acres, and two-thirds of the Indians are citizens. There are 400 Protestant and 200 Catholic missionaries at work among the various tribes and groups with respective adherents of approximately 100,000 and 59,000. Secretaries of Home Mission Boards doing work for Indians selected by the Secretary of the Interior.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. But many Sunday-school teachers, pastors and superintendents will wish to own the whole series, so as to have it at all times conveniently at hand. THE GOVERNMENT AND THE CHESTER CONCESSIONS

Neither the Department of State nor its officers in the field took part in the negotiations for the Chester mining and railway concessions in Turkey; nor have the concessionaires been given moral or political assurances that in the event of a dispute our Government would be bound to defend the validity of the concession; the State Department has not even a complete and authentic copy of the concession; it is concerned only in maintaining the open door policy of commercial opportunity and fair play. This in essence is the reply of Secretary of State Hughes to the letter of inquiry addressed to President Harding on June 19 by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the National Popular Government League concerning the concession and referred to him from the White House for answer. The letter is signed by Leland Harrison, Assistant Secretary, "for the Secretary of State," and dated July 3. The letter of inquiry was signed by Jackson Ralston, chairman of the committee, Washington lawyer, William Kent, former California Congressman, Professor E. A. Ross of Wisconsin University, Louis E. Post, former Assistant Secretary of Labor, Dr. John A. Ryan, of Catholic University, Charles Edward Russell, writer, and William H. Johnstone, president of the International Association of Machinists. Judson King, director of the League, says: "So far as I know this is the most sweeping and explicit denial yet made by the Department of State, that the Government is in any way tied up with the Chester concessionaires." But this letter is not so reassuring. We are simply in the beginning of our relationships with Turkey in this matter of the Chester concessions. Wait until some representative of "Chester and Turkey, Inc.," is shot and then there will be a great cry "to protect nationals." It would be better for the peace of the world if our Government, and all governments, would not give such great protection to nationals in the backward countries.

2,500 COMMUNITIES CELEBRATE "LAW—NOT WAR" DAY

Twenty-five hundred cities, towns and villages in forty-four States voiced a demand for law—not war in telegrams and letters to their representatives in Congress and to the President on July 28 and 29, the eve of the ninth anniversary of the outbreak of the Great War, according to reports received at the Washington headquarters of the National Council for Prevention of War. This is the first national demonstration that has definitely converged the peace sentiment of the country upon Congress and the Administration. Statements commending the effort to substitute law for war were received by the National Council from Secretary Hughes, the Governors of Maine and Colorado and the Lieutenant Governor of Wisconsin, former Justice Clarke, Wil-

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

William Jennings Bryan, Dr. Francis E. Clark, president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Hamilton Holt, Paul Pearson, president of the International Lyceum and Chautauqua, William Dudley Foulke, president of the National Civil Service Reform League, and leaders of farm, labor and women's organizations. The World Court received endorsement at a majority of the meetings, the League of Nations was supported at others, and at some the outlawry of war; but behind them all was the general demand of the American people that this government center attention upon the problem of substituting law for war until that problem is solved. On the same days similar demonstrations against war took place in England and in seventeen other nations. The English demonstrations called upon the government to take "immediate steps towards universal disarmament by land, sea, and air, by mutual agreement." In this country, the demonstrations ranged from wayside meetings at cross-roads, with a single speaker, to an international meeting with speakers from seven nations on Boston Common. Of the thirty-five national organizations composing the National Council for Prevention of War and the groups co-operating in the "Law—Not War" demonstration, the following were among those which arranged state-wide meetings through local branches: National League of Women Voters, National Council of Jewish Women, W. C. T. U., Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, Y. W. C. A., Women's Pro-League Council, National Service Star Legion, National Women's Trade Union League Peace Association of Friends in America. Two-day programs were arranged by committees of citizens in chains of cities from coast to coast, including Portland, Maine; Boston, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Dayton, Chicago, St. Louis, Des Moines, Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles; West Texas; Shreveport, Louisiana; and Palm Beach, Florida. The Dayton Council of Churches, in co-operation with twenty organizations, staged a demonstration throughout the city and county. The West Texas Methodist Conference observed the day throughout their parishes, while hundreds of other churches devoted their service to the furtherance of "Law—Not War."

AMERICAN ARMY ONLY IS BIGGER THAN IN 1913

According to a note in the "New York Times" of July 25, Lieutenant Colonel Guinness, Under Secretary for War, replying to a question in the House of Commons, gave the following figures of men under arms in various countries for 1913 and 1922, respectively:

Britain	106,514	80,919
France	666,743	450,859
Germany	836,000	100,000
		900,000
Russia	1,300,000	to
		1,300,000
United States	86,500	137,000

Lieutenant Colonel Hall asked: "Are we to understand that the only important power which has actually increased its armed forces is the United States?" Mr. Guinness replied: "That is so." Increase of the peace-time regular army to 15,000 officers and 150,000 enlisted men in order to permit "all-year-round" instruction of "civilian components of the army of the United States" is urged in a resolution adopted unanimously by the National Council of the Reserve Officers' Association, which met in Indianapolis July 14-15. The resolutions were received by Secretary Weeks and sent to the War Department Budget Committee, which is laboring with next year's estimates. This action of the reserve officers was not disclosed at the time, although the resolutions provide that all Members of Congress shall receive copies. The declaration relative to peace time strength of the regular army was made in view of "indications that an effort will be made at the next session of Congress to reduce the present strength of the regular establishment. The council speaks for the Association of Reserve Officers, which includes a great majority of the 70,000 men of the reserve lists. It asserted that about 5,000 regular officers and 60,000 men were wholly or partially employed in summer training camp work and that "this number is deemed inadequate to give necessary instruction" to the limited personnel now authorized to attend the camps. The resolutions also ask for development and maintenance at high efficiency of a plan "which will provide in the event of an emergency," for a selective service system that will insure swift and sure supply of personnel to the armed forces; declare the support of the National Guard to be "essential to the perfection of the national defense" and urge reserve officers to work for "active co-operation and support of the people in support of the National Guard."

DO THESE VIRGINIA EPISCOPAL CLERGY BLESS WAR?

A year ago the Diocese of Virginia ordered the appointment of a committee to consider what should be the attitude of the diocese on war and preparation for war. This summer the committee presented a report which concluded with resolutions, among which were the following:

Resolved, That the Church in Virginia, in council assembled, would solemnly proclaim her convictions—

1. That war of physical violence is absolutely repugnant to the letter and spirit of the teaching of Christ.
2. That Christ's Church and people are called to a warfare of moral violence against all the forces of evil around us.
3. That the law of Christ is as applicable to national and international as it is to personal and individual relations.
4. That, while the State cannot be condemned by the Church for making reasonable preparation for defensive war of physical violence, since it is guided only by the wisdom of this world, yet the Church, having the mind of Christ, is convinced that armies and navies are futile weapons of defense.

5. That the best defense against wrong that a nation can make is to put on the "whole armor of God," to be righteous, to practice justice, to be unselfish, and to serve others, to show kindness and sympathy and helpfulness to the smaller and weaker peoples.

6. That it is the duty of the Church to organize her forces, national and international, to prevent war of physical violence in the future by all the devices of spiritual diplomacy; to protest against and rebuke all war talk and evil speaking against other nations and people, and all racial hatred.

This report was laid on the table by a large vote and the indications are that these clergymen think more kindly of organized murder than do the framers of this resolution. Of course, it is now five years since two million men were killed each year for a period of four years. Either the memories of these clergymen are poor, or perhaps they know of some wonderful benefits which have accrued to the nations because of this wholesale slaughter.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

DR. GULICK ON THE FAR EAST

Rev. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, secretary of the Commission on International Justice and Good-Will of the Federal Council of Churches, a noted authority on the Far East, who has just returned from nearly a year in the north and south of China, in Korea, in Japan and in the Philippines, has made this report: "The anti-Christian movement which reached its height a little more than a year ago has died down," he says. "Christian missions are exercising great influence in the national life of both China and Japan. In this lies the hope of the situation. The problems of China will gradually be solved as the young men who have been trained in Western countries and in the mission schools gradually take charge of affairs." In Japan Dr. Gulick received wide welcome. Union meetings of Christians were held in twenty-five cities. He was given thirty-eight luncheons or banquets by churches, chambers of commerce, business men and foreign residents. These dinners were in the larger cities like Yokohama, Kioto, Osaka and Kobe, and upon the night before he left Japan he was given a big dinner in Tokio by the Japan-America Relations Committee, at which Viscount Shibusawa presided. In China many meetings were held to receive his message from the churches of America. He met scores of men of influence in the various cities. He visited South China as well as the North. In Korea he was given a score of banquets and addressed three big meetings of Koreans besides those for Japanese and for missionaries. In the four countries—China, Japan, Korea and the Philippines—Dr. Gulick made 296 addresses, 155 of them in Japan and 109 in China. As a result of his attendance at the first annual meeting of the National Christian Council of China, a committee on international relations was established, through which the churches of China will be able to study international questions, speak on international matters and co-operate with the churches of other nations in the program of the Church Universal for a Warless World. Dr. Gulick, went to the Far East to carry to the various church bodies a message from the Federal Council of Churches and the World Alliance for Friendship Through the Churches. Invitations to the various churches in the Far East to co-operate in the world campaign for a warless world were extended and accepted.

ANOTHER MOVE IN A HERESY CASE

The Right Rev. William Montgomery Brown, retired Bishop of Arkansas, but still an active member of the Protestant Episcopal House of Bishops, has sent a letter recently to the House of Bishops, setting forth conditions under which he would be willing to retire, to be tried for heresy or to receive a committee from the house at his Galion (Ohio) home to discuss the desire of the house that he retire and avoid a trial. This is Bishop Brown's first communication since he declined last fall to receive a committee from the House of Bishops at the Episcopal General Convention in Portland. This is the Bishop's proposal: "If the House will appoint a committee of three charged with the duty of taking part in a conference at the sessions of which my booklet, 'Communism and Christianity,' would be read and its representations concerning religion discussed with the view of convincing me of the possibility of returning from my heretical position of naturalism to your orthodox one of supernaturalism, without disregarding the relevant facts which have been scientifically established and generally received by men of science, I will and hereby agree to do two things: 1. I agree to receive such committee at Galion providing: (a) That the sessions be held in Brownella Hall, the doors of which will be open to all comers. (b) That a court stenographer is employed to make for publication a full report of what is said at the sessions. 2. I agree to resign my seat in the House of Bishops providing that three judges, the first chosen by the Presiding Bishop, the second by me and the third by the two, shall say in a majority report that the issue of the conference has been to satisfy them that, according to the Anglo-American standards of orthodoxy, there is no conflict between Christianity and scientism concerning: (a) The origin, sustenance and governance of the universe. (b) The creation of Adam and Eve, the planting of the Garden of Eden, the fall of Adam and Eve and its effects, the birth of Jesus, His death and descent into hell, His resurrection and ascension into Heaven and His second coming to raise all deceased men, women and children from the dead and to judge and send them to heaven or hell. If this offer is accepted I desire, but, of course, do not require, that the House's committee should consist of Bishop Manning, who says that there is no conflict between Christianity and scientism; Bishop Gailor, who says that it would be as easy to produce a crushing answer to my heretical representations in the booklet, 'Communism and Christianity,' as to smash a fly with a sledgehammer; Professor Osborn, who, in effect, says that men of science are coming to the acceptance of the Biblical representations concerning our solar system in general and its terrestrial life in particular." Bishop Brown declares that no living bishop accepts fully the supernaturalistic representations of the Bible, the Creed, the Thirty-nine Articles of the Episcopal Church and the Book of Common Prayer according to the literal meaning of the language in which they are made. He says that to try him for heresy will result in "a loss in membership and revenue." He promises to resign without trial if the judges he suggests shall make a majority report that the proposed conference has convinced them that there is no conflict between Christianity and scientism. "If my peers agree," says the letter, "that it will be for the good of the Church, also all the persons and interests concerned, that I should be deposed and ex-communicated, they are in a position to assume the responsibility of a heresy trial with these ends in view. If my brethren do not care to attempt the discrediting of my propagandism by canonical proceedings issuing in deposition and ex-communication, let them do the only thing that can be done, if indeed it is possible—produce a crushing answer to the heretical representations of my booklet. Success in this undertaking would mean much to the cause of orthodoxy, but there would be nothing for it in a trial. I have declined to meet the committee appointed by the house to persuade me voluntarily to renounce my orders. This was necessary because of the stigma which was placed upon me by the house at Portland when the petition of the diocese of Arkansas for my trial and deposition was, according to the daily press, refused on the ground that I am mentally irresponsible for my heresies." The Right Rev. Alexander Charles Garrett, the new presiding bishop of the house, has called a special meeting this fall in Dallas, Texas, at which the Bishop Brown issue may be thrashed out.

VIOLATIONS OF THE LIQUOR LAWS IN NEW YORK

The annual report of liquor cases just compiled by the Anti-Saloon League of New York contains data concerning the work of the courts within the State of New York in the enforcement of prohibition which, so far as we know, is nowhere else available. The summary shows there were 10,569 liquor indictments found or pending during 1922, about equally divided between the State and Federal courts. Of these 7,323 were 1922 indictments and 3,246 were pending January 1, 1922. Of all these 1,101 were dismissed. The State courts had eighty-six acquittals and the Federal courts fifty. The number of cases pending January 1, 1923, was 4,151, of which 1,576 were in the State courts. There were 3,044 convictions in the State courts with fines amounting to $329,916 and jail sentences imposed amounting to twenty-three years, three months and eleven days. The convictions in the Federal courts were 2,147, with $364,143 in fines and fourteen years, five months and eleven days in jail sentences. The State courts in the five boroughs of New York City had before them during 1922 1,821 liquor cases. Of these 297 were dismissed, forty-seven were acquitted and 1,160 were convicted, the rest were pending January 1. The fines in New York City amounted to $29,233 and the jail sentences to one year, one month and twelve days. The percentage of cases acquitted in New York City is three per cent. The percentage convicted is seventy-seven per cent. The remaining twenty per cent. of cases disposed of were dismissed by the courts. The State over eighteen per cent. of the indictments were dismissed and only two per cent. were acquitted, while eighty per cent. were convicted. In short, the chance for an indicted bootlegger to get off free is but one in five.

THE SCARCITY OF BRICKLAYERS AT $12 A DAY

In New York City the Mason Builders' Association conceded the demands of the bricklayers who struck for $1.50 an hour and an agreement extending to May 1, 1925, but this did not bring back the bricklayers at that wage, for the reason that they all had work at higher pay with other employers. The $12 rate for an eight-hour day is simply a basic rate; to get any men it is necessary to pay a varying bonus above that. The Mayor exercised his influence in bringing the Mason Builders to accede to the $12 demand, in order to get new school houses completed in time for the fall term of school, but it has been difficult to man these jobs, notwithstanding a pledge by the union officials that men would be supplied. It is not questioned that the officials have endeavored in good faith to provide men, but the latter have preferred other work at higher pay. The number of experienced bricklayers in the country is inadequate for present needs, in view of the deficit in buildings which is to be made up. According to the occupational census there were fewer bricklayers in 1920 than in 1910. The apprentice system does not afford an adequate number of new men, for which employers and unions are inclined to shift the blame to each other. The bricklayers' union of New York City through their officials say that they have agreed to take on 160 apprentices, and when the employers point to the fact that this is a very small number, in view of the fact that three years are required under the rules to learn the trade, reply is made, and vouched for by the Apprentice Committee of the Building Trades Council, that the employers have failed to avail themselves of even this number. In answer to this the employers say that the apprentice system is hedged about by objectionable conditions which they hope to have modified, and that negotiations to this purpose are pending. Evidently the employers have regarded the apprentice system as not worth bothering with. However that may be, it is certain that in the case of the bricklayers and some of the other building trades the number of recruits is not sufficient to make good the depletion by death and retirement.

PROHIBITION CUTS JAIL POPULATIONS

According to figures published by Judge William N. Gemmill, of Chicago, arrests for drunkenness in fifty American cities, including New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Washington, St. Louis, Buffalo, San Francisco, Cleveland, etc., thirty-seven per cent. between 1917 and 1922. The cities covered have a total population of over 25,000,000 or about one-fourth of the population of the entire United States. Judge Gemmill also found remarkable decreases in the number of arrests for all causes and in the number of deaths from all causes, in spite of the fact that the population of these cities increased heavily in the five-year period. One-third of all the arrests in the United States in 1922, Judge Gemmill finds, were due to traffic law violations. One thousand persons were sent to the Ohio penitentiary in the year ended June 30. This is just 325 fewer than were sent in the year ended June 30, 1922. Nearly one-fifth of the men are foreigners. Ten of the eighty-eight counties do not have a solitary prisoner. The ten are counties which were dry several years before state and national prohibition. Five hundred and ten fewer prisoners were taken to Sing Sing, New York State prison, during the fiscal year ended July 1 than in the previous fiscal year, according to Warden Lawes, who said this is indication that crime is decreasing. In the last fiscal year there were admitted to Sing Sing, compared with 1,613 the previous year. From New York City and environs, which are not the driest territory in the United States to say the least, 881 were sent in the year ended June 30, as compared with 1,450 the year before, a reduction of 569. Removal of the solitary inmate to the Elmira Reformatory leaves the jail in Putnam County, New York, tenantless. Total arrests in Ansonia, Derby and Shelton, Connecticut, in wet 1917 were 1,252; in dry 1922 they were 945. In 1917 the arrests for drunkenness in those cities were 325; in 1922 they were only 122. The three cities have a total population of 38,356, and are industrial cities. The population of these three cities increased more than 220 per cent. in the five years.

Rumor has it that Henry Ford has it in mind to buy the Wayside Inn at Sudbury, Massachusetts. The Wayside Inn, scene of Longfellow's "Tales," was opened by David Howe in 1700 and dispensed its hospitality for 160 years under only four different inn keepers. Since 1860 it has been preserved as a place of historic interest. The extremely enterprising reporter who reported Mr. Ford's purchase of the house when he had scarcely more than visited it, assured the public that Mr. Ford will keep it up as a museum with all the furnishings and settings intact as long as they will hold together.

at it. He made the "Marion Star" a successful and influential paper. He became interested in politics very early in life and soon became a persuasive speaker. He was even called as a youth, "The Harp of the North." His Republican connections were always strong, although he was quick in sensing public sentiment and was inclined to be guided by it as he was throughout his later career. He was State Senator for four years, then Lieutenant Governor. In 1914 he was elected to the United States Senate by Ohio, where he served, part of the time as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, until he was elected President.

When Mr. Harding was nominated to the Presidency everybody in the United States asked, "Who is Mr. Harding?" His name had not been mentioned before the convention met and he was unknown to the masses outside his own State. The people had to get acquainted with him through his pre-election speeches. As the people came face to face with him they liked him. They found him a sincere, affable, and honest man. His speeches betrayed no particular quality of leadership, but they did reveal an honest determination to reflect the mind and will of the nation should he be elected. He was elected by an overwhelming majority. The majority was not due to any admiration for his leadership, for he had evinced none, but was due purely to the fact that people felt he was safe. The country had been through a terrible crisis. War was new to it and although the nation rose to it, it was an awful shock and the country had not recovered. It was not in a mind to try any more new experiments and the people wanted to settle down and get back to the old ways. They were afraid the Democrats were in for experiments. President Wilson was urging one, and a big one. There was a whole lot of talk about a "new order" after the war. "Industrial democracy" and many other new and startling phrases were in the air. The people got frightened. They wanted peace, prosperity and to be let alone. Hence they voted the Republican ticket. The prosperity did not altogether come to certain sections of the country and the farmers are still restless. But the people felt that Mr. Harding stood for normalcy and hence his large vote. He construed it in this way, and rightly, and his policy as President has not been leadership, but expressing the mind of the people as he and his advisers have read it. Sometimes they read it rightly, sometimes wrongly. On the question of the League of Nations we believe the President did not read it rightly; on the question of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and the World Court he did. But in both of these latter instances the initiative came from the people, not from the President. He deserves all credit, though, for acting promptly and with determination when he believed the people desired these things. His chief claim to remembrance will be because of this.

The most outstanding achievement of the President's career was his calling of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments. The greatest addresses he has made were made at these meetings. He betrayed there a real consciousness that the destiny of this nation was wrapt up with that of all the others. Had he gone further at this time, with the people feeling as they did at that moment, he could have carried the nation into some permanent association with the other nations; but his friends persuaded him the people did not wish to go further. The Conference was one of the most memorable things in history and one of the greatest forces for peace the world has known. It achieved three or four

President Harding

PRESIDENT HARDING'S death came both as a great surprise and a great shock to the people of the United States. Everybody supposed that the danger point had been passed and that he was on the road to recovery. He was resting peacefully and comfortably while Mrs. Harding was reading to him, when suddenly, with hardly any warning, he fell asleep. This is the second of our Presidents to fall by the way while visiting the people. Mr. Wilson was pleading the League of Nations from State to State when the blow came that incapacitated him. Mr. Harding was pleading the World Court from State to State when the blow came that has resulted in his death. Both of these men were serving their nation as truly and as bravely as the men who fell in Flanders; both deserve the same honors as the heroes who sacrificed themselves in the Great War.

Mr. Harding will always remain an inspiration to the youth of America. He was a self-made man, as many of our greatest men and several of our Presidents have been. In spite of all the changes in our industrial system, it is as easy as ever for the eager boy to find his place in the world. Mr. Harding grew up on a farm. He worked his way through college by farming and painting buildings. He had thought of becoming a teacher, but entered a newspaper office as typesetter. He also played in the village band. He stuck to the newspaper business all his life and prospered direct and tangible results of lasting benefit; but its great contribution to human progress was the new atmosphere it created, the new habit of thought it gave to the world. It will always be associated with Mr. Harding's name and will be his enduring monument.

The other great event was his espousal of the World Court. Two years ago the League of Nations voted to create the Court. The League invited a great American jurist, Mr. Root, to help draft its constitution. When the Court was set up another American, Professor John Bassett Moore, was elected, by the League, to the bench of judges. The United States was asked to become a part of the Court. The churches and other organizations, believing that the Court was another step in the substitution of law and good-will for war and strife, and because the United States had been the chief advocate of the Court for a hundred years, immediately expressed their convictions, and the President acted upon them almost immediately. Here he rose to true greatness and it is a cause of great rejoicing to every friend of the President that his last words were in advocacy of a big, non-partisan, progressive, prophetic policy—the policy that, come what may, Senator Johnson and all his ilk to the contrary, is going some day to be the policy of this nation, namely, association with the other nations of the world; recognition that we belong to the family of nations. Whatever President Harding's previous record may have been, it is a real glory that he died practically saying, "No nation liveth to itself alone."

The Rural Pastors and the Community

A CITY pastorate has strong attraction for the minister. It is a great university for the study of human nature. It gives one the advantage of contact with leading minds. It is also a stage on which one's words and actions are blazoned forth to the whole country, and his sphere of influence greatly enlarged. Hence its strong appeal to thinkers and moulders of men such as the clergyman.

On the other hand, to be limited to the sphere of the small country town seems to doom the minister to comparative obscurity. It would appear as if here he could find little opportunity for the exercise of talent, and small hope for that large influence toward which a capable personality naturally aspires.

The writer for a number of years has been spending some months in country villages, and feels it worth while to record his impressions. And these are that the work and influence of rural pastors are by no means narrow or restricted. These ministers have been thoroughly educated at college and theological seminary. They burn with a mission to follow Christ and to imbue their fellow-man with the piety, virtue and graces of the Gospel. And while denied many of the opportunities afforded by the city, on the other hand their country field offers them exceptional advantages. In the stress and crowding of the city the pastor seldom meets his people, except at worship on Sunday, and perhaps in a call once a year, which a prominent municipal minister often cannot find time to make. On the other hand, the rural pastor meets his people continually in the round of the small village. He thus comes to be on terms of good personal intimacy with them. All, young and old, know him well and are pleased to receive his kindly greeting. His life is an open book before them, and their confidence in and love for him grow with the passing years.

In the city public affairs must naturally be largely eschewed by the minister. He cannot, and should not, introduce them into the pulpit, to the hurt of his spiritual message. And there are plenty leading business men to make a special study of civic interests and morals. But in the country, while the minister on Sunday presents to his hearers the challenge of faith in the unseen, and calls them to better and higher ideals of life, on account of his intelligence and the confidence in the purity of his motives, he is looked to as a leader and guide in the moral and economic welfare of the community. Few important steps are taken without seeking his approval, and following his advice. And so the rural pastor finds himself ever growing in the love and trust of not alone church members, but of the community at large.

The writer has, for a number of years, observed a small country town in Massachusetts where there are four pastors, a Congregationalist, a Methodist, a Roman Catholic, and a Unitarian minister. These pastors, one and all, have the admiration and love of the people to a remarkable degree. They are far away the most enlightening, uplifting and beneficial influence upon the community. They illustrate the spirit of Christ by their lives, which are seen and read of all men.

If, therefore, a minister really seeks to be a follower of the lowly and unselfish Master, satisfied with doing the greatest good to his fellow-men, and with being a true shepherd of the Christian flock, he will find abundant satisfaction and reap life's rare and golden fruit in the sphere of the rural pastor.

Who is it that eats the candy of the United States? According to Edward C. Clark, president of the National Confectionery Salesmen's Association of America, children eat three-fifths of our candy, all in the shape of penny sticks. Prohibition did not boom the candy business so much as the manufacturers expected, according to Mr. Clark; it only brought into the business many inexperienced manufacturers.

Essex County, New Jersey, in which Newark is situated, has appropriated $4,000 for a green house at the county penitentiary. The green house is expected to provide more work for the prisoners and to help them morally. That second idea is not unreasonable. A man who works with flowers tends to get something of the quietness of the sweet, green plants into his own life.

In 1919 the New York Chapter of the American Red Cross supplied an instructor to give a course in home hygiene and care of the sick in certain of the girls' high schools. Many of the high school girls became enthusiastic over the work. They found it the best course in their high school years. Now, after four years, the New York school authorities have decided that they will include such a course as part of the curriculum in nine of the girls' high schools. So the seven Red Cross nurses who have been giving the course will serve hereafter as regular high school teachers.

THE OBSERVER

The Baptists at Stockholm

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

I HAVE been greatly interested in following the meetings of the World Alliance of Baptists at Stockholm. They have gathered from all the ends of the earth. Generally, they have met where Baptists were many and where the denomination is strong; but this year they went straight to the citadel of Lutheranism. Perhaps it is a sign of how they are multiplying in all the ends of the earth. There are a good many Baptists in Sweden after all. Although Sweden to the outside world seems impregnable and immaculately Lutheran, yet one finds strong churches in Stockholm and the larger cities, and the Baptists have managed to get along with their Lutheran brethren very well. Perhaps it is a good thing for the Lutherans to have their Baptist brethren come from afar and let them see what other communions are doing. Anyhow, their welcome to the Baptists has been very cordial and hearty. I have never found any objections in the great Lutheran countries, such as Germany, Sweden, Norway and Denmark, to other denominations coming in and doing their work so long as these denominations did not consider the Lutherans as objects of missionary endeavor; did not misrepresent the piety and real religion of the Lutherans, for the purpose of raising funds in lands from whence they came, and did not attempt to proselyte. The Baptists have so far had a good reputation in this regard. With all their conviction that baptism is the true form of faith, they have been broad-minded in their missionary work as they have gradually been recognizing the members of their communions in America as brethren. One always has a suspicion when the members of one denomination begin saying the members of some other denomination are not evangelical or pious, or are not strong in observing certain laws or rules, whether ecclesiastical or of the realm of morals, that the critic really means that they are not Methodist or Baptist or Presbyterian or Congregationalist. It is a very awful and fearful responsibility one denomination takes when it says that a sister denomination is not of the true faith. It assumes not only omniscience, but the sceptre of judgment over all the other children of God. The most encouraging sign of unity in the world to-day is the gradual cessation of this thing. I am glad it is passing. And it is only the lesser men in the denominations that keep it up. Furthermore, it is generally born of ignorance. I am glad there has been none of it in Stockholm, but that at the great conference the Baptists have not been talking of separateness—always a sign of being the only true Church—but of recognition and co-operation in the Kingdom of God. I am glad, too, that the Primate of Denmark, that great and generous Lutheran bishop, has been telling the American Lutherans that when they come up to Eisenach this month they must talk co-operation, unity, fellowship, not separateness and aloofness. The great Archbishop Soderblom has been saying and practising the same thing for years. The time has come that when any denomination stands aloof from any other and claims that it is either more spiritual or more truly the Church of Christ, or is the depository of the faith, it simply shows its colossal arrogance as well as ignorance and especially emphasizes its provincialism. The meetings at Stockholm have been free from this; let us hope those at Eisenach will be.

The missionary note has been struck at nearly every session at Stockholm and the responsibility for Christianizing the industrial, social and international order has been constantly to the front. There were expectations that the Fundamentalist controversy would come to the front. It has not. This is partly because the British Baptists have progressed so much further in the spirit of liberty than have the American. I wonder why this is. For thirty years now the British Baptists have freely fraternized with their brethren of other denominations, having open communion and receiving Congregationalists, Presbyterians and all other Christians by letter. They have allowed large liberty to the clergy in their interpretation of the Scripture, and have been very reluctant to impose creedal tests upon the ministers. In all these regards they have been far ahead of their American brethren. Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, according to the cable reports, created a good impression when he deplored the whole issue of Fundamentalism in the American Church on the ground that it was diverting energy from common endeavor for the Kingdom as well as interfering with that fine spirit of brotherhood which holds Baptists together. Dr. Laws made a plea for the acceptance of the Bible as the rule of faith and order, the supreme and final authority in belief and morals.

This is all very well if the Fundamentalists will be willing to accept the Bible instead of their interpretation of it as the basis of faith. The whole trouble is right here: that they will not. They insist on rejecting the good age-long Protestant position of a common Bible with liberty of individual interpretation of it and are rapidly taking the Roman Catholic position of insisting that the individual have both his Bible and his theology determined for him by the Church, or even a section of it. The highest high Church in the Protestant Episcopal order, with mass and incense and vestments, is really getting nowhere near to Roman Catholicism compared with the Fundamentalists. Incense and vestments, even the mass, are only accessories of worship. The real heart and core of Roman Catholicism is the interpretation of the Scriptures and the doctrines by the Church for the individual, priest and laymen. Where one has authority centralized in the Church, either in faith, interpretation of Scripture, or in morals, there you have Catholicism. It is just the one thing Luther fought. It is the one thing the Fundamentalists are trying, unconsciously perhaps, to bring back. We are glad the Stockholm Conference is emphasizing the Bible as the seat of authority in religion; but it must be the open Bible, not the Bible of the Fundamentalists; it must be the Protestant Bible, free to tell its own message to each individual, and not the Roman Catholic Bible, on the margin of whose every page is written by the Church the one and only meaning that can be attached to every passage.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Religious Basis of Social Work*

By Rev. John M. Moore, D.D.

Minister of the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn

"Except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God."—John 3:3.

AS a churchman and a minister I have come to speak to you this morning as one who believes in personal religion and conversion and prayer and worship, and who, at the same time, rejoices exceedingly and believes in the far-reaching ministry of the great social agencies which are represented in Washington to-day by thousands of utterly devoted men and women who are giving themselves for God and humanity in a spirit of Christlike devotion. My subject is "The Religious Basis of Social Work." My text is a very old-fashioned one, oft quoted by the exponents of "the old Gospel," the text of countless thousands of evangelistic sermons. It has some things in it, as I shall try to show you, that preachers of a one-sided Gospel and makers of historic doctrinal systems have strangely missed. It is Jesus' reply to Nicodemus in John 3:3, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God."

This great word of Jesus is not so much a declaration of the terms of personal salvation as it is a simple statement of spiritual law, that only those who have the illuminating touch of the divine upon their lives can see, can grasp, can apprehend, can appreciate the implications, the demands, the glories of the Kingdom of God. Only those who have experienced the dynamic touch of the Divine can rise to its requirements and endure the strain of its costly but highly rewarding service.

The Kingdom of God is not a frequently recurring phrase in the Fourth Gospel, which deals rather with great abstractions, such as light and truth and eternal life. But in the older tradition of Jesus' teaching which we have in the synoptic gospels the Kingdom of God is central and supreme. It is not easy to describe the Kingdom on the basis of Jesus' teachings, for He nowhere defines it sharply. It is already here, He says, but His disciples are taught to pray for its coming. It is the gift of the Father to His little flock, and yet it is to be entered only by those who agonize. It is sometimes spoken of as breaking suddenly upon the world like a swift flash of lightning, and again as a process of growth like that of a seed from blade to ear and full fruitage. It is not of this world, and yet it is to come in the earth as it is in heaven. It is like a grain of mustard seed, like leaven, like a man sowing good seed, like treasure hid in a field, like a merchant seeking goodly pearls, like a net cast into the sea gathering good and bad. It is quite closely related to Israel's ancient hope, and yet it is non-political, non-militarist, non-nationalist, a universal brotherhood of man. From this manifold description of the Kingdom the simplest definition would seem to be that suggested by the third petition of the Lord's Prayer—human life in all its relationships organized around the will of God. This is what Jesus is thinking about when he lays down the great spiritual law of our text, and says that except a man be born from above he cannot see the Kingdom of God.

Now this has not been a common note in the preaching or praying or singing of the Christian Church. In the light of Jesus supreme concern, it is almost past belief that none of the great historic creeds of the Church should have a clear, emphatic article on the Kingdom of Heaven on earth. The hymnology of the Church is a fairly accurate exponent of its dominant faith and hope, and the typical hymn in all except the very latest collections begins with personal experience or aspirations, notes, troubles and trials that are our lot in this "desert drear," and culminates in a verse of triumph at the thought of a time that is coming when the believer shall fly away on wings like a dove and be forever at rest:

I'm but a stranger here,
Heaven is my home,
Earth is a desert drear,
Heaven is my home.
Earth is a desert drear.

and so on. I would not minimize the sorrows of those who sing

This world is a wilderness of woe,
This world is not my home, and God forbid that I should despise or disparage the heavenly hope. Jesus spoke of Paradise, but it was when He was dying, and His words were addressed to a dying man. His dominant message was rather to living men and it carried the challenge of life and achievement.

We are now moving up to Christ's position. There is a new ring and challenge in much of the preaching of to-day. We are learning to sing some new hymns, songs of the social awakening like that seventy-five-year-old hymn which is being revived in our time:

When wilt Thou save the people?
O God of Mercy, when?
The people, Lord, the people,
Not crowns nor thrones, but men.
God save the people. Thine they are—
Thy children as the angels fair—
From vice, oppression, and despair,
God save the people!

Or that great hymn of Felix Adler:

Hail the glorious golden city,
Everlasting light shines o'er it,

*Sermon preached before the National Council of Social Work, Washington, District of Columbia.

Wondrous things of it are told.
Only righteous men and women
Dwell within its gleaming walls;
Wrong is banished from its borders,
Justice reigns supreme o'er all.

We are builders of that city,
All our joys and all our groans
Help to rear its shining ramparts;
All our lives are building stones,
Whether humble or exalted,
All are called to task divine;
All must aid alike to carry Forward one sublime design.

And we are thus coming nearer to the old Gospel, the real old Gospel, the oldest Gospel of all, the Gospel of the Kingdom which Jesus of Nazareth came preaching 1900 years ago, and concerning which he said, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God."

An intelligent Chinese who heard the Sermon on the Mount for the first time exclaimed at the close of the reading, "Beautiful! Can He do it?" That is the question. Can this wonderful dream come true? Can the Holy City be brought down to earth? Can the world be changed into the Kingdom of God? There are many voices heard in our time, as in every troubled time, saying, "Yes; but it can only be through miraculous supernatural intervention. God will rend the heavens and come down. Jesus will presently come on a white horse in the clouds of heaven with celestial armies and glorified saints, and by the majesty of His personal presence and power subdue all things to Himself." This is what many are calling "the blessed hope." Such a view is commonly associated with a practical pessimism that forecasts an increasing gloom that is to be suddenly banished by the radiant light of the Day of the Lord. With this view the modern social worker can find no sympathy. It cuts the nerve of social effort by declaring its futility. Against this view are likewise ranged all those who have accepted the aid of the scientific spirit in religion and receive the Bible as a progressive revelation of God, historically developed and conditioned. They have not so learned Christ. "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation." He said to the Pharisees who were asking when it should appear, "Neither shall they say lo here, or lo there, for behold the Kingdom of God is within you." The story of the temptation in the wilderness reveals how sorely even Jesus himself was tempted to yield to the apocalyptic expectations of His time and seek what promised to be the easier and quicker way. His whole ministry revealed how completely He rejected the way of the conqueror for the way of the cross.

Since Jesus did definitely depart from the current expectation of speedy catastrophe, in which the good would be vindicated and the wicked overwhelmed, how did He propose to effect the changing of the world into the Kingdom of God? The answer is to be found throughout His teaching, perhaps nowhere more sharply and incisively than in an easily overlooked, almost casual statement in His elucidation of the parable of the tares. In explaining this parable to the disciples He says: "The good seed—these are the children of the Kingdom." His proposal is to sow the world not with Bibles, nor institutions, nor laws, but with folks of a particular type. The kind of folks He has in mind He describes fully in the Sermon on the Mount. The children of the Kingdom are poor in spirit, penitent, teachable, dead in earnest about goodness, merciful, pure in heart, peacemakers. Their righteousness is not of law, but of love. They care nothing for publicity in religious service, but everything for reality. When they pray, they put first the Father's name and Kingdom and will. They recognize the irrepressible conflict between the two philosophies of life for which God and gold stand, and they choose God. They are free from wearing anxiety. They seek first the Kingdom of God, knowing that in a righteous social order all of God's children will have enough of the things that are needed for the good life. One can sum it up in three distinctive characteristics—the children of the Kingdom trust God as their Father; they respect every human personality, recognizing in every other man a brother; and they sacrifice personal advantage for the common good. With such men and women sown freely as good seed the coming of the Kingdom is assured. Without them all our social schemes are hopeless.

Do not think, however, that I am falling back on the individualism of the old evangelism. It is not true, at least in the commonly accepted sense of the word, that if we get people converted social conditions will right themselves. They must be converted in Jesus' sense of the word, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom." And this is just another way of saying, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom." And it means very much more than an earnest desire to go to heaven after death. It means more than a joyous, mystical experience of God; it means more than the observance of an external moral code. It means a new direction for the whole current of life's motives and action; it means a new estimate of the possibilities that are resident in every human life; it means a willingness to accord to every personality the rights and privileges one demands for himself. Except a man be socialized he cannot participate in the supreme social adventure and achievement of the Kingdom of God. The children of the Kingdom are those whose imagination has been captured by the fair vision of a new earth wherein dwells goodness; their minds are open to all of its implications; their wills are subject to its laws; and they go out from the church through which they come together for worship and inspiration and instruction, not only to introduce a new spirit and atmosphere and mental and moral attitude, but also to create those industrial and political and international agencies and institutions through which the spirit of good will may effectively function.

And still a major question remains unanswered, Whence come these socialized individuals who are sown as the good seed of the Kingdom to produce the fruitage of a new social order? When William Booth was asked where he expected to get the preachers for the great evangelizing agency which he was creating, he is said to have pointed to the saloons and brothels of London and said: "I shall find them there!" And the Salvation Army is an abiding monument to the faith of its founder in the unplumbed depth and unrevealed resources of ordinary human life touched by the spirit of God. This was the faith of Jesus. Publicans and fishermen became His apostles. Babes in culture grasped what the wise and prudent missed. "No man knoweth the Father but the Son," He said, and He added significantly, "and they to whom the Son shall reveal Him." He claimed to have found an acquaintance with God more intimate and profound than the greatest of the prophets had known, and to be able to lead common men and women into this transforming knowledge. And this brings us back to the simple scientific statement of our great spiritual law, "Except a man be born from above, he cannot see the Kingdom of God." It requires the knowledge of God that Jesus had to give meaning and value to the life of man.

That is a revealing judgment which the Epistle to the Hebrews passes on, the secret of Moses' success as a revolutionary leader. "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible." Remember that he is talking about a great social reformer, a labor leader, a political revolutionist, the builder of a nation. Philanthropy was not enough; Utopian idealism was not enough. Moses needed God and was able to bear with patience and build for all time because there was added to his social idealism and human sympathy the fear and the fellowship of the invisible God. Dr. Fosdick, in one of his recent sermons, quotes a fable of a spider which swung itself down from the rafters of a high barn on a single thread and, establishing its web on a lower level, went to the business of catching flies, in which it greatly prospered. And then one day it noticed the thread on which it had descended and saw that it extended far up in the unseen above it. "I no longer need that," it said, and snapped it off, and the whole web collapsed. Of course, it is a fable. Spiders are quite too wise for that. Only men are foolish enough to think that they can maintain the family and the school and stable government and human civilization if the thread of faith has been cut which links our life below to the invisible God. We must not allow the materialists to break this vital connection. And we church folk and social workers must equally avoid the old individualism that leaves out the Kingdom, and the new social radicalism that leaves out God, remembering that "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God."

The Christian Endeavor Convention in Des Moines

By Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D.

Secretary of The United Society of Christian Endeavor

SOME fourteen thousand delegates attended this convention, in the hottest city of the country, in the hottest month of the year, and stuck to their seats in the great Coliseum with undiminished zeal, from beginning to end. Indeed, some of the meetings were twice as large and were held in the Fair Grounds, some few miles from the center of the city.

The reputation of the great hall for acoustics has been among the worst, so far as I heard from the Baptists and Presbyterians who had their general meetings there of recent years. I received many advance condolences from men and women in these denominations, but fortunately we did not need them so far as hearing the speakers was concerned, for the Magnavox, one of the great inventions of modern days, made it possible for even speakers of moderate voices to be heard in the remotest sections of the hall, and for nearly a quarter of a mile beyond the confines of the hall.

The arrangement consists of a machine that looks on the platform like a simple radio, but great trumpets protrude from the building on various sides that carry the sound for a long distance, so that it was quite as possible to hear many rods away from the building as in the hall itself. This made the success of such an enormous convention possible, and I recommend it to all those friends who attempt to have meetings of this sort in the future. To be sure, the expense is very considerable, for it cost some $2,000 to install it, but it was well worth while.

The dominant note of the convention was evangelism. The "Friends of Christ Campaign" was proposed and a definite goal set of trying to bring some millions of young people into the churches of the denominations which have societies of Christian Endeavor during the coming year, the goal being fifty per cent. of the present active membership of the societies. "Our friends for Christ, and in Christ, and of Christ," were the dominant notes, though, of course, there was a great variety of subjects considered, from the World Court to the many details of a Christian Endeavor Society. There were some four hundred speakers in all.

Emphasis, of course, was put upon temperance, upon good citizenship, upon the interests of labor and capital, with a plea for fair dealing, and with a denunciation of the twelvehour day. Hearty support of President Harding in his plea for a World Court and other questions of the day which are stirring Americans generally and in which we know young Americans have fully as lively an interest as their elders. Senator Simon Fess of Ohio made a splendid address from historical as well as patriotic grounds for adherence to the World Court. Wayne B. Wheeler stirred the great audience to their depths in speaking of law enforcement and adherence to the prohibition law. Mr. Bryan was also one of the most popular speakers, as he always is, entirely uncontroversial in his thoroughgoing plea for evangelism and service for Christ as the foundation of all reforms.

Many Christian Endeavor favorites like Dr. Poling, the associate president of the United Society; Secretary E. P. Gates, Dr. Ira Landrith and many others whom Endeavorers always expect to hear, were there and were at their best.

Reports from all parts of the country show that during the past two years 10,971 new societies have been formed. The denominations, thirty-seven of which were represented at this meeting and held special denominational rallies of their own, were also friendly and cordial almost without exception, showing that the Society is ever gaining a stronger hold upon the denominational leaders of the country.

Two very eloquent leaders from Great Britain were present, Rev. Lionel B. Fletcher, who is perhaps the foremost evangelist in all Europe and also president of the British Christian Endeavor Union, and Rev. James Kelly, the secretary of the Scottish Sunday-School Union. These friends rendered splendid service in more than one address. Mr. Kelly was a former president of the British Christian Endeavor Union, and both reported that the movement was gaining strength constantly throughout Great Britain, after the serious times, religiously, caused by the war.

Similar interesting and favorable reports came from China, from Germany and from the new countries carved out of the old nations of Europe. Indeed, from almost every part of the world. The Endeavorers feel that they have abundant reason for thanksgiving for the victories of the past two years and for the blessings that seem still to await them in the future.

The Newest Nash Story

By Harold Marshall

FIVE years ago bigger men in the same line of business in the same building were calling the founder of the A. Nash Tailoring Company, "Crazy Nash." He was insane enough to believe that the Golden Rule ought to be applied to business, but not quite crazy enough to believe that it could possibly succeed. Brought up in a church that teaches that daily life is to be governed by the principles of religion, Arthur Nash, when he suddenly found himself the owner of a sweat shop, believed he must apply the Golden Rule to his pay roll. To him that meant a going business—going toward bankruptcy, with the hope that enough might be saved to help pay for a little farm somewhere.

Then he went out to look for the farm.

When he came back he found business coming to meet him. The touch of the Golden Rule had begun to work that golden miracle of which the worst business men dream and the best despair. Increased wages had decreased production costs. The story of the next five years is the most thrilling and inspiring chapter in modern industrial history. In the fiercest competition the Golden Rule won against the Rule of Gold. A total output of $132,000 in 1918 grew to $3,750,000 in 1922, and it is already evident that it will not be humanly possible for the present great factory to take care of the business offered it for the coming year.

This material achievement is so great that it may easily blind us to that of which it is only sign and symbol—a spiritual development that leaves those closest to it thrilled and awed. For nineteen hundred years men have been looking and longing, have been saying, "Lo, here," and "Lo, there," but the Kingdom of Heaven on earth has not come. Has it come now in a clothing factory? No man knows; but no man or woman who was in the Nash factory on the morning of July 3 will ever forget the great experience and much more the great mood of that hour.

It was the semi-annual mass meeting of the workers, in which by their own vote they fix prices, wages and hours for the ensuing half year. To those who watched the hundreds and hundreds of men and women slowly gather in the big workroom there was an atmosphere of sunny serenity seldom seen anywhere in these fevered days in which we live. In that atmosphere it was the obvious thing to open the business meeting with a prayer for the realized presence of the Father and a deeper sense of brotherhood. Though salesmen from all parts of the country had gathered with the workers for the first time, as the vice president called for the reports of the heads of departments, there was neither formality nor restraint. The various executives and superintendents gave intimate family talks, punctured here and there with clever friendly comment from the workers themselves.

Finally the report of the president was called for, and as he climbed up on the work table that served for a platform there was a tender, reverent hush. Carefully and patiently he explained to them the operations and results of the previous half year. He went into intimate financial details, told them just what the profits had been and how derived. He reminded them that there had been a tacit understanding that a profit of one dollar per suit should be allowed the company out of which to pay dividends and make necessary increases. He told them it had not been earned under existing conditions of prices and wages and hours. If there were any listeners familiar with ordinary stockholders' meetings they were probably thinking this prefaced a proposed raising of prices or lowering of wages or increase of hours. As a matter of fact, it was followed by this statement and recommendations:

FELLOW WORKERS: As your co-worker and the president of this company I have three recommendations which I wish to offer for adoption or rejection at this our semi-annual meeting.

First, I recommend that the price of our garments remain the same as it has been for the last two seasons, namely, $23.50 per suit or overcoat at retail.

Second, I recommend a change in the hours for our women workers as follows:

Whereas, we have been working five days per week, eight hours per day, making a working week of forty hours, I recommend that this be changed for the women factory workers to five days of seven hours each, making a week of thirty-five hours, the weekly wage to remain the same as it is now for forty hours, except in cases where the next recommendation would increase the wages.

Third, I recommend that 50 cents per hour be made the minimum wage for regular women workers.

In submitting these recommendations I beg the privilege of making the following statement:

I have several reasons for making this first recommendation not to change the price of our suits. I read to you the other day in a called meeting a portion of a letter from a competitor urging us to raise the price of our suits. This letter showed clearly that other manufacturers are only waiting to see what we do before they decide what price they will put on their garments. This places upon us a double responsibility. In this meeting we are to consider the interest of three parties: first, the consumer; second, you workers in the factory; and third, the investors in the company.

The consumer, the first to be considered, is not here to speak for himself, but if we are going to live the Golden Rule we must live it toward him, and do by him as we would be done by if our positions were reversed. While it is true that the woollens and everything used in suits have advanced in price, I believe that we are in duty bound to protect the public which has so loyally supported us to the limit of our ability. I, therefore, recommend that we do not raise our price.

Regarding the second recommendation, I simply want to say that it seems to me to be absurd and an insult to the worker for himself to talk about building the Kingdom of Heaven on earth in church and religious meetings and then when we come to our factories and industries take the women workers, the wives and mothers of the next generation, and set them at intensive, highly specialized work, often on machines run by electricity, for even forty hours per week, which is less than in most industries.

Since we established the forty-hour week I have received a great many communications purporting to condemn it. One was a circular signed the "Housewife's Union," telling how many hours the housewife has to work, and asking why something was not done to shorten their hours. In reply I would say that perhaps something can be done, but the nonsensical fallacy of offering this as a criticism for shortening the working hours for women in a factory is readily seen when it is remembered that a very large percentage of these factory workers must go home after they have put in a day in the factory and do the tasks of the housewife.

Careful inquiry has led me to the definite conclusion that practically all the women workers in industries are really performing the duties of a wife or preparing to do so. The percentage of girls and women who enter industry as a life work and do not expect to ever have homes I believe is less than two per cent. of the women workers. Arguments against what we are doing are based on these two per cent. instead of the ninety-eight per cent. It is preposterous to expect a woman in any industry to do these highly specialized jobs, working eight hours per day, and prepare herself for love, husband and family.

Regarding the third recommendation, I think no remarks are necessary. I believe that this minimum wage is required in order for a girl or woman to be decently self-supporting, and when I recommend that 50 cents per hour should be our minimum wage I want it understood that that simply means that no wage is to be less than that, and I hope they will all be much more.

During the reading there was earnest and thoughtful attention. Then came a few moments in which inquiring looks were met by answering nods. Presently it was moved and seconded that the recommendations be adopted by a rising vote. Instantly every worker, including many who were stockholders in the company and knew that this meant still smaller profits, was on his or her feet, and the chairman declared the three recommendations adopted by a unanimous vote.

To many of us it seemed as though nothing else so thrilling as this could possibly happen, but no one can anticipate what these amazing people will do. The chairman told them that before the meeting adjourned a representative of the New England Nash force would tell them what happened at a meeting in Boston where Mr. Nash spoke. Then followed a brief recital of how the ninety-six members of the sales force in Boston had listened to a plea for the substitution of brotherly co-operation for selfish competition in all our industrial relations, and spontaneously formed the Fellowship of the Golden Rule. He told of similar meetings held by the salesmen in Chicago and Detroit and Philadelphia. It needed no formal vote to express their approval. Workers and salemen and stockholders and company officials and guests rose and together repeated the fellowship pledge:

In the spirit of Jesus we unite ourselves in the Fellowship of the Golden Rule, pledging our utmost endeavor to make God's law of brotherhood the law of our lives.

Slowly, silently the great gathering melted away, but some there were who found it easier to understand what happened on the Day of Pentecost, when brethren were together in one place with one spirit.

The Reconstruction of Europe

By Sherwood Eddy, LL.D.

A PART from the menace to world peace of France's military occupation of the Ruhr, which hangs like a dark, threatening war cloud over Germany, the rest of the Continent is slowly recovering from the devastation and poverty of the war. Czechoslovakia has three times balanced her budget and successfully floated a foreign loan. Italy has been saved from revolution and her currency is being stabilized under the reactionary dictatorship of Mussolini. Even Russia is now gradually recovering economically, both in the cities and in the country districts. No country, however, has shown a more marked improvement of late than Austria, which a year ago was in the most desperate plight of any European nation save Russia. In a word, while Germany is sinking under the invasion of the Ruhr, in my opinion, Austria has been saved by the League of Nations. The League or an impartial neutral body of financiers could settle the question of the Ruhr and the reparations as well if France were willing to submit to the decision of an impartial tribunal and were not bent upon vengeance and military imperialism which may again ultimately drag the world back into war.

The League of Nations during the three short years of its existence has already prevented three wars, saved Albania, settled the boundary line of Upper Silesia, composed the difference between Sweden and Finland over the Åland Islands, averted hostilities in the Polish-Lithuania dispute, settled the conflict over the frontiers between Austria, Hungary and Czechoslovakia, the relations between Bulgaria and its neighbors and the dispute between Finland and Soviet Russia. It has advanced the suppression of opium and narcotic drugs by a whole generation in the conference just closed at Geneva, where Bishop Brent so powerfully represented the American cause.

Through its International Labor Office the influence of the League has helped backward nations to pass legislation which in time will assist in lifting these countries from the abyss of sweated labor. It has provided the first practical world association of fifty-two nations in a new spirit of co-operation. And it has done all of this without moving a single soldier, without impairing the sovereignty of any nation or assuming any of the prerogatives of a super-state.

Its most notable recent achievement has been the saving of Austria when all other agencies had completely failed. According to the official report of the Financial Committee, Austria was "collapsing into a chaos of destitution and starvation to which there is no modern analogy outside Russia." The Austrian Minister had stated frankly to the allied powers that "to the general public the continued existence of Austria has become doubtful." The crown had sunk to one-fifteen-thousandth part of its pre-war value, or one-seventy-hundredth of a cent. The expenses of the government were more than twice its income. A hundred and seventy thousand men were unemployed and in desperate straits. The railways were losing more than twenty-five million dollars a year and the state enterprises as a whole more than thirty million dollars. A hundred thousand supernumeraries were employed by the government whom they dared not dismiss to add to the menacing ranks of the unemployed. Austria was facing bankruptcy, starvation, revolution and chaos. She was about to fall a prey to her more powerful neighbors. Yugoslavia was ready to invade and seize the south. Czechoslovakia in self-defense would have had to occupy the north. Italy would have claimed her share and war would have been the inevitable result.

For three years Austria had been living upon charity and had squandered the large foreign loans advanced by individual nations. Her last appeal to the Premiers in London had been rejected. The Allied Supreme Council had utterly failed to find a solution for her difficulties. She was descending the spiral stairway of depreciated currency into the dark abyss of economic ruin. Finally, Mr. Lloyd George and the Premiers of Europe referred her to the League of Nations as a last resort.

Within a month the expert committees of the League had surveyed the situation. A plan was devised to save Austria by internal reform and by outside help. Three protocols were proposed by the League and signed by the nations concerned. The first declares that the signatories will "respect the political independence, the territorial integrity and the sovereignty of Austria; that they will seek no special or exclusive economic or financial advantage which would compromise that independence." The second agrees to economic provisions to save Austria, by a domestic loan of ten million dollars and a foreign loan of a hundred and thirty-five millions had a larger staff of civil servants than when she was be carried out under the new Commissioner General, Dr. Zimmerman, the former able burgomaster of Rotterdam. Austria has agreed gradually to dismiss a hundred thousand officials who are no longer needed, since the population has been reduced from fifty-two million to six million. She has already succeeded in cutting down the list by forty thousand. She could not dismiss them all at once without starvation or revolution. This little state with a population of six millions had a larger staff of civil servants than when she was a monarchy with over fifty million people. Provision has been made to balance her budget within two years. The plan was launched in August, 1922, and immediately her paper money was stabilized and has even gained in value during the last year.

During the same period Germany was left to struggle alone without the assistance of the League and the mark depreciated from three hundred to more than ninety thousand to the dollar. She continues to go down the same dark spiral stairway of depreciated currency which leads to unknown depths.

Unemployment has already been reduced in Austria from 170,000 to 120,000. Her bank deposits have increased more than five-fold after a year under the protection of the League. We found a new hope stimulating the Austrian people while a deeper despair is creeping over Germany. In all past history nations weakened like Austria have fallen an easy prey to their conquerors or powerful neighbors. Here is the first instance in history where a nation has been saved by the co-operation of friends and foes alike through a League of Nations.

In Austria we found some fifty co-operative building societies constructing homes for the poor around Vienna, where the municipality lends two-thirds of the cost of the home at five per cent. interest. Each householder provides a little money and much labor. One of the Kaiser's palaces is occupied by the officers of the Friends' Mission and other useful organizations. His privileged hunting park is now cultivated by a co-operative society for wounded and disabled soldiers.

The future of Austria is as bright as that of Switzerland.

About a tenth of Austria in the north consists of fertile flat land, but nine-tenths of her territory in the south is mountainous like that of Switzerland. She has not yet raised her agriculture, however, to the level of Switzerland. Her industries are as yet only fifty per cent. efficient, but will greatly improve under the new program. Vienna, with its population of two millions, will regain its former position of the great banking, shopping and commercial center of central and southeastern Europe and the Balkans. Austria can develop her manufacture of iron, steel and luxuries. Though lacking coal, she has vast potential electrical power in her water supply.

Thus, under the leadership of the League the nations are now co-operating to save Austria. Norway has poured in her codliver oil, many tubercular children have been saved and we found the sad sights of a year ago giving place to brighter faces and better nourished bodies. The best breeds of Dutch cattle and of English poultry have been provided to restore the little farms. American soda water fountains have been furnished by the Friends as a substitute for alcoholic drinks. The American Relief Administration, the American Red Cross and the Friends' Mission from America and England have done much to save starving Austria for three years. Such co-operation is "unlabeled Christianity." But far better than charity and relief is the practical reconstruction under the League of Nations, which is putting Austria upon a sound basis financially, industrially and politically.

We found sixty per cent. of the students engaged in working their way under a system of self-help. More than sixty thousand students in Germany also are now working their way through school, college or university. The students of Prague have built their own dormitories. The refugee students of Russia are working under the organization of student relief, to which American students have given so generously. The students of Europe are being assisted not only to avert starvation but to learn a new sympathy with labor, a new doctrine of self-help and a new spirit of democracy and co-operation. But best of all the Republic of Austria, which a year ago stood in despair and threatened chaos today spells hope and promise.

Three countries in the world to-day are unwilling to admit that any good can come out of the League of Nations. These are Soviet Russia, which distrusts all nations under "capitalism"; despairing Germany, which distrusts the League as a possible instrument of French revenge, and isolated America. We talk about outlawing war when we are unwilling to co-operate with other nations in providing the only practical, concrete alternative to war in some actual working instrumentality of peace.

The writer was encouraged by the new liberal movement which he found in Japan, the Renaissance movement in China, and the movement for self-determination in India. But the brightest spot he has found in the dark continent of Europe to-day is the League of Nations centering in Geneva. It could have been a far greater success with America's aid, but with or without her it will demonstrate the possibility of world co-operation. Once the menace of French militarism is averted Europe as well as Austria may be saved by the League.

According to a report of the Navy Department, Capt. E. T. Pollock recently discovered a turtle left in the Tonga Islands by Capt. Thomas Cook, the English mariner, in 1773. The turtle, Captain Pollock said, showed signs of extreme age and "when walking creaks like an ox-cart."

Impressions of the Far East

By William C. Allen

EIGHT years have elapsed since my last visit to the Far East. Many changes have taken place in that time. The material development has been great. The traveler entering the harbor of Yokohama is immediately impressed with the modern conditions in front of the Japanese background. He proceeds to Tokyo on one of the little trains that connect Yokohama with Tokyo and discovers in many respects the same situation. Tokyo, Yokohama and Kobe have become cities of tremendous vitality and influence. Whilst many streets in Tokyo are as full as ever of the charm and picturesqueness of Japanese life, and old-times scenes delight the man from the West as he wanders through the midst of one or two-storied houses and shops, the newer parts of the city, for instance near the Imperial Palace, the new, big railway station and the Ginze—the principal shopping street—are being made over. Large office buildings, big shops, handsome bank buildings and fine club houses appear in every direction as far as the eye can reach. An immense hotel will succeed the small hostleries of the past when it shall have been completed. In Yokohama and Kobe have sprung into being great docks capable of accommodating the largest vessels, whilst warehouses spread along the water fronts for miles. The great factories of Kobe and Osaka pour forth volumes of smoke which can be observed miles away. The harbors of Yokohama and Kobe are not only thronged with innumerable sailing craft of every size and description, including the humble sampan and gallant ships from foreign ports, but also with continually arriving and departing steamships from all round the globe. San Francisco harbor, with her masts and smokestacks, looks like an annex only to the infinitely greater activities of these seaports of Japan. The traffic among Oriental countries surpasses the belief of the Western man until he has seen it for himself. As to Japan, he sees that a mighty nation has come into being over night.

Whilst the business men of the largest cities of Japan have adopted Western clothing—and certainly not improved their personal appearance thereby—the women of Japan still wear the fascinating garments used by them for countless generations. Whilst business is in the very air, whilst the streets resound with strange cries, and whilst all is bustle and activity, our Japanese friends of the higher classes have not forgotten the old-time courtesy and dignity which characterized them years ago. I think that some of these attributes may have been lost to some extent among the masses, probably as a result of imitation of Western ways, but not all. The rickshaw men are as courteous as ever. I have never been overcharged by them. I recall how one morning in Tokyo, during my recent visit to that city, I dropped work and took a rickshaw ride accompanied by my faithful camera. My kourouma stopped whenever I bid him, whilst I would dismount and snap some suggestive scene. He became highly interested and took particular pains to lead me to some beautiful spots of which I had been quite ignorant. In Hibiya Park he led me to a quiet spot where were glorious masses of azalias in full bloom—red, red everywhere in the glowing sunlight. The perfect riot of reds, scarlets and magentas was beyond description—acres of blinding color surrounded by trimmed greenery and flowers! I have seen manifold dazzling effects in gardening in many lands, but never such a magnificent display as this massive solidity of reds. Japan, in the rush of commercial expansion, is not forgetting the beauty and the art that adorned her past.

There are immense business operations in Japan. Her captains of industry, her wizards of finance, do not always deal with small figures. Thus the Mutsui Bussan Kaisha, Limited, has a paid-up capital of one hundred million yen. The Oriental Steel Company, Limited (I waive its Japanese name) has a capital of forty million yen; Suzuki and Company a full-paid capital of fifty million yen; the Mitsui Kosan Kaisha (mining) has a capital of one hundred million yen, and so forth. The great department store of Tokyo, Mitsukoshi, in some respects excels the leading shops of the great cities of China, with its display of goods, its grand marble staircase, its escalator, its rest rooms for women and children. Some Japanese banks have paid-up capital as follows: The Bank of Chosen, fifty million yen; the Bank of Taiwan, forty-five million yen; the Yokohama Specie Bank, Limited, one hundred million yen; the Mitsui Bank, Limited, sixty million yen. A yen equals half a dollar of American money. Some good-sized banking concerns of America or Europe look small in comparison with a few of the banks of the Far East. China also has some great banking companies.

When we go to China we there discover wonderful progress within the past few years despite the military and political upheavals that have distracted that country of recent time. Glance, for instance, at Southern China. It is true that the British colony of Hong Kong, with its tide of business and scenic beauty, its four hundred thousand population and vast shipping and commercial interests, is only about one hundred miles from Canton, China. It is true that these great cities do not seem to have been able to construct even a motor road between them. At the same time, Canton, under purely Chinese management and disturbed by occasional revolutions, is making rapid strides towards modern conditions. The Bund, the broad street by the river front, has become one of the great city thoroughfares of the world. Within a few years it has been lengthened and the land side of it has been improved with substantial shops and commercial houses. The river teems with countless vessels of every description and is alive with hundreds of thousands of sweltering, toiling coolies. The old city wall is being taken down and a wide street is taking its place. Broad boulevards are being relentlessly cut through the old-fashioned, dirty, hideously narrow streets in different directions.

While in Canton I stopped at the Christian College, which is the most important educational center for all South China. The student body numbers over eight hundred and there are over one hundred instructors, native and foreign. In the higher courses a large portion of the students are Christians, most of them having become publicly affiliated with the Christian faith since living there. They constitute a fine group of young people. Not only does the Christian influence run deeply and broadly from the faculty to the students, but much attention is paid to instruction calculated to develop the material interest of that part of the country. Thus a department for the extension of the silk industry on scientific lines is winning much approval and support from leading Chinese and recently from the farmers, who at first were opposed to innovations on such lines. Professor Howard, in charge of this work, conducted me over the buildings devoted to his fascinating employment and revealed its practical operation—a wonderful story alone.

I addressed the student body on several occasions, once upon the subject of "Internationalism," and received a warm response and sympathy to my appeals. At the same time it was recognizable that past insults and commercial exploitation, poured upon China for decades by so-called Christian powers, have created the feeling that militarism—as much as they dislike it—may yet force them to resent the treatment they have received and become their hope of securing redress in future years. One horribly humid and blistering hot evening I addressed some two hundred earnest men in the Y. M. C. A. in Canton.

Illicit opium traffic continues and is increasing. It is stated that those who are appointed to uphold the law are often engaged in the business. Piracy still exists on the rivers and about the shores of China. The steamship on which we traveled between Canton and Hong Kong had armed guards aboard who paced the deck with guns across their shoulders. It is said that the attitude of the people towards political questions is generally unsatisfactory. Idol worship has been increasing during the past few years. A writer on this subject says: "One reason for this may be found, perhaps, in the activities of the military party and in some of the large temples in the interior one may see votive offerings inscribed with the name of one or another military unit." This is very similar to what one sees in Christian places of worship where memorials are erected to the memory of military men and, I presume, where none are ever seen, to those who have suffered because of their adherence to the pacific teachings of the Sermon on the Mount. Christians and non-Christians are in some fundamental aspects very much alike.

The position of women in China steadily improves despite the conservatism of the people. Women constitute but thirty-eight per cent. of the Christian Church membership, while girls number but seventeen per cent. of the enrollment in the mission high schools. Some of the most delightful women I have ever met with have been those connected with educational institutions in China. In attractive personality, dignity, mental equipment and intellectual power these ladies compare with any in the world.

Of course, during my somewhat limited experiences on this last trip to the Far East I met with foreigners who are opposed to the missionary movement in the Far East. These people do not know what they are judging. I met also with men and women who consider it absolutely necessary that the peoples of the Far East be held by the strong arm of a military policy. These advocates of force fail to recognize the change that is coming—they do not understand that reason and justice are to be the substitutes if future peace is to be maintained. During this visit to the Orient I met a well-known general with whom I had numerous conversations regarding these matters. He is a fine man. He claimed to be a pacifist and without doubt sincerely so. We could not tally ideas on all points, although we did full agree as to the general policies that should be pursued to avert war. Probably our respective positions were found in his remark as we parted: "Speak softly, but carry the big stick—it is the only thing they respect"; whilst I replied, "But the trouble is that one big stick always creates opposing big sticks, and the whole system is contrary to Jesus Christ." I hope to enjoy future friendship with him.

China continues to suffer economically from the Great War. There are two types of business men and statesmen. Business men and rulers in Christian lands who inaugurate foreign commercial policies are often—not always—indirectly responsible for the unnumbered afflictions of countless millions of non-Christians who learn to hate us because of our wars. These so-called "heathens" recognize that the situation is largely rooted in greed and in competitive efforts to exploit them and remote portions of the earth. I have within the past twelve months met with stories everywhere which have revealed the deep-seated resentment of the dark and yellow races toward the white and dominant races because the latter, while in some respects developing their resources and contributing to their comfort, have attained these ends at the expense of national pride and racial aspirations with machine guns and gunboats. Of latter time "Christian" dominance has in some instances among native races in Asia and Africa been attained by bombing from the air innocent women and children. I have heard it declared by foreigners resident in the Far East that the inhabitants of those countries have lost respect for, and confidence in, the Western nations since the failure of the latter to observe the terms of the Treaty of Versailles and their squabbles for the spoils of war. Unquestionably, missionary enterprise is tremendously handicapped by the present non-Christian situation. What are our churches going to do about it?

With exceptions, some of the old religious faiths of the Far East are dying—they do not yield the solace or the Saviour that the Gospel of Jesus would afford them. Why do they not turn to Jesus? The preaching of the Gospel is handicapped by the inconsistencies of Christendom—its failure, often, individually and internationally to practice the Gospel teachings.

While the Chinese are torn with political strife, while their dialects are various and their monetary system a reproach, while other countries have too frequently taken advantage of them and fomented no end of trouble, the old country is far from dead. Her resources are boundless, she learns good and evil from the West. We have instructed her in militarism. Her strong men openly avow that their future safety will consist in arming her so as to put thirty million of her men, available for the army, in battle array against the "Christian peoples" who have taught them the use of explosives and machine guns. Do we wonder at the position they are commencing to assume?

Everywhere the Chinese are reaching out and absorbing the wealth of the countries adjacent to their own. They have a thirst for toil, they are not afraid of undertaking any commercial expansion beyond their own borders. Their banking and business houses extend throughout the Dutch East Indies; they are generally honest; their business men are the merchant princes of that part of the world. They overcome unjust opposition and laws; their numbers multiply throughout the Orient in countries far distant than their own. Who will be able to contend with this peace-loving people whom Westerners criticize and ridicule because they have not engaged in foreign wars for thousands of years? They have not for many generations taken the sword internationally and have not perished by the sword. Are they going to endure insults, abuse and exploitation forever? Is it not time for Christendom to commence to treat them decently? Is it not time that we commenced to treat ourselves decently? Are they not keenly watching the Christian peoples kill and starve each other by the many millions, and abiding the time when we, decimated and enfeebled in virility and resources, shall be dictated to by them? I uphold no bogey. It is not too late for us to mend our ways—they do not want trouble—and if we practice the Golden Rule they will gladly respond to its faintest touch. Our armaments intensify their fears and every new battleship weakens us because it makes us enemies.

If we continue to fail in the practical application of the teachings of Jesus we must expect, according to the revelations of history and science, to be supplanted by others; and God may yet make trial of the yellow races and through them seek the consummation of His ultimate purposes as He would apply His beneficent intent to the children of men. It is unquestionably up to the churches and Christians of America and Europe to bring pressure on their government and insist on better ethics in international relations if the white man's boasted civilization is to endure.

The Unity of Science and Religion

By Arthur A. Blanchard

Associate Professor of Chemistry, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

CYNICALS have often remarked to the effect that God hates a well-meaning fool more than he hates a rascal.

Cynical as this remark is we nevertheless appreciate its force. The idealist who is not practical must be classified as a well-meaning fool, but the practical man who does not have idealism does not need to be hated by God; he hates himself. It is of the idealism of science that I am to talk to you. The scientist who fails to see behind the marvels of the universe some infinite power which is the source of natural laws must be lacking in idealism, and the religious man who disregards the teachings of science builds without a foundation. Science then is nothing without religion and religion without science is nothing.

This paper is presented by a scientific man who feels that he is deeply religious, but since his version of the subject will be regarded as the scientific version it may be well to explain what a scientist is. All people who have senses of perception and acquire useful knowledge through these senses are scientists. Even a baby who has just learned to crawl and seeing an attractive shiny object across the room goes to it and reaches up its hand is a scientist. The object is a stove with a fire inside and the baby feels a sensation of pain. It withdraws its hand in terror and bewilderment. It has had a new experience which it does not understand; it has a vague suspicion that the stove has something to do with it, but it is not certain, and, anyway, it knows the stove looks attractive. So again it lifts its hand and touches the stove. The sensation is repeated and now the baby knows that the stove causes pain, and should not be touched. All men who connect up their experiences with events that preceded them in the relation of cause and effect and retain the knowledge so gained to guide their future conduct are scientists. The trained scientist differs from other men simply in the degree to which he has trained himself to observe accurately, to trace back to the cause from the effect, and to so classify the knowledge he gains as to make it most available for the benefit of the world.

Of all the mysteries of religion and science man has always been to himself the greatest mystery. When came we, when go we, and what are we while we are here? We are beings that are capable of experiencing sensations and feeling emotions. We recognize five senses—sight, hearing, taste, touch, and smell. Through these we receive certain sensations which we interpret as indicating a world of material things about us. It is the function of science to interpret sensations, and science has given us a very definite picture of the material world.

Definite as is this picture of the material world, we must still admit that it is only an interpretation of the sensations. We admit that often our sensations are very deceptive, and we find our consciousness sometimes inclined to doubt the material world. Our emotions exist just as certainly as do our sensations. Emotions are less easy to comprehend than sensations. They are often stimulated by the sensations, it is true, but they are something quite apart from mere sensation, something that is fundamentally a manifestation of our real selves. It is the function of religion to interpret the emotions. Our emotions are far less subject to exact definition than the sensations, and the interpretation that religion furnishes of the emotions is a far less definite and precise a picture. Nevertheless, the only things that we human beings are absolutely certain of is our consciousness, and its ability to feel sensations and emotions, and, if anything, the emotions are more real than the sensations. Religion, then, is even more real than science, even if it is less susceptible to exact formulation.

Bigotry is not confined to religion. The man who thinks himself a scientist and imagines that the whole world is embraced in his interpretation of his physical sensations is a far worse bigot than the religious bigot.

Certain persons have claimed that religion and science are antagonists. Some have tried to suppress the study of evolution because the conclusions from that study are in contradiction to what they think certain words of the Bible mean. What an egregious conceit—that one's personal understanding of the Bible words is of weight against logical scientific conclusions—that our Bible, even if it did contradict the evidence of evolution, should necessarily be true for everyone. Our Bible is the written record of only one of the world's great religions, and its beautiful teachings are very imperfectly lived in the daily lives of even that minority of the population which professes to accept it as a guide. This is one kind of bigotry—to insist that one's individual interpretation of the statements of the particular holy book which the accident of parentage and environment led him to accept must be received as truth by others than himself—that others shall give up their own conviction of truth derived from scientific observation, or from other religious teachings.

Another kind of bigotry is that of the so-called scientist who measures quantities of energy and matter and finds that certain results are always reproducible under certain conditions; who finds that all the output of heat and mechanical energy of the human body can be exactly accounted for from the combustion of the food consumed; who finds that no matter or energy is ever lost from the universe, simply that they change form according to definite laws, and who concludes from all this that the whole universe can be explained on a physical and chemical basis and denies the existence of spiritual forces and of religion.

Such a man is more narrow-minded than the religious bigot. The religious bigot simply has never been trained to think logically. He finds something to believe and knows no better than to hold fast to that belief. The tenacity of his belief is commendable. But the scientist is supposed to be a trained thinker. For him to deny everything not revealed by the five senses is unpardonable. Why should he think that truth should be revealed alone by the five senses that he happens to possess. If God had not given him the sense of sight his feeble intelligence would probably never have guessed of the possibility of such a sense of perception. Why then should he imagine that there may not be possible senses which may perceive truths of which he has never dreamed? Why should he ignore his emotions which ought to tell him that he is a part of a great plan of creation which it is the function of religion to interpret.

Religion and science have the common object of trying to understand ourselves and the world in which we live and the relation of one to the other. If we try to define the fields of each we would say that religion lies in the spiritual field and science in the material field. But are these two distinct fields? They appear so, of course, but are they so in reality? We must admit that they interpenetrate to a considerable extent and that a sharp line of demarcation cannot be drawn.

The progress of science in the past twenty years has been very remarkable and forces hitherto unsuspected have been discovered, and things formerly regarded as the most substantial have been found to be no more real than a configuration of motions.

Take for example solid substances. The direct evidence of our senses tells us that iron or glass are rigid and impenetrable. Yet light passes through glass; X-rays pass through substances opaque to ordinary light. Nobody really understands what light is, but it is usually supposed to be propagated as a series of waves through an all-pervading medium called the ether, much as sound is propagated as waves through the air, or as ripples are propagated across the surface of a pond. Light is not regarded as a material substance, but let us consider the possibility of solids, glass or iron, or any other solid being penetrated by material substances. If we throw a lead bullet against a pane of glass we know that the pane is shattered. If, however, we fire the bullet from a high-powered rifle it drills a clean hole through the glass. Now let us speculate what would happen if the bullet were endowed with an enormous velocity. The velocity of light is 190,000 miles per second. Suppose, however, we content ourselves with one-tenth of this velocity, or 19,000 miles per second, and let us imagine we could construct an engine capable of projecting a lead bullet weighing one-sixth of an ounce with this velocity. To do this our engine would have to perform an amount of work equal to that necessary to bring five thousand railroad trains weighing one thousand tons each up to an express speed of sixty miles per hour. If the bullet traveling at this velocity should strike the pane of glass the probability is that it would not even make a hole as it passed through. It is hardly likely that we will ever be able to put this experiment to the actual test with lead bullets, but nature provides us with very small missiles which travel with the enormous velocities approaching that of light.

Radium and similar materials are known to emit rays which consist of material particles called alpha particles, and are shot forth with about one-tenth the velocity of light. These particles shoot through glass and sheets of gold, lead and all solid substances without puncturing them.

This argument is cited as the most likely to convince the non-scientific man of the unsubstantial nature of solid matter. The scientist, however, possesses to-day much corroborative evidence which it would be difficult to present in the space at our disposal.

Scientists have believed for over a hundred years that matter consists of atoms. To show the smallness of atoms it may be stated that a lead bullet weighing one-sixth of an ounce contains fifteen thousand million million lead atoms. Until recently scientists postulated that the atoms were solid, impenetrable and indivisible. To-day atoms are believed to be miniature solar systems consisting of a nucleus corresponding to the sun, with electrons corresponding to the planets of our solar system revolving around the nucleus. A comet shooting at our solar system will usually pass through the empty spaces and not hit sun or planets. Likewise the majority of the alpha particles, the projectiles shot out by radium will pass through atoms without striking nucleus or electrons. The atoms, then, consist mostly of empty space; the electrons are at enormous relative distances from the nucleus and are held in certain definite orbits or configurations by electrical force, just as the planets are held in the solar system by gravitational force.

Formerly, when it was thought that atoms were solid and indivisible, it was also thought that there were as many different kinds of atoms as there were kinds of elementary material substances, that is, about eighty. To-day it has been proven that the elements are transmutable, that lead atoms and gold atoms are built of exactly the same materials, although man will probably never succeed in transforming lead into gold on a commercial scale.

It is thus recognized that the atoms of matter are very complex, but that all atoms are built of exactly the same ultimate units, which are in fact the atoms of electricity, of which there appear to be two kinds, atoms of positive electricity which are called protons, and atoms of negative electricity which are called electrons. What are protons and electrons? Science has not gone so far as to make even a serious guess as to this.

Science has taken away from us the reality of our solid material objects and shown that they consist only of a dispersed system of protons and electrons in certain configurations. We might at least hope that the electrons and protons might be conceded a material existence, but the indications are that such even is not the case. They appear to be nothing more than energy manifestations in the universal medium which fills space.

For example, a smoker puffs smoke in a certain way and makes a smoke ring. The smoke merely makes the ring visible, for if he puffs in the same way with no smoke in his mouth he would make a similar ring, but it would not be seen. This visible smoke ring, or the invisible air ring, has no material existence other than its being a manifestation in the material air, yet the smoke ring is a real thing. If it were not for the friction of the air which slows down the whirling motion this ring, once started, would continue forever. Electrons and protons are undoubtedly manifestations in the ether, as smoke rings are manifestations in the air. The human intelligence is not yet capable of understanding the ether, and so our conception of protons and electrons can be no more definite than that they are manifestations in the ether.

One must marvel at the accomplishment of the scientist in unravelling so many of the mysteries of the material world, especially when his means of observation are limited to his five very inadequate senses. It is a very narrow-minded scientist who thinks that there is nothing in nature that has not been revealed to him. There are probably spiritual forces in the universe of more power and importance than any of the material forces revealed as yet to the scientist. There may be dormant senses which man is capable of developing which will reveal these spiritual forces. Our consciousness itself is a spiritual force about which we understand very little. It is the function of religion to contemplate our consciousness and our various emotions, awe, reverence, love, and through them to help us understand ourselves and our purpose in the world. The scientist invents his hypothesis and theories to help him understand the natural world, and some other scientist may scorn the theories. Religion has its creeds and dogmas, which are the hypotheses put forward to explain man's spiritual existence. We are prone to scoff at the creeds and dogmas of other tribes than our own, but to do so is bigotry. Surely, none of the creeds, not even our own, express all the truth of religion, but just as certainly all of them are efforts to find the truth; and since nothing is more real than effort, we must regard even contradictory dogmas as being manifestations of truth.

Science has perhaps set the example of careful logical thinking from cause to effect, or from effect back to cause. Emotional manifestations are not so easily defined as material manifestations, and in religion we have a far less definite point from which to start our process of careful thinking. Nevertheless, the great religious teachers have been deep thinkers. The material world is inseparable from the spiritual. One cannot understand one and ignore the other. Science and religion have a common cause, to try to understand ourselves, and real progress can be achieved when they work in harmony, supplementing each other. The real scientist ought to be deeply religious, and the religious teacher ought to have a deep appreciation of science. One may even venture the prediction that the human intelligence, in spite of its limited means of perception, may be able some time to demonstrate that spiritual and material forces are not so distinct as we now suppose, but that they are different kinds of manifestations of the same ultimate power of the universe. I have perhaps stressed the importance of understanding ourselves as being the aim of religion and science. But the importance of such an understanding lies in the way that we make use of it in determining our conduct.

Both religion and science teach that self-restraint, fidelity, honesty, industry and love bring good, and that excesses, infidelity, dishonesty, sloth and hate bring evil. Science reaches this conclusion by observation of cause and effect. Christ was a careful observer and a deep thinker, and we may be sure that the precepts which he has given us were a result of His deep insight into human nature.

Is science in harmony with religion? The purpose of both is to find truth and promote the good in the world. Certainly their aims are harmonious. The method of science is that of careful observation and careful correlation of cause and effect; surely this method is in harmony with any reasonable religion. Scientific knowledge, it is true, has been applied for evil purposes, just as crimes have been committed in the name of religion, but this does not stamp either as being bad or antagonistic with the other.

Apparent contradictions are abundant in this world, and it is not surprising that many people see contradictions between science and religion. But science has gone far enough to show that things are not what they seem, that the material things which happen to make the strongest impression on our sensations are no more material than smoke rings or ripples. A radio receiving set is tuned to receive messages of a certain wave length, while other wave lengths pass unperceived. Our senses of perception of natural things are tuned to receive impressions from only one kind of manifestations, but who can tell what may not exist that our sense organs are not tuned to receive. Science is therefore in no way antagonistic to religious belief in spiritual life after mortal death.

But if one reads, for example, the Bible account of the creation literally one finds it to vary a good deal from the account of creation which the geologist finds written in the earth's crust. Perhaps the laws of nature have changed since that time and geological epochs were actually crowded then into seven successive days. If any one of you finds comfort in believing that the earth was created in seven days you are entitled to that satisfaction; but if you want to force others to adopt the same belief I ask you to contemplate the fact that you are one individual of the millions who believe in the Bible; that many of those millions regard the account of creation as expressed in symbolism rather than in terms of literal fact. I ask you to further contemplate the fact that the great majority of the world's population profess a different religion than yours. Have you cause to consider yourself more enlightened than all the others. Furthermore, I ask you to consider that all the world's religions are essentially good. If one studies their holy writings he finds that they all possess very much the same spirit, differing in the symbolism they use, but coming to pretty much the same sort of conclusions.

There are narrow-minded scientists and there are religious bigots who cannot rise above trivial differences of opinion, but we mention them merely to dismiss them. We are concerned with those who have beliefs which they have acquired through earnest effort, who are steadfast in those beliefs while respecting the convictions of others. In the lives of people of this kind science and religion are both necessary factors, never antagonizing, but always supplementing and supporting each other.

Dr. T. S. Johnson, the colored secretary of the Interracial Commission of Oklahoma, is printing in "The Black Dispatch" a series of brief sermonettes addressed to all his fellow-men. Some of them are worth quoting. In one, "The Casting Out of Fear," he says, for instance, "This feeling makes for individual strife and race conflict. . . . The strife between man and man, the fight between capital and labor, the ever-present conflict between race and race would not exist except for the fear men have of the success of others. The panacea for all these fears lies in the practice of brotherhood. Brotherhood cannot be practiced without interracial co-operation."

Orthodox—As to Character

By Rev. J. Rodger Sillars

Minister of Oakland Presbyterian Church, Springfield, Ohio

A QUERY commonly heard in church circles is, "Is he orthodox?" Or we hear the appraisal of a man, that "he is a liberal," or "he is a conservative." The whole test is based upon the intellectual tenets or beliefs to which he subscribes. It is a peculiar situation, when we pause to examine it. A man may make the assertion that he holds with one wing or the other, but upon such a basis alone we can come to but a scanty estimate of his real Christian character. Our interest is in his intellectual position, if we may believe the current phraseology of the church, and in that alone.

A far more pertinent query might be, "Is his character orthodox?" I recognize at once that I am stretching the root meaning of a word beyond its proper bounds of elasticity. But taking the word as it is popularly understood it may hold. The real test of Christianity lies in the character of the individual who names himself a follower of the Christ. In cases we may even go farther than this. There are individuals who have never made a public profession of whom it would be very difficult to believe that they were not in reality Christian men and women.

Further than this, there are multitudes of people who would be utterly unable to place themselves regarding their theological position, about whose Christian living there could be no question. The church might be better off if these people knew where they stood, but the fact remains that they do not, and they constitute the rank and file of the Christian Church.

If we carry the test of character into the ranks of the opposing fields of theological opinion we will find that there are those who occupy extremely liberal ground, who bear in their characters the stamp of the Master. While in the other camp we will find certain conservative gentlemen who, to put it mildly, evidence a decided lack in Christ-like spirit. And the case may certainly be reversed. There are liberals who evidence an arrogance that at times is brutal and seldom Christ-like, while many a conservative theologian is a living example of true Christian liberality of spirit. The division in these positions is not that of the last judgment as described by Christ, for sheep and goats mingle in both flocks.

It is without question true that we need to guard liberty of thought. But it is also well to remember that periods of controversy are, more frequently than not, a pretty dull and arid waste to go back to, and have not infrequently halted rather than speeded the work of the Church. That there must be such periods we recognize, but it cannot but be a cause of regret to see so much energy being used in controversy within the Church, when there is so much without that calls for its united effort. When all is done and said, the test of the Church, in its impact upon the world, lies not in its creeds, but in the character it produces. You can argue a creed out of court, but you can't a character of absolute integrity.

I well remember the impress made upon my boyish mind of this story of Ian Maclaren's. He was visiting in the highlands of Scotland with an uncle, and communion fell upon the first Sunday of his visit. He was very much impressed with the fine face of one of the elders. You may imagine his surprise when on the day following he found this man breaking stone by the roadside. He spoke to his uncle of it and the latter replied: "Yes, when it comes to things of this world, James is the poorest man in the parish, but when it comes to things of the spirit he has more wealth than all the rest of us combined." In commenting upon it Dr. Watson said: "I sensed then that which I have long since come to realize as fact, that the greatest thing in life is character, and the crown of character is holiness." He spoke true.

We cannot be indifferent to what men believe, but the test of their belief does not lie in mental assent; it lies in character. Not infrequently, difficulty in accepting a stipulated creed arises out of a certain mental and moral sensitiveness, a deference to a high sense of honor. Surely any man worthy of the name would move carefully before he would exclude such a one from the opportunity for usefulness in the organized church because he could not subscribe in full to a creed.

It is very likely that during Christ's career the disciples would have given a very imperfect answer, judged by our standards, to a question asking for a statement of their beliefs. However, with all but Judas, there could be but little doubt that their position was such that it met Christ's requirements. They were devoted to Him. They were not catechized as to their belief. Their test lay in their willingness to leave their vocations and follow Him. The test was the test of affection. Christ was out to capture the heart and will.

Again and again the Church has witnessed the powerful influence exerted by one of imperfect mental equipment, but whose heart and will have been dedicated to the Master's use. The fact that Christ chose His immediate associates from among men with little or no chance for mental training should be a constant admonition to intellectual humility. On the other hand, this is no ground for disparaging intellectual attainment, for Christ stands in our minds as the world's greatest teacher. He trained these men so well that with the help of the Apostle Paul they were able to do the most important work ever delegated to any body of men—to lay the foundation of the Christian Church.

In this day as we face the continuation and extension of that work we perhaps recognize more than ever that the greatest asset in so doing is the evidencing of the spirit of Christ in His Church. Our mission is not to formulate creeds; it is to kindle a loyalty to the person of Christ. It is to reduce our requirements to those which he has left. His summing up of the commandments gives ample scope for our efforts. We are not called upon to throw the mind out of court. Rather, we are called upon more strenuously to use it, but always that we may reduce our beliefs to the simplest terms, and always with a view to their practical application to the problems of life.

As we turn to the person of Christ ourselves, we realize that our allegiance to Him is not explained in the summing up of any creedal belief. We are Christians not because we have been taught to believe in certain doctrines. We are Christians because of the appeal of His character. The creedal statements come after. The appeal to us is the same as that which was evidenced in the days of His flesh. He made His appeal to us because we felt His love.

We have felt the call to Christian service because we have seen the needs of the world and are convinced that He alone can meet those needs. The need that confronts us is not one that calls for mental assent to any particular belief, so much as it is one that calls for the new spirit which He alone can create.

Humanity needs such a spirit, a change of heart. It calls for a new character. The spirit of self needs to be supplanted by the spirit of Christ. This is not only the need without the Church, it is the need within. The test of the individual does not lie in right opinion; it lies in right expression of opinion in character. The test of the fruit is in the eating. The test of Christian belief is largely a pragmatic one. "By their fruits ye shall know them." It is not so much what we profess to believe as what we actually express in our lives that counts.

Our stress is laid at the wrong point. We are not disregarding the importance of right thinking, nor are we belittling the place of belief in relation to Christian living, but we are asserting that it is not the final test. The test lies—and we make the assertion knowing that it is in danger of being misunderstood—the test lies in character. But a character, let it be understood, that evidences the spirit of Christ.

Men cannot be all brought to the same mould of thought, but we have seen that men differing widely in belief can work together in harmony through a common spirit of devotion to their Lord. Allegiance to Christ and His cause can be more effectively conveyed to others through our belief as expressed in our character than through belief expressed in stereotyped phraseology. What we live speaks a much more effective language than the mere words which come from our lips.

It would seem that we might well place the test of faith to-day where Christ put it. His measure was the expression of devotion to Himself, of self-surrender, of ministry. Such a test can hardly be improved upon, and the test of Christianity still rests here. Does the heart feel that warmth of love for Him that will express itself in service? A faith without works is a dead faith. It is only on the basis of a living, character expressed faith that the Church can be united, and upon this basis it may. It is only as we set our face in this direction that we will come to realize an affirmative answer to Christ's great intercessory prayer, "That they may be one, even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee."

An Open Letter to Lord Halifax

By M. D. Petre

[Eight months ago Lord Halifax issued "A Call to Reunion," in which, with characteristic honesty and reverence, he attempted to prepare the way towards a conference between duly authorized representatives of the Churches of England and Rome. Miss M. D. Petre, who will be remembered as the biographer of the late Father Tyrrell, has written the following "Open Letter to Lord Halifax" in reply. It was originally written as an introduction to a set of essays which, we understand, is not yet to appear. By the courtesy of Miss Petre it was printed in the "Guardian" of London June 8, 1923. It is of such importance that Americans will like also to see it and we are taking this opportunity of putting it before our readers. It gives a Roman Catholic point of view with which Protestants are hardly familiar.—THE EDITORS.]

DEAR LORD HALIFAX: I address this letter to you not only as a slight and purely personal reply to your late "Call to Reunion," but also in memory of a poignant past wherein you played a part which was real though remote.

I refer to the Modernist movement of the first years of our century, and I refer to it with no intention of claiming you as an active participant therein, but only that of testifying to the attitude you maintained on that occasion; an attitude of sympathy with deep and genuine religious difficulties, difficulties which you did not, in every respect, share, but which you knew to be the result of a spiritual struggle of the highest order, a struggle to live the complete life of faith in an atmosphere of intellectual truth.

The chief protagonists of that movement were, at that time, members of another Church than yours, but this in no way lessened your sympathy. You were never of those who rejoiced to point the moral in any attempt to enjoy mental liberty in a Church whose character did not—as others said—admit of it. Your Christian and religious sense was too profound for such an attitude. You knew that it was the Christian and not only the Roman Catholic Church that was implicated in that crisis; you knew that some of the men concerned in it were of the stuff of which martyrs are made; you knew, I think, too, that there is an inherent nobility in every genuine struggle of religious faith confronted with new intellectual difficulties, and that such nobility is in proportion to the fundamental honesty of those involved in the struggle, and their deep desire to win the spiritual victory for their own souls and those of others.

I think, too, that you saw in this movement another possibility which has not, perhaps, been fulfilled; that you saw in it contributory elements to your abiding scheme of reunion. To fight together in the cause of a freely honest faith would be to find a common basis of religious union; and this, you divined, might be one fruit of the Modernist movement.

I will not admit that this hope was entirely frustrated. I am of those who can never believe in the total failure of any spiritual effort, and I still believe that those moments of living contact between some of the best men of your Church and some of the best men of our Church have not been without their abiding fruit of mutual religious understanding. Yet I do not want to maintain an illusory optimism, or to try to make out that those past hopes led to completer fulfilment than was actually the case. I simply mean to record with gratitude your own attitude of helpful sympathy. You were interested in the Catholic Modernist movement because you were interested in all genuine religious movements, in every endeavor to make religion the most real factor of life in its intellectual as well as its spiritual order.

In your "Call to Reunion" you say: "In regard to the truths of revelation and all dogmatic statements it is also necessary to bear in mind, in view of the infinite nature of the matters treated, and the limited capacity of the human mind and of human language, that all theological definitions are necessarily only approximate statements, and cannot claim to be complete and absolute expositions of the truths in question; and that scholastic teaching was perhaps not always sufficiently alive to this consideration when it attempted to give complete and exhaustive definitions of truths which by the very fact that they had to do with divine revelation, were therefore not capable of being expressed in all their fulness when embodied in human language. If that is so, then room can legitimately be made for some divergence of opinion, even upon what might seem to be important matters."

In these words you express something of that principle of relativity which was certainly an element of the more spiritual forms of Modernism.

You divine, most truly, as it seems to me, that such a principle should inspire union rather than opposition, and yet not be productive of any sort of religious indifferentism. To a superficial mind it might, indeed, appear as though a sense of the inadequacy of all attempts at the formulation of religious truth would be productive of a corresponding sense of the unimportance of such formulation, and of such resulting formulas. I would ask those who maintain such a view whether they would apply it to science as well as religion; whether astronomical and mathematical observations are robbed of their theoretical or practical value by our deepened modern sense of the influence exerted in all fields of truth by the personal factor, the position of the observer, and his own relation to the truth he is considering. Relatively, in religion as in science, implies, on the one side, the limitations of every human aspect of universal truth, but it implies, on the other side, that we ourselves are an active element, an essential part of that very truth. More, and not less, than ever is our intellectual and moral and spiritual salvation dependent on the fullest possible personal apprehension of the truth which cannot be fully expressed. Just because we can only see truth, each one of us, from that point at which we are placed, do we see it with a more complete realization.

Truly, as you say, should the incompleteness and limitation of religious formulas make it easier to arrive at a general harmony of outlook, but this in virtue of fuller comprehension and not of indifference. We need a conformity of mutual acceptance, as of the views of persons contemplating a celestial body from different angles; we do not want a conformity of doubt or indifference, as of the views of persons regarding the same object and sharing their mutual uncertainty as to the validity of their own perceptions, and the existence or non-existence of the very object in question.

Hence, I believe with you, my lord, that our sense of inadequacy should be fruitful of a living tolerance and understanding; of a humility which is productive of patience and sympathy and love.

And now as to the hopes and fears to which your words give rise, may I express in this letter my personal views in the matter, begging you not to regard my remarks as inspired by a spirit of criticism, but by the wish to contribute ever so slightly to the end you have in view?

One point impresses me, as an outsider, in regard to the future destiny of the Church of England. Is she not rapidly dividing into two sections, so distinct and even opposed that we shall soon find that there are not only two parties in the Church, but actually two churches?

On the one side we have the Anglo-Catholics, with their sense of the essentially spiritual character of the Church, her religious rather than her national mission and duties. For them the sacramental system has assumed a new and enhanced importance; confession and communion hold the same place as with us, ritual is no longer negligible, but even more rigid and sacred than in the Roman Catholic Church. They resent increasingly any state interference in matters that they regard as subject to the authority of the Church, as, for instance, the burning question of divorce. The cold and reasonable worship of the old-fashioned English Church is hateful to them, and they glory in those very dramatic and emotional elements of religious worship which are most distasteful to genuine Protestantism.

On the other side, we have the national, we may even say the Erastian, side of the Church, with its deep respect for the Church as not only a religious, but also a political institution; with its sense of the essential opposition between the Church which owes its being to the Reformation and the Church against whose abuses the Reformation was directed; with its profound distrust of all that is essentially Roman in discipline and worship; with its dislike for ritual, and its lesser devotion to the sacramental system. We may observe on this side of the Church, as on the other, another broad line of division between the progressive and the conservative elements; but it is probable that this division will be eventually resolved into the other; that the national party in the Church will prove itself to be in doctrinal and disciplinary and liturgical questions largely progressive rather than conservative.

Each party is severe in its judgment of the other; the High Church party is unreasonable, the National party is intolerant. The High Church party is unreasonable because it wilfully forgets the origin and past, even the fairly recent past, of the English Church, and clamors not only for recognition, but for predominance in matters which are actually an innovation. The English Church came into existence partly as a recoil from the very things which the High Church party now preaches to be essential.

On the other hand, the National Church is intolerant because it refuses to recognize that this new Catholic outbreak is the result of spiritual starvation; of the genuine need of those elements of religious life which the English Church had eliminated, if not at once, then by a gradual process. No past claim can solve a present need.

Can these two parties ever again amalgamate save by the absorption of the one into the other, and is such absorption practically possible.

And then the question arises as to reunion—which party is to be the active agent in the matter? This seems to me a factor in the problem with which you have not fully dealt. The High Church party would concede much; but what about the other party? What do they say in the matter, or do they want to say anything at all? I cannot but think that this question of reunion remains somewhat ambiguous so long as this obvious question is unanswered; so long as your lordship does not more clearly specify for whom you speak.

There is another difficulty that presents itself to my mind in relation to your appeal, and that is the need of some fuller consideration of the double meaning of the word "church" to which you refer on pages 3 and 4. The first of those meanings refers, you say, "to the Church as a body with a visible government and possessing an external jurisdiction." The second means "the kingdom of souls, that body of which Christ is the head." You go on to say that an Anglican would probably use the word in the former, a Roman Catholic in the latter sense. You think that this distinction might serve to facilitate agreement "not only between the churches of England and Rome, but also between Rome and the members of the Orthodox Church, many of whom insist on the point . . . that, in the belief of the Orthodox Church, the Kingdom of Christ, the kingdom of souls, the Church in fact, is a kingdom not of this world."

This argument seems to me to tell against as well as for all efforts at reunion, because the invisible kingdom of souls of which Christ is the head is essentially one, whatever the outer divisions may be. Therefore, some might reply that they were satisfied with this purely spiritual unity, and that external divergences could well be tolerated as no more essentially injurious to Christianity as a whole than national and racial varieties are, in themselves, injurious to humanity as a whole. Unless that inner kingdom of souls be rent by our outer divisions it is hard to see what those divisions matter.

The answer would surely be that they do matter, because the Visible Church is the means of entrance to the Invisible Church; because the kingdom of souls is held together by the outer, ecclesiastical constitution; and because a spiritual Church without an outer body would not be, humanly speaking, a Church at all.

With all this I am certain that your lordship is in agreement, but if I raise the point it is because, in this great question of reunion, I think it is important not to slip from definite to indefinite conceptions of our subject; from precise and concrete to mystical significations. What we want in reunion, those of us who want it, is visible and corporate reunion with a view to fuller spiritual union and communion. It is not mystical but visible union, through reunion, that is the goal of our efforts.

And to obtain this visible reunion, how much are not you, and those who think with you, prepared to profess or to concede! There is nothing in doctrine or practice to distinguish many of your churches from ours; your religious communities are endeavoring to fulfil the same ideals by the discipline of similar rules; your sacramental system is as vigorous as our own, and you are prepared to admit the primacy, doctrinal and disciplinary of the see of Rome.

You are not speaking for the whole of your Church, as I have already maintained; but you are speaking for a considerable portion; a portion for which Church, and not State, is the supreme symbol; a portion whose position is bound to become increasingly difficult unless this question be somehow decided.

The High Church party of the English Church bears on its brow the stamp of an unfulfilled destiny; it cannot remain as it is. But can the other party remain as it is any better, or even any longer? Does it not also bear on its brow another stamp of unfulfilled destiny? Is it not as much bound to some religious and moral but essentially lay and civil destination as the other party to eventual ecclesiastical fulfilment? Does not the one party tend to absorption in a Church as the other to absorption in a State? I speak with diffidence, and as an outsider, but I venture to put the question before you. And now for my last point or question.

The party you represent is ripe for union with us, but can that reunion be brought about? For I take it that, in spite of all that you are prepared to concede, there is one point on which you are not prepared to give way. You ask for corporate and not for mass reunion; you ask to be received as a Church that desires incorporation in another Church, and not as a crowd of individuals asking to be received from one Church into another. It is not only on the technical question of orders that you ask for recognition; this question is an element of the vital question of your existence as a Church. You admit that you are separated from the larger body; you do not admit that, as a Church, you are non-existent. I have heard of individuals of your community who declare that, for many reasons, they would prefer to enter the Roman Church, but that they could make no profession of faith that implied the denial of all spiritual power and value to the Church they were leaving. You believe that Christ has been present in your Church as well as ours; that you have communicated with Him in the blessed eucharist, obtained His blessing and sanction in the other sacraments; you would wish your Church to submit her separate claims in the interests of reunion, but not to denounce her own spiritual worth and value, to turn her past into a mockery and a mere shadow.

This is how I understand your position: this is the point on which I, individually, deeply sympathize with you. But I say individually because, although I am not the only individual of my Church who feels thus, I know that those of us who do thus sympathize with you can only speak for ourselves, and not for the Church of which we are members.

This, my lord, is the basic difficulty with which you have to deal. You want to appeal as a Church to another Church, but, so far, you have only been officially answered as a number of individuals. Try to convert us, on this point, as many Roman Catholics have tried to convert you on others; try to change our hearts, or the hearts of our official rulers, as we have tried to change yours. Do not yield on a single point which you cannot honestly sacrifice; it will be better for our Church, as for yours, that you should make no sacrifice of principle in the cause of reunion. Those whom God has destined for one another cannot forever be kept asunder, but premature solutions are not enduring ones.

Just because of the spiritual immensity in which it is placed is a Church necessary for the apprehension of that immensity. The sense of relativity makes reunion easier and more natural, but not less desirable, for it makes religious unity in the face of spiritual problems as essential as scientific unity in the face of material problems. The Church is our home—our ark on the unmeasured waters. We know that we know but little, but we trust that the spiritual goods set before us are a pledge of those that are to be. Meanwhile, we are together, and it is as essential a note of spiritual possession to desire to share as of material possession to desire to keep. It is the sharing instinct that is paramount in those like you, my lord, who desire to be at unity with all the Christian world.

I am, with sympathy and respect, yours faithfully,

M. D. PETRE,

Conference on International Relations

CHURCH leaders of the country will discuss international relations from the Christian point of view at a conference to be held at Chautauqua, N. Y., August 20-24. The meeting will be under the auspices of the Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council of Churches.

The object of the conference is to give an opportunity to study international affairs from the Christian viewpoint somewhat as they are discussed from the economic and political side at the Williamstown meeting of the Institute of Politics. In their discussion, however, the churchmen will not leave out the economic and political effect of international relations.

The meeting is the outcome of the growing interest and activity on the part of churches in international affairs. They were credited by President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes with playing a big part in molding public opinion in support of the action of the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament. The Federal Council of Churches led in the fight for the United States to enter the Permanent Court of International Justice through resolutions presented to President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes more than a year ago. This action of the Federal Council has since been endorsed by practically every communion that has had a general meeting.

Practically all of the churches affiliated with the Federal Council have also endorsed the warless world creed which holds to the Christian ideal of an eventually warless world, with law taking the place of war. They believe that permanent peace will not come overnight, but step by step. Indications are that the conference will be attended by thousands of Christians from all over the country.

The men who will make up the faculty include clergy and laymen who are informed on international affairs. George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General of the United States, will discuss what the League of Nations is doing. President Henry Noble McCracken, of Vassar, who has just returned from a trip abroad to European countries, will speak on education for international good-will. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, an authority on the Far East, will tell of his observations on his recent trip through China, Korea, Japan and the Philippines. Professor Irving Fisher, of Yale, will discuss "The League of Nations or War." Dr. George R. Montgomery, who was one of the advisors on the Near East during the Peace Conference at Versailles and has recently returned from the Lausanne Conference, will speak on "America and the Near East." Dr. John H. Finley, one of the editors of "New York Times," who is returning from a trip to the Near East, has cabled his acceptance as a member of the faculty and will have a place on the program.

"The Cross Currents of Christian British Thought Towards the Problems of Europe" will be presented by Harry N. Holmes, an Australian, who has recently resigned as general secretary of the London Y. M. C. A. to become an associate secretary of the Federal Council of Churches. The countries to the south of the United States will be discussed by Bishop Wilbur K. Thirkield of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Rev. Samuel Guy Inman of the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America.

The closing address of the Conference will be delivered by the Rev. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, whose subject will be "The Church and the Permanent Court of International Justice."

In explaining the object of the Conference the Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, said: "More and more the churches are realizing their responsibility for international relations. This is true not only in this country but abroad. For this reason a conference of church members has been called to discuss the international relations of America from the Christian viewpoint somewhat in the same manner as they are discussed at the Williamstown conference from the economic and political viewpoint. As international relations are chiefly moral, economic and political questions, the churchmen will not neglect the economic or political side."

Back to Bolshevik Border

By William Willard Howard

BY the time that these lines reach the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK I shall be far across the Atlantic Ocean on my way to that remote outpost on the borders of Bolshevik Russia, where Anne Louise Howard is grappling single-handed with the colossal problem of relief for the destitute gentlewomen of monarchist Russia now in exile in the gorder lands of Eastern Europe.

In last week's issue of this publication I said that if THE CHRISTIAN WORK family of readers would supply funds with which to gather together the Russian refugee orphans who had been scattered to the four winds of adversity by the taking over of their building for use as a Jewish school, and provide them with a new home, which should be called THE CHRISTIAN WORK Orphanage, I would go to the borders of Bolshevik Russia immediately to give my personal attention to the work.

Well, I am not waiting to hear from you. When I have finished writing this I shall be on my way. It is not necessary for me to wait until I get definite word of your acceptance of my offer—because I know what you will do.

No; I am not taking any chances. It is an absolute certainty. I know what I am doing.

Nine years ago, returning from a trip through South-eastern Europe, I went to everyone whom I knew in New York asking help for the devastated regions of Albania. Friends of many years' standing listened patiently, and answered my plea by denouncing the Albanians as savages unworthy of anyone's help. Eventually I made the acquaintance of the late Dr. Samuel Train Dutton, who suggested that I see the Rev. Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK. As a result of my call on Dr. Lynch an appeal was made to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, and the Albanian Relief Fund was organized. THE CHRISTIAN WORK Relief Ship sailed for Albania with a cargo of food. Thousands of starving men, women and children were fed.

Seven years after the beginning of the Albanian work I appealed again to you for help for destitute fishermen of the North Atlantic. Last winter, shocked beyond human expression by the condition of the nobility and intelligentsia of monarchist Russia existing miserably in exile in Eastern Europe, I appealed to you for the third time.

I know what response you have made to these three appeals during the past nine years; therefore, I am not taking any chances by going to the borders of Bolshevik Russia before I have your answer. In fact, I believe that your answer will get to my destination ahead of me, in the form of money cabled over by Dr. Lynch while I am on my way.

This is a matter in which it is impossible to wait, or to count chances. The homeless orphans must be found and brought together in a safe place, where they can be fed and clothed and cared for. Delay is tragic.

The relief of these orphans is clearly and unmistakably one of those things that my hand finds to do. It is laid upon me individually. I would do it alone and unaided if I could. I would not ask you for one cent of help if I could do the work without you. Anne Louise Howard cannot do anything. Only yesterday I had word from her that she had paid out the last available dollar of her working fund, and that she was looking for my next remittance to cover current labor commitments on work now in hand.

You will see, therefore, that the fate of those orphans is in your hands, and that all that I can do is to act as the almoner of your beneficence.

During my absence from the United States all clerical work and correspondence of the Russian Refugee Fund will be carried on by my secretary, who will fill all orders for Russian Princess Blouses and acknowledge all contributions to the working fund. Remittances may be made, as usual, to the order of the Russian Refugee Fund, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, or may be sent addressed in my name, according to the preference of the sender.

I desire to add that orders for blouses with collars, as shown in the illustrated booklet, will be taken for deferred delivery only. These blouses have been received with such favor that the present supply has been sold out. A new lot is now nearly ready for shipment from Europe.

As the fund for the relief of the orphans is a special one, contributions to it should be sent to the Rev. Frederick Lynch, D. D., editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York, marked "for Russian orphans."

Coffee drinking originated in Mohammedan lands. For that reason many churchmen of the sixteenth century doubted the propriety of permitting its use in Christendom, denounced it indeed as an invention of Satan. But some good men held otherwise. The disputants appealed to Pope Clement VIII for a decision. Very prudently the Pope decided to drink some before committing himself. His Holiness, after imbibing a steaming beaker, exclaimed: "Why, this Satan's drink is so delicious that it would be a pity to let the infidels have exclusive use of it. We shall fool Satan by baptizing it, and making it a truly Christian beverage." This he did, and so added the Church's seal of approval to the waxing popularity of coffee. At least, such is the story told by William H. Ukers in his book, "All About Coffee," which has been awarded the grand prize at the Brazilian Centennial Exposition at Dio de Janeiro.

An unfortunate misprint in the item on "Our Taxes" in The World of To-day columns of July 7th made us say that a man with an income of $100,000 would have paid $456 income tax last year in the United States and $1,128.32 in Great Britain. It is, of course, a man with an income of $10,000 who would have paid these taxes. The American with a wife and two children and an income of $100,000 would have paid something like $28,768. We have not the figures at hand to show what the tax would be on the corresponding Englishman.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Ecclesiastical Recognition in the Rural Field in Methodism

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

THE Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church has recently issued a very remarkable document dealing with the church and the farmer. It declares that the present economic situation in America militates against the stability of our agricultural population and makes a number of very definite recommendations for Methodism.

It suggests closest co-operation between religious and civic agencies in developing both the economic and spiritual aspects of rural life for adults and young people. Where the State and other agencies are providing leadership and direction to economic life, the church is called on to aid in providing contacts between the farmers and such agencies. Where, however, such agencies are not sufficiently developed the church itself is asked to participate in economic improvement.

The fundamental Christian principles of the co-operative movement are recognized and the religious agencies of America called upon to give "their active support to all sound efforts to solve the problems of more effective organization of the market whereby the margin between the price paid by the consumer and that received by the producer may be reduced the lowest possible minimum."

Soil conservation and the utilization of natural resources are urged upon Christian farmers. Demand is made to provide suitable housing, reasonable hours of labor, medical care, and as far as possible all the comforts of home to the migrant wage earner. It is declared that the rural health situation is such that the Methodist Church should include in its health program either in connection with its great hospitals, or independently of them, a rural public health nursing service.

Speaking specifically of the rural church, the tendency to consider its work as of minor importance is condemned. The movement to enlarge the scope of the church so that it includes all life is commended. Chairs of rural leadership in educational institutions and summer schools for the graduate training of rural pastors are also heartily approved.

The church should be in every sense the community center, but co-operative relations should be established with other denominations whereby duplication of effort will be so far as possible eliminated and no rural family will be without pastoral care. The church is asked to provide adequate salaries for its ministers, to make maintenance allowance for the pastor's automobile and continually to study the needs of the community that the leisure time of rural folk may be provided with a wholesome social life. The so-called larger parish plan is commended and rural communities as a whole are urged to undertake an adequate program of religious training, including graded Sunday-schools, vacation Bible schools and week-day religious education.

Most interesting are the recommendations which govern the rural policy of Methodism's districts. It is recommended that complete surveys be made of each parish, particularly with a view to enlarging parish boundaries because of better transportation made possible by the automobile. It is declared advisable for Methodism to use the county unit as the unit within the district. All surveys within the districts should be assembled in county units. It is hoped that rather than have many specialized socio-religious agencies functioning with salaried secretaries on a county-wide basis, "the religious forces of the county should be organized in one central agency and supported as far as possible on the budgets of the co-operating churches." In cases where interests demand special attention assistants should be added to the general office to care for such interests.

The report closed with two important recommendations, one of which recognizes the need of reaching the rapidly increasing number of foreign-speaking people who are moving into the countryside and the other calls for the creation of special councils on rural work within the area of each Methodist bishop.

The Commission on Social Service and Rural Work of the Reformed Church in the United States has issued a pamphlet giving the results of a denomination-wide survey of its one thousand rural charges. The pamphlet covers a little more than four hundred. It shows the strength of the average congregation of a liturgical community, but also illustrates very clearly some of the weaknesses of such churches and of the rural church as a whole. Copies of the pamphlet can undoubtedly be secured from Rev. Ralph S. Adams, rural church field worker of the denomination, Fifteenth and Race Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Unitarian Laymen's League has recently sent to its entire membership a unique letter and if individuals followed the suggestions here given many a country church would profit thereby:

DEAR MR. ———: Eleven o'clock on many Sunday mornings this summer will doubtless find you speeding in your car through some country village in search of the beauties of nature. Perhaps your own church is closed for the summer; perhaps Sunday is the only day on which you are free to get away. Anyway, there you are, driving along, and it's eleven o'clock on Sunday morning.

Stop! Listen! The church bell is ringing. There before you is a church of God with its congregation assembling. Park your car; enter the church; join in the service. The hour passes and you go on your way rejoicing. The plans for your day have not been disturbed; you are the better for an hour of worship.

Think what a service you can render thus easily to these country churches. What an encouragement for the church to have a score or more of tourists' automobiles parked around it! New faces in the congregation inspire the minister to preach a better sermon.

Such possibilities have caused the Council of the League to vote to urge upon League members the value of this form of church attendance. It does not matter to what denomination this country church belongs. Your presence will be welcome.

Park your car and go to church. Perhaps you will find some of your League friends there.

Cordially yours,

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

The Country Church at Its Best*

THERE are now in existence the most helpful books that have ever been written on the country church. We use these superlatives advisedly because we believe that most of those who turn to the books which are the subject of this week's review will agree. The Committee on Social and Religious Surveys asked denominational boards, State leaders in agriculture and education and others to name, in communities of various kinds, the churches they knew to be doing outstanding service. So a list of seven hundred churches was compiled. Then a preliminary pruning took half the churches from the list and a still more strenuous process left forty churches in representative communities. Six are in towns with from 2,500 to 5,000 population; twenty-two are in villages having from 250 to 2,500 people, and twelve are in the open country. Ten are in one-church communities; one is undenominational; four are federated. These churches were all investigated by field workers who spent a few weeks in each community. Then the committee issued a comprehensive analysis of their methods and a volume giving vivid descriptions of "how it was done" in fourteen communities.

First, as to "Tested Methods in Town and Country Churches." The volume opens with a chapter on evangelism. The country church exists and prospers by evangelism. This is true of the North, South, East and West. These forty churches increased their membership fourteen per cent. during the year previous to the investigation. And seventy-one per cent. of the new members were admitted on confession of faith. Again, "all the churches have one time of the year when their evangelistic efforts culminate." With some this takes the form of a series of evangelistic meetings, commonly called protracted meetings. Other pastors prefer quiet personal appeals or the route of confirmation.

These pastors preach sermons on a considerable variety of topics. They touch on all phases of experience. They can dwell on the great spiritual experiences or drive for an application of religion in Jenkinsville on Tuesday evening. Generally the Sunday morning service is more formal; during the evening we find more congregational singing and music and special speakers. Not one of these churches conducts a forum. Frequently there is a children's service in the morning. A number of the churches have strong mid-week services which have programs that vary from week to week. We may conclude that the services of worship occupy a central place.

Eleven churches out of these forty conduct daily vacation Bible schools. This indicates the way they must strain away from the stereotyped Sunday-school program if they would really reach and teach boys and girls. The Sunday-school studies are all branching out into a variety of activities. Most of them have special social occasions in addition to those conducted by organized classes. Only a little more than half the schools use graded lessons, and for the most part these are the International Graded. It is a terribly hard job to make a school out of Sunday-school in the country. We like to sit near the little ones and sing with them. They look so nice. But let it be said that these pastors are reforming the country Sunday-school as rapidly as any human beings can, and they are adding the other elements which make up a respectable program of religious education.

The churches studied which were not mission stations raised an average of $4,900 per year for all causes. This sum is more than three times the amount raised by the average country church in twenty-five specimen counties. The largest budget is $23,000. The yearly per capita expenditure per resident member is $19.93, this figure being about twenty-five per cent. higher than the average expenditure for all churches in twenty-five typical counties. The memberships of these churches of distinction are also considerably higher than average. Money is raised by every-member canvasses, assessments and tithing. The denominational forward movements have resulted in a considerable increase in benevolences. In some churches the amount of money given for benevolences has increased from two to five times as fast as that for local work.

An interesting chapter which would hardly have been written a score of years ago is on publicity. These successful churches no longer depend on the pulling power of the peal of a bell. Some of them find the slogan one of their effective devices in maintaining and increasing interest in their programs. All the churches use some form of a bulletin board. They all make full use of their opportunities to get space in the local press. This section shows us the expanding program of the local church.

The volume is written for use in theological seminaries, summer schools for ministers, classes in leadership training in congregations and above all by individual pastors.

Those who wish to have more local color and "human interest" can get right into the midst of some tremendously interesting situations by reading "Churches of Distinction in Town and Country." Here are the fourteen stories of country churches by authors who are actually journalistic and scientific. Eight writers seem to vie with one another in giving us the most compelling story. Great value is added to this book because each church has faced and solved a different problem. They are scattered from Middle Octoraro, Pennsylvania, to Davis, California. We need only give some of the titles of these stories and then nobody genuinely interested in the country church will be able to stay away from them: "Modern Methods on a Circuit," "A Case of Self-Determination," "Digging Out the Boys," "Ministering to the Migrant," "The Larger Parish," "The Indian Example," "The Old Order Changeth," "Where the Church Is Everything," "The Church at the Center," "Self-Americanization," "Two Centuries of Success."

Paul, the Apostle

ACTS 22:3, 6-10; PHIL. 3:7-14.

"I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."—Phil 3:14.

"ALL history," said Emerson, "is but the biography of a few stout and earnest persons." The Apostle Paul is an illustration of the truth of this statement, for a consideration of his remarkable life not only opens up to the student the origin and development of primitive Christianity, but also explains many of those forces which have much to do with the sweep and power of the modern Church. Next to the Lord Jesus, with whom his name is invariably and inevitably linked, the Apostle Paul is unquestionably the greatest single influence in Christian history. He was a person of such amazing versatility, tireless energy, prodigious labors and unfaltering loyalty to his mission that he stands apart from all other leaders of Christianity. As an author with half the New Testament to his credit, he has perhaps a wider reading than any known Christian writer. The system of theology which bears his name and which for all these centuries has exercised such a profound influence upon the thought of the Church is receiving fresh consideration and a new interpretation at the hands of modern theologians.

In numerous ways the message of Paul is as fresh to-day as it was when he proclaimed it centuries ago to the people of his own day. The revival of mysticism, which is one of the most significant religious phenomena of our day, is but the reappearance of the Pauline doctrine of the indwelling Christ.

But it is in the central idea which dominated the life and work of the missionary that we find his chief message for the modern man, a message which finds a striking parallel in the best thought of our time. In Paul's conception of a world unity of all classes and nations in one vast Divine Commonwealth brought together as sons of God through the power of a free, spiritual and international gospel, in his ideal of the Church as a decisive factor in the realization of this vision, and in his dependence upon the fellowship of the Lord Jesus as the spiritual dynamic for the accomplishment of the divine purpose in the lives of men, we find much to engage the attention of modern Christianity.

Consider first the spiritual objective towards which Paul bent all the energies of his being. By birth and training he acquired a breadth and tolerance far beyond that of the average Jew of his day. Though he was a Pharisee of the Pharisees, he was also a Roman citizen. He dwelt in a throbbing cosmopolitan center, where contact with those vital forces which constituted the civilization of that time implanted the germ which later was to develop into his Christian imperialism. Further study in Jerusalem under Gamaliel, a liberal teacher of the law, increased his interest in world affairs, so that when he rose from his knees on the Damascus road he was convinced of the international aspect of his heavenly vision. He was called to be an apostle to the Gentiles, a herald to all men of a religion in which there was neither bond nor free, Jew nor Greek.

We do well to keep clearly before us this conception of the spiritual unity of the race in a Divine Commonwealth, bound together by the cords of love, and animated by the spirit of the Christ. The mind of our day is rapidly moving toward some idea of world unity. The interdependence of nations is a commonly accepted fact. No people liveth unto itself, for somehow we are all bound together for weal or woe in the bundle of our common humanity. All such actions as those taken by the Washington Conference which seek to emphasize and improve international amity fill the mind of the Church with hope and joy.

We must strive to think of humanity as one great family organized about the unifying principle of God's eternal Fatherhood. Therefore, the work of the student federations of the Christian associations and the Christian Endeavor, of the fellowships of prayer and reconciliation assumes an aspect as important as the plans of the statesmen.

The forces of liberalism in modern Protestantism may well take heart from the boldness of Paul. Unfortunately, many of the denominations are embroiled in unhappy discussions over the second coming of Christ, evolution, and the like. It may be possible by the exercise of Christian charity on both sides to keep these regrettable discussions in the background so that in these days pregnant with possibilities for refashioning the life of the world the Church may be allowed to do her real work. Yet, even though an attitude of sympathy and tolerance should characterize the progressive forces of modern Christianity, there is no reason to apologize for that liberty which is in Christ Jesus.

Furthermore, Paul's gospel was not only free and spiritual in content, but international in its scope and application. In Christ there was neither Jew nor Gentile, bond nor free. All men everywhere who heard the call and answered were members of the body of Christ. This imperialism of the apostle did much to rescue the early Church from its provincialism and made possible the later conquest of the Roman Empire in the name of a univesal Master.

Just as Paul belted the Roman Empire with a girdle of churches, even so should our present-day Church seek to extend her influence over the entire earth. Never were the fields so white unto the harvest. We are almost bewildered by the opening doors in Central Europe, the Near East, India and the isles of the sea. The words uttered by Woodrow Wilson when he was President are equally pertinent now. "I think it would be a real misfortune," said Mr. Wilson, "a misfortune of lasting consequence, if the missionary program of the Church should be interrupted." Surely the missionary appeal of the apostle should not fall upon hard hearts in these days of blessing and opportunity.

Is there any other way to bring in the Kingdom? Plans and programs have their places. The structure of a brotherhood of the nations must be set up and a world court maintained. Yet the kingdom of God is within the hearts of individual men and women, and it cannot come any faster in the social order than it appears in the daily walk and conversation of millions of loyal, trusting Christians in all parts of the world. Hence each soul has its work to do in the divine plan for the redemption of mankind. History is not only the biography of a few persons, but also the biography of countless humble folk who like Paul "press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

REV. VAUGHAN DABNEY.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I find in your June 30th issue a paper upon which I desire, with some of my friends, to present a few remarks. The heading, "An Inside View of the Situation in the Ruhr" seems somewhat misleading since it does not appear that the author, Colonel D. L. Stone, ever went into the Ruhr since the occupation. No more did I, and I will let the situation in the Ruhr out of my remarks.

1. We feel that it hardly becomes an officer to tell his comrades in arms that "they are terribly afraid." This statement only appears in a fuller text of Colonel Stone's address (paragraph 2) as it was published by the "Federal Council Bulletin" (April-May, 1923); but in your text I find: "As a result of France's feelings and fears," at the very first line then, "You are so much afraid that you see it entirely through bloody glasses."

I just ask, "Were we so much afraid, when there was a German army, several million strong, on this side of the Rhine, and on our own soil?" What would you think of any one of our religious magazines publishing the formidable American program for greatly increased military appropriations, which appeared in your own columns of June 23, and hinting that such preparedness is evidence that your people are "terribly afraid," and afraid of what?

2. "The next link in the chain is Belgium. Belgium is almost a colony of France."

Our Belgian friends will know how to deal with that statement, because it is offensive to them and liable to sow distrust between two close neighbors and allies.

3. "The politicians in France have told their people that they need not pay taxes, that Germany owed them money and would pay it."

This as a general statement is not true. Both Chambers in our Parliament voted the law of April 17, 1919, which solemnly proclaims that all the French citizens are equally and jointly responsible before the questionable war damages give those con-burdens of the after-war, and that all concerned a title to full reparation, without prejudicing the right of the French state to reclaim compensation from the enemy.

"Article premier.—La République proclame l'égalité et la solidarité de tous les Français devant les charges de la guerre.

"Article 2.—Les dommages certains, matériels et directs causés, en France et en Algérie, aux biens immobiliers ou mobiliers par les faits de la guerre, ouvrent droit à la réparation intégrale instituée par l'article 12 de la loi du 26 Décembre, 1914, sans préjudice du droit, pour l'Etat Français, d'en réclamer le paiement à l'ennemi."

Those who suffered damages left unpaid, until now to the extent of forty-four billion francs, perfectly know how to remind the French Government that the French nation is jointly responsible toward them, by virtue of the law, and that it does not matter them if the government has not been able yet to collect compensation from Germany. As a matter of fact, the fifty-one billion francs, nearly fifty per cent. of the total amount needed, which had been paid on December 31, 1922, came out of French resources and internal loans. These loans are taxing our available funds very heavily, and come in addition to the ever-increasing regular taxation.

The British Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the Parliament papers, recently gave the following figures of direct and indirect taxation per head in Great Britain, the United States and France:

	Direct.	Indirect.
United Kingdom	£10/10/0	£6/ 2/0
France	9/13/7	7/14/5
United States	2/16/0	2/12/3

The French and American figures represent francs and dollars of the normal rate of exchange.

Consequently the American ratepayer is paying £5/8/3. when the French ratepayer is paying £17/8/2.

And it is well known that the taxable assets are larger per head in the United States and Great Britain than in France.

Though 400,000 inhabitants from the devastated regions have not been able yet to come back to these regions, their homes being destroyed, the return of the taxes in the ten devastated departments, which was six hundred and twenty millions in 1919, was one billion two hundred and fifty-nine millions in 1920, one billion six hundred and forty-nine millions in 1921, one billion nine hundred and eighteen millions in 1922, and it is expected that in 1923 the figure will be over three billions.

In France at large, constant surpluses were obtained in the return from the main taxes in the present year.

Such is our work—the work of the unanimous mutual effort of our country facing its ruins.

4. "We (Americans) tried to make the burden of our occupation (on the Rhine) as light as possible in every way. . . . Every time we could do anything for them along the line of liberality we have given in." May I remind you that the American final claims for the cost of military occupation in Germany are nothing short of $250,000,000, and were not reduced in any way in the recent arrangement with the Allies. This enormous amount has a priority over reparation payments, and has to be taken, in the proportion of twenty-five per cent., out of the next forthcoming German instalments for reparations.

MISREPRESENTING THE FUNDAMENTALISTS

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

If the Modernists are as certain of their position as they seem to think they are, why do they find it necessary to uniformly misrepresent the position of the Fundamentalists? For instance, John Grier Hibben, in his baccalaureate address, says of the Fundamentalists: "They have recently challenged the indisputable facts of science regarding evolution." Again, he speaks of "the fear of recognizing the facts of evolution." Now, if there is a fundamentalist anywhere to whom these charges will apply I have failed to find him. Indisputable facts are exactly what he is calling for. Give him these and he will follow, no matter where they lead; for he is emphatically a truth seeker. But it is facts he wants, not beautiful theories, before he will consent to mutilate his Bible, and throw overboard the teachings of a lifetime. Nor does he want mere theories taught to his children as demonstrated facts. Darwin himself, admitting that his theories were incapable of proof, warned against teaching them as facts. But to-day, evolution is taught, no longer as a theory, but as indisputable fact. It is to this that the fundamentalist objects. Bryan, in his address to the General Assembly, makes this perfectly plain. "We do not ask that the teaching of evolution as an hypothesis be barred, but merely the teaching of it as a proven fact." Since this was the position taken by Darwin himself, and since, to the mind of the fundamentalist the theory is no nearer proven now than it was when first propounded and when laughed out of court by such scientists as Dana and Agassiz, is it any wonder he takes the stand he does, and is he not entitled to a square deal from his opponents? Calling Bryan and other fundamentalists hard names is certainly not a very satisfactory way of answering their arguments.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I was very much interested in the reply of Dr. Smyth to the Bishop who refused to reordain a professor in Yale, and also in your comment upon it in the issue of July 7. I cannot refrain from saying a word or two on this vexing subject.

In the first place, why should we Congregationalists play seesaw with the Episcopalians about unity when we all know that back of the mind of an Episcopalian is the fixed idea that a non-Episcopal ordination is no ordination at all? No words of theirs can hide this fact from our eyes. In spite of their great desire for union and their condescending acknowledgment that we have been used of God in the past, they love that idea of theirs more than unity and they hug this hobby as a child hugs a new doll. Unity will never come until the Episcopalians get rid of this obsession, and anyone who offers to submit to reordination, no matter for whatever cause, only strengthens those brethren in their mistaken idea. Their ultimatum is preposterous, to say the least, for who dares to sit in judgment between us and decide: This one is truly ordained but that one is not.

In the second place, I cannot for the life of me understand why we Congregationalists should want to begin this work of unity with the Episcopalians. These latter stand nearest to the Roman Catholics, while we are the farthest removed. Why should these extremes seek union first? Is it not more natural to begin with our nearest neighbors, say, for instance, the Presbyterians or Reformed, the Baptists or Methodists, and gradually work our way toward the extreme wing? Union with these can be effected more easily since none of them makes any such exclusive claim. Maybe by the time these other denominations have effected a union the Episcopalians will come to terms and use reason and discretion when dealing with the rest of us. Let our Congregational leaders cease marking time by dilly-dallying with those distant brethren and place their energy and effort nearer home where there is far more chance of success than over yonder!

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Dr. Doremus Scudder was secretary of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches, in 1920-22. He had already a noble record as a missionary in Japan and a pastor in Hawaii. During the war he served in Siberia under the American Red Cross with the commission of Major. His work in Boston was brought to an end by a serious automobile accident, which so reduced his strength that he felt obliged to seek a milder climate. He is now a pastor in California. It is safe to say that no other man ever won in so short a period so large a measure of confidence and devotion on the part of the ministers and churches of Greater Boston as Dr. Scudder in his all too short service there. The following extract from a recent letter of his possesses great interest as the statement of an honored Christian leader's present feeling in regard to the World War. It was not written for publication, but was sent in reply to an invitation to join the Association To Abolish War. It is now given to the public, however, with his permission after due request.

HENRY W. PINKHAM,
Secretary, The Association To Abolish War, Brookline, Mass.

DR. SCUDDER AND THE WORLD WAR

"When the war opened I was a pacifist and opposed all preparations by our Government for fighting. In Hawaii in 1915 this was also a local issue in our legislature and at public legislative hearings I took a decided stand against preparedness.

But the war propaganda finally got me and I came to feel it the duty of our nation to enter the conflict in order to end war and help democratize the world. I was unwilling to take this stand and remain at home safe while our soldiers were being killed. So I tried to secure a chaplaincy, but was refused because of age. I did, however, succeed in getting a Red Cross appointment in Siberia as Director of the department of civilian relief. I felt that after many years spent in Hawaii the chances at my age of surviving the rigors of that climate were not good, an expectation not at all justified by what soon proved to be the wonderful healthfulness of the Siberian winter.

"But what I saw in Siberia, what issued at Versailles in treaty and League making, and the rest of the after-war history with all the illumination as to how warfare through propaganda deceived and even yet nearly five years after the armistice continues to deceive, what untold burdens and suffering lasting far beyond its continuance war causes, its inability to serve as a democratizing factor, and its power to rob a free people like ourselves of not a few guarantees of liberties, have convinced me that I was wrong, that a part of the blood-guilt of the world is mine and that I owe every possible effort I can muster to help atone for the greatest crime in human history.

"I am one of the millions in all lands who have sworn 'Never Again' and who are dedicated to absolutely unrelenting opposition to the war-spirit with all its abhorrent family of crushing taxation, preparedness, so-called defensive measures, provocative tariffs and restrictions upon the free intercourse of peoples through prejudice of race and nationality."

CHURCH CO-OPERATION IN THE COMMUNITY

The growing co-operation among the churches in the community life was never more clearly evidenced than at the third Conference of the Executive Secretaries of Local Councils and Federations of Churches, held in Columbus, May 28-June 1. There are now nearly 50 of the larger cities of the country where the federation movement has developed to the point of maintaining a central office with a full time executive secretary. The association of secretaries has been formed for the purpose of furthering an interchange of experience and plans. The meeting at Columbus, which was held under the auspices of the Ohio State Council of Churches, considered the whole range of local co-operation, including evangelism, religious education, social service, religious publicity, development of better racial and international relations, and the practical problems of furthering the co-operative movement. The conference brought together representatives of the Councils of Churches from all parts of the country. Mr. Fred B. Smith, Chairman of the Federal Council's Commission on Councils of Churches, and Dr. Roy B. Guild, the Executive Secretary of the Commission, were present as special speakers.

POLITICAL PRISONERS

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I hope you will be able to give space in an early issue to the following extracts from letters received from some of the political prisoners in Leavenworth who have recently refused to accept conditional releases. There seems to be some little misunderstanding on the part of the general public regarding the attitude of these men, and I would like to do what I can to make their position more clear and more widely understood. But I feel that no words of mine can be more illuminating than are their own words on the subject:

J. T. ("Red") Doran, whom I knew before he went to prison and whom I have twice visited in Leavenworth, writes: " . . . To accept a life-time parole, returnable to prison at any moment, not necessarily even informed of what charges may be made against us, not on trial by jury, or on proved charges, but merely upon the opinion or desire of a single individual—what 'freedom' is there in this for any self-respecting human being? Were I the only man in prison to-day I would refuse such 'clemency.' When those two dying boys, Tabib and Quigley, have the grit to face death as they are doing, the least that I can do is to stand by them and live the principles that I profess to believe in. These men are no more 'guilty' than any of the others; in other words, no one of us is 'guilty' of any 'crime' whatsoever. We talk of 'solidarity,' of 'brotherhood,' but we must live these things if we deserve the name of men. I consider the Sacramento case an unknown Calvary. And I am convinced that if those on the outside of prison were a tithe as staunch, as courageous, as honest, as are these Sacramento boys, none of us would be in prison to-day. I am freer in here with such men as these than I could be anywhere else, if I deserted them and the principles that keep them here. . . . Jesus had a living conviction, and he lived true to it, and faced the consequences with courage. The outstanding fact of Jesus' whole life was sheer courage—loyalty to his conviction, to the truth, and courage to stand by it. . . ."

Alexander Cournos, one of the Chicago group, serving a ten-year sentence, writes: " . . . Even Senator Pepper utterly refutes the 'argument' that there is any difference between our case and that of the Sacramento boys. Men named in the Chicago indictment were co-defendants, and the same 'evidence' was shared between the two cases. . . . It may be years before the true significance of the 'Silent Defense' of these men is understood and appreciated, but it will be. . . . I refused conditional commutation because I believe that every act of every one of us, however insignificant, has power for good or ill, and the power of even slight actions often reaches into the future. My acceptance of compromise would have made it just that much harder for the next man, for every man, to live

Japan and the Bible

Japan is leading the Orient. Literacy among Japanese men is 90 per cent; among Japanese women 70 per cent. No non-Christian land compares with Japan for the proportion of its people that can read. Western literature is carefully studied.

The Bible which came out of the East is now the bulwark of our western civilization. It is eagerly sought after by the Japanese and available copies are all too few. Last year the American Bible Society in the northern half of the empire circulated only 118,587 volumes. Japan can easily absorb ten times this number.

The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

Dr. Lynch has arranged with us to run The Monday Club Sermons serially in THE CHRISTIAN WORK, beginning with the January 27th issue. up to his principles. It seems to me unthinkable that a self-respecting man would yield even his own civil rights in any such disgraceful bargain; certainly I will never help to fasten chains on my fellow-men. . . . No killing of men's bodies can kill the ideal for which they have stood. It is

THE NEW PRESIDENT

Calvin Coolidge took the oath of office in a Vermont farmhouse in the early morning of August 3. The newspapers had no sooner chronicled that event than they began to speculate as to what his policies might be. The President has, of course, not as yet announced any, and he probably will do so only slowly. As Vice President he was rather silent, as vice presidents are, and as Calvin Coolidge has usually been.

In his public addresses he was, of course, an upholder of the Administration. But he did not discuss politics much, nor did he speak frequently. There is some speculation that he will favor entrance into the World Court, though he is not known to have given his views on the court to Senators or others. It is thought that he inclines more favorably towards the League of Nations than did Mr. Harding. It is rumored that he does not favor calling an extra session now to deal with agricultural problems, particularly the wheat crisis. He is said to oppose restoration of surtaxes on surplus and all radical taxation. He has been an advocate of a high protective tariff. Being from New England, which "imports" much coal, he is genuinely interested in the present coal controversy. On the whole, the President has indicated that "things will move along much as usual." He has retained the Harding Cabinet, though it is expected that there will be one or a few Cabinet changes soon. For instance, Attorney General Daugherty is in very poor health. The business interests have through their spokesmen given a favorable reception to the new President. They remember his firmness when he was Governor of Massachusetts. He is a law and order man. He is known for firmness, first of all. The labor and radical elements do not look so hopefully toward the new President. Did he not once telegraph, "There is no right to strike against the public interest by anyone, any time, anywhere?" The more progressive legislators, like La Follette and Brookhart, can probably expect from President Coolidge no more encouragement than they got from the previous Administration. Personally, the new President is a good listener, a "silent man." He is not a ready mixer, as his friends testify, but he has many friends. He makes friends slowly, but he keeps them.

THE NEW PRESIDENT AND THE NEXT CAMPAIGN

President Coolidge takes office rather late in the term. Six months from now we will be in the midst of the next campaign. The nominating conventions are only ten months off. With a divided party to handicap him, President Coolidge will find it hard to initiate any big effort in Congress in so short a time. Meanwhile he must declare himself on the campaign. It seems altogether probable that he will be a candidate. His New England friends are already urging a solid delegation to the Republican convention from that section. But there will be a whole crop of Republican candidates. La Follette, Johnson, Borah, Hughes, Pinchot, Hoover, are all mentioned as possibilities, and there will be the usual number of favorite sons. At this time the new President's home is a handicap for him. The Middle and Far West are not in much of a mood to tolerate a New Englander now. They want a home man, while farm prices are low, one who listens to their grievances about the big corporations, the railroads, the middlemen, etc. The Republican tariff has suddenly become decidedly unpopular throughout the rural West. Meanwhile Senator Underwood of Alabama has said he would be a candidate if his home State wanted him. Mr. McAdoo looms as much more popular with Democrats of the North and West, however. The swing toward Mr. Ford seems to have abated a little, but he need only deny he is a candidate several times and the demands upon him will increase. That is sometimes a way to add to your support. It looks as though he would be the dark horse. There seems less possibility of a third party, but it is conceivable that a third party which would draw considerable Republican votes might again assure a Democratic victory as in 1912, or a decidedly close, uncertain, but highly interesting campaign.

THE AMERICAN TREATY WITH TURKEY

On August 6 the new American treaty with Turkey was signed. It paves the way for resumption of diplomatic relations between Turkey and the United States and will, if confirmed by the Senate, replace the old treaty which was negotiated in 1830. Not all the details, however, were settled by our representative, Joseph C. Grew, and Ismet Pasha at Lausanne. An agreement was not reached with regard to the manner of settlement of claims against the respective governments. But the representatives of both nations exchanged communications providing for further consideration of the question soon. Both governments also may withhold ratification of the treaties until there is accord in the matter of claims. The new treaty, which is a compromise, gives citizens of the United States rights and privileges equal to those of the other powers which have been agreed upon in the recent treaties. If the treaty is confirmed at Angora and Washington, there will probably be some sort of a brief lull in the Near East. But, on the whole, the arrangement is makeshift. There seem to be impossible relations between two "bad actors" in the Near East. The one is the cruel Turk, known for his massacres and his inexpressible cruelty. The other is the so-called Christian Western nations, also committed to organized murder as a method of settling disputes, who place oil and trade far above human welfare and who have used the peoples of the Near East much as pawns to further their imperialistic ends. No moral supremacy or leadership can be accredited the United States in her recent dealings with the Near East. Our gunboats over there are loaded with samples and drummers. There is record of special trips of our battleships in order to get our oil prospectors into fields ahead of those of other nations. Our foreign trade with Turkey has increased from $3,000,000 a year before the war to over $40,000,000 a year. A maintenance of that trade is of more importance than justice. Like the Western European nations, we believe we can save our souls by washing our hands.

BRITAIN AND FRANCE DRIFT FARTHER APART

The tumult and the shouting in the so-called idealistic enterprise of 1914-18 had scarcely died when separate ambitions and nationalistic aims among the victors began to assert themselves. The Carthaginian peace was imposed upon the defeated, but thus far it has not been successful. The matter of reparations was left in the hands of a separate commission which revised the figure that Germany should pay many times. Then matters came to an impasse when France went into the Ruhr and the war between France and Germany of 1923 began. Germany, of course, then stopped paying anything. France, it appears, is not gaining anything through occupying the Ruhr. Her expense is too great. An impossible situation has been created. France at once drew upon herself criticisms of aggression and militarism, and she has fairly well deserved the criticisms, not only by her actions in the Ruhr, but her speedy building of airplanes and her loans to Poland and Jugoslavia of 500,000,000 and 300,000,000 gold marks respectively, apparently for the purpose of assisting those nations to build up their armies. But during the past few days the gap between France and England has considerably widened. England has published two notes in which she charges that France is violating the treaty, she threatens separate action, suggests that the World Court decide the matters of interpretation of the treaty, and suggests the importance of official or unofficial American aid. Meanwhile the feeling between France and England goes from bad to worse. Premier Poincaré has made two speeches which are looked upon as "prefaces" to France's reply to Great Britain. He is the same jingoist and emotionalist and summons France to "carry on." He recalled the war's agony and says that France will not get out of the Ruhr until Germany pays France's claims. But Poincaré's bombasts may come to naught in the revolution in Germany.

THE CRISIS IN GERMANY

On August 12 Chancellor Wilhelm Cuno and his cabinet sent their resignations to President Ebert. The President then asked Dr. Gustav Stresemann, leader of the German People's Party, to form a new government. Cuno was apparently the victim of the economic crisis which has resulted in much rioting throughout Germany, and in communist outbursts which threaten to involve the country in revolution. Cuno's government could not withstand two hundred hostile labor votes and he was persuaded to resign. The new government will be a coalition and will probably have only seventy-one "Nationalistic" and twenty-six Communist votes in opposition out of a total of 469. This coalition is also looked upon as a strong counter-stroke against the Communists. Stresemann indicates that at all costs he will maintain Cuno's policy of passive resistance in the Ruhr. He also hopes to achieve some economic stabilization in Germany, where the mark is worth a million to the dollar; he also wants no separation from the Rhineland. The fall of the mark to such fantastic figures now causes little excitement in Germany, where domestic business has practically all for some time been on the basis of the dollar or other foreign currency.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE NEW CHANCELLOR OF GERMANY

Dr. Gustav Stresemann, political leader of the German People's Party, the big industrial group to which Hugo Stinnes belongs, has long been a potent factor in German affairs, both before and since the war. Since 1907, when, as the well-paid general manager of the Union of Saxonian Manufacturers, he entered the Reichstag from the district of Annaberg, Saxony, he has taken an important part in the problems of Germany. As a fluent speaker and writer, he revealed himself as a politician who could modify his views when occasion arose and yet keep his position as leader. Dr. Stresemann knew his own people, as evidenced by his stand against the trial of the former Kaiser, while at the same time letting it be known that neither he nor his party was necessarily anti-republican. Knowing that the Crown Prince had always had a certain hold on a large part of the German people, in his own magazine, "Deutsche Stimme," he urged a new estimation of the exile at Wierengen. The new Chancellor, in his speeches, has always regarded the United States as the saviour of Europe, particularly Germany. A year ago, in an address before the German-American Economic League, an organization headed by him, occupied with furthering trade relations between the two nations, he said: "America cannot cut loose from Europe to which she is bound by common and powerful economic laws and she must suffer with Europe. We need an enduring economic peace in Europe, especially in Germany." Despite his feeling for the United States throughout his career, Dr. Stresemann entertained no kindly feelings for President Wilson, to whom he alluded at the time of the rupture of diplomatic relations as "a theorist remote from all the world." Dr. Stresemann added that Mr. Wilson did not know Europe, but considered himself "qualified to be her teacher." Another occasion Dr. Stresemann declared that Germany should expect more from a sane, practical policy on the part of the United States than from any efforts toward reconstruction by the League of Nations. He suggested that a world economic clearing house system might to some degree restore international economic order. On the question of France and the reparations, Dr. Stresemann pleaded for a solid political front against any independent French action. He urged that Germany continue its passive resistance to the Ruhr invasion until Poincaré withdrew the French troops or showed a willingness to discuss the reparations along the lines of the Hughes proposal. Dr. Stresemann was one of the first of the German leaders to back the stand of Chancellor Cuno in the latter's attitude of holding the country amenable to a reasonable approach and yet solidly opposed to initiating overtures for further parleys. "No reasonable minded person will oppose an understanding with France," Dr. Stresemann said, "but in her procedure it is now up to France to create prerequisites for such an understanding." Dr. Stresemann has been mentioned before as a possible candidate for the office of Chancellor. At the time Chancellor Fehrenbach's cabinet resigned in May, 1921, it was strongly believed throughout the nation that Dr. Stresemann would get the post, as he had been in strong favor even outside his own party. It was pointed out by those who favored his appointment that he was regarded well outside of Germany and qualified to deal adequately with Germany's problems exteriorly as well as interiorly. He was born in 1878 and was graduated from the Universities of Berlin and Leipsic.

U. S. FOREIGN TRADE DOUBLED IN TEN YEARS

Although the foreign business of the United States is generally regarded at the present as being slack, figures for the last ten years show that in the fiscal year of 1923 the United States nearly doubled the amount of business it did in the year preceding the war. Sight of this remarkable gain is lost owing to the abnormally high import and export business done during and immediately after the war. Foreign trade of this country in 1923 exceeded that of 1922 by $1,000,000,000. In many quarters this gain is accepted as an indication that world-wide conditions are not so bad as frequently painted. Figures of the Department of Commerce indicate that only one per cent. of the manufactured goods is sold to Europe and only four per cent. is sold abroad. The volume of agricultural products exported is, however, much higher, reaching about fifteen per cent. during the past year. The striking gain of manufacturing in the United States accounts primarily for this big increase. An interesting picture of this gain is shown in figures compiled by the Trade Record of the National City Bank covering the last 134 years of American industry. "The foreign trade of the United States in the nine years since the beginning of the war is three-fourths as much as in the 125 years preceding the war," according to the Trade Record. "Statements compiled by the Trade Record show that the foreign trade of the United States in the nine years from the close of the fiscal year 1914 to the end of the fiscal year 1923 was $77,000,000,000, against $100,000,000,000 in 125 years from the adoption of the Constitution to the end of 1914. Imports in the nine years since the beginning of the war to the end of the fiscal year 1923 are $28,000,000,000, against $50,000,000,000 in the 125 years preceding the war, and exports since 1914 are $49,000,000,000, against $59,000,000,000 in the prewar period. The excess of exports over imports in the nine years since the beginning of the war is $21,000,000,000 against an excess of but $9,000,000,000 in the 125 years prior to the war. The fact that the excess of exports in the nine years since the beginning of the war is more than double the export excess in the 125 years preceding the war is due to the fact that our favorable trade balance, as the excess of exports is sometimes called, only began in the closing quarter of the nineteenth century when the producing and exporting power of the Mississippi Valley was developed by the extension of plentiful transportation facilities to that area."

LABOR AND THE CHURCH

In addition to presenting in this number a variety of articles on Labor and the Church we wish to call attention that the August number of "The Forum" contains two interesting articles discussing the Church's attitude toward labor. In the first, Mr. Paul Blanshard, who represents the Amalgamated Clothing Workings of America, throws down a challenge to the Church, inviting it to raise its voice against low wages, long hours and economic inequality.

"The Church," he says, "is well situated to make fact-studies on modern industrial situations and report to the public the truth disclosed. We recognize that the neutral attitude is advisable in investigating industrial facts, but the attitude should not continue after the facts have been disclosed. We feel that the Church should be just as militant in its opposition to industrial ills as it was in its fight against Negro slavery or the saloon. Why play safe? Jesus didn't. "We feel that the Church is now largely controlled by business men. This is not the fault of the business men nor primarily of the Church. It is simply a reflection of the social inequality in which we live. Business men have a chance to learn the lessons of executive management; workers have not. Business men have surplus money for supporting the Church; workers have less. Business men may be personally kind and honest (they have a better chance to be good than the workers), but their prejudices are in favor of the current economic habits that give wealth and social standing to the people who own and manipulate, and a bare subsistence to the people who produce." William Palmer Ladd, dean of Berkeley Divinity School takes up this challenge and implies that enlightened churchmen are prepared to give labor their moral support. "Few will maintain that the Church ought definitely or officially to ally itself with labor," he states, "or with any social, economic, or political group. But the Church is not likely to get a hearing for a non-ethical gospel. Christian principles require, above all, that the attitude of the student of economic questions should be open-minded and honest. He should avoid prejudice and partisanship. He should be suspicious of propaganda. And he should seek his knowledge elsewhere than in printed pages. If he is in earnest he will go to the sources of information. And congregations might well request of those who have the ordering of their services that more frequent opportunity than at present be given them of hearing labor tell its own story rather than that they be left to gather their knowledge of the labor movement from ill-informed or prejudiced sources of information. Where there is a difference of opinion the employer should of course have an equal opportunity of putting his side of the case before the churches."

A QUESTIONNAIRE—AND OTHER MATTERS

When Mr. Bryan was asked to answer a questionnaire by Clarence Darrow the other day at the Christian Citizenship Conference at Winona Lake he did not bother to go over it, because, he said, he knew beforehand that Mr. Darrow was an atheist, and the man who admits he is an atheist does not worry him. "The man who denies the existence of God," he commented, "is not apt to have much influence, because the evidences of a Creator are so plain and innumerable that atheism, when it is avowed, is not nearly so dangerous as so-called theistic evolution. Theistic evolution lulls Christians to sleep. It is an anesthetic which deadens pain while religion is being removed. The theistic evolutionist assumes the existence of God, but puts Him so far away that the influence upon life is weakened when not entirely destroyed. The evolutionist claims that evolution was God's method, but the method when carried to its logical conclusion eliminates all that is vital in the Bible. Evolution has no place for the miracle and the supernatural. That leaves the Bible merely a man-made book, and the Bible shorn of its divine authority would be hardly as influential as a book that never claimed to be divine if it is convicted of being an imposter, for it is the greatest of imposters. My controversy is not with atheists like Mr. Darrow, but with those who claim to be Christians and who substitute the guesses of evolution for the Word of God." Mr. Bryan's intensity seems like the intensity of the man who is convinced of the truth of that against which he is arguing, but who does not dare admit it because, so far as he can see, it will sweep away for him the whole foundation of his ideas of life. He does not see where he can place his feet upon a sure rock in his thinking if he accepts what God in his natural world seems to indicate is His method. Mr. Bryan has not penetrated to the sense of a God who is revealed by truth wherever it may be, whether it be in the word of the psalmist or in the life and teaching and death of Jesus, or in the rocks and trees and the sweep of the history of man. Would that he and those noble men and women who feel with him might come to the great, restful sense of a God who is present and revealed in all things, Who guides and sustains all life, Who is known through all the means of His whole creation.

THE STYLE OF CHURCH BUILDINGS CHANGING

There is no more interesting evidence of the change in our American way of living than at shown in the changing style of church buildings. For two hundred years the "meeting house" was but a hall for the Sunday gathering of the "elect." The rough and angular outlines were sometimes softened with a few features of comfort, but as a rule the rectangular building with bare floor, straight-back seats and small-paned windows was a meeting place used for an hour or two a week and left the rest of the time in splendid isolation. When the home life of the people supplied the needs of the family the simple "meeting house" was perhaps adequate, but to-day the institution that sets itself to serve the community must have an adequate equipment. So the modern church plant still has its auditorium. But how different, with its art windows, deep carpets and comfortable upholstered pews, equipped with a gymnasium, cooking room, sewing room, club rooms and library, a vast institution used almost daily from early morning until late at night. This development of church needs has placed great responsibilities upon the church organizations, and none feel this more than the denominational church building societies. Among the organizations doing significant service in this line none are more successful than the Congregational Church Building Society, with its head office located in New York and district offices in Boston, Chicago and Denver and representatives in every State of the Union. At the time of the meeting of the National Council of Congregational Churches in Springfield, Mass., October 16th to 23rd, Dr. James Robert Smith, the church building secretary of the Congregational Church Building Society, will report the most prosperous two years in its history. This Society is, in fact, doing the work of a great construction company, for in every week in the year it helps build two churches, and in every ten days of the year it helps complete a parsonage. The Society reports receipts of $1,220,000. This money has been used in completing 305 buildings for religious purposes, located in villages, towns and cities in all parts of the country. But we are only touching the surface when we applaud and consider these denominational reports. How long will it be before we have a conscience which condemns the unnecessary building of the past and present and a policy which will prevent this colossal waste in the future?

cally the only definition of vacation. About twenty-five years ago or more this all began to change. Mr. Moody started Northfield and Bishop Vincent, Chautauqua. Then some divinity schools offered summer courses to pastors. Then summer Bible conferences or missionary institutes began springing up. Then the great universities began holding summer sessions with practically as full equipment of teachers as in the regular sessions. The result has been that there are many thousands who once would have been camping or spending July and August in country boarding houses are now living in college dormitories and frequenting lecture halls.

There has been some fear expressed in scientific quarters. The teacher and preacher and social worker has been warned against the summer school. The only vacation for the mind is inactivity, they are told. But the facts do not seem to justify these fears. These thousands of teachers and preachers not only seem thoroughly to enjoy themselves, but they seem to return to their work rested, refreshed, invigorated and inspired. The conclusion of the whole matter is that no hard and fast rule can be laid down for vacations. Some people thrive on one kind, some on another. Evidently there are thousands of preachers and teachers who have been creating and giving forth for ten months who find that two months of receptivity and contact with fresh thought and inspiring teachers gives not only preparation for the next year's work in this way, but real rest and refreshment. Absolute change in direction of energy seems to be the realest rest to some people. They use the mind as ardently in pursuit of knowledge during the summer as they do in preaching and teaching in the winter, and find rest. A great many of these thousands of summer students come from rural districts, we hear. What the change means we who live in towns hardly realize. The rural teacher or preacher comes to the town or city. He, whose chief lack is companionship during the working months, finds himself in a large community of like-minded people and equal minds. The companionship, the common life, and the talk is half the attraction of the course. Then there are the contacts with great minds for this period, for these summer schools are securing the finest minds of the country. A glance at the faculty and lecturers of Chautauqua, for instance—the prospectus happens to lie before us—reveals half the most noted preachers, professors and publicists of the country for this summer. In the larger places the summer student is also finding opportunity to hear good music. In New York the great Philharmonic Orchestra is playing the finest classical program in the Stadium every night, while Goldmark's Orchestra, which last summer played nightly on the Columbia Campus, is playing in the Mall. At Chautauqua the New York Symphony Orchestra is playing for a period of several days. At Ocean Grove the best singers, violinists and pianists give frequent rehearsals. Some of these summer students just devour all the lectures, social events, friendships and music in sight and seem to thrive on this type of vacation.

Again, there is another type of mind which seems to require absolute cessation from intellectual activity of any sort. Some people, when vacation comes, run as far away as they can from anything that has even remotest relations to their working life. As a great New York preacher and writer once said as July drew near: "Let me lie down and sleep in the woods for two solid weeks." Another wants to wade trout and salmon brooks through dark and healing woods.

The New Vacation

THE newspapers report the registration at the summer sessions of Columbia University, New York, as over twelve thousand. We suppose that the registration is large at all the great universities. There are also large summer schools, some of which offer the courses found in the universities, such as Northfield, Ocean Grove, Chautauqua and Winona. There are many summer conferences, such as those at Stony Brook and Ursinus College. Last year President Garfield tried out the experiment of a summer institute of politics at Williamstown. It proved a great success and is just now having a second successful session. Altogether there must be many thousands who are spending their vacations in going back to school. So far as we can judge, a large majority of these summer students are teachers; the clergy would come next, but all professions are represented, and some business men of scholarly propensities are represented.

This is all very interesting and highly significant. It shows quite a complete transmogrification in the idea of what makes a vacation. Up to twenty-five years ago hardly any one would have thought of taking a vacation in this manner. The only conception of a vacation was complete cessation of mental activity. One should walk, or hunt, or fish, or climb mountains, or sail, or, better still, take absolute and complete rest by the sea or in the mountains. Rest was practi-

EDITORIAL

Another wants to sail the lakes and sea. Another wants simply to sit on hotel porches and rest. Some want solitude; others want to talk. There are some to whom the country, even the most beautiful, without human companionship is stupid and after a few days boresome. They want cessation of work, but they need companionship. Some are satisfied to be alone with nature for weeks. It is interesting to note, on the other hand, how many thousands of people from country places go to the great cities to spend their vacations. We are told that New York is swarming with such people all of July and August, and that the theater audiences are made up almost wholly of these visitors.

There are some who find rest for the mind and recuperation for the body in rather violent physical exertion. They take long walks over Swiss mountain passes or climb the iced and dizzy peaks themselves; they take guns and plunge into the Canadian woods or Rocky Mountain fastnesses and pursue the moose, the deer, the bear, over long and weary trails. They eat meals cooked over the open fire by the guide and sleep under the shining stars. Dr. Rainsford devotes a long chapter of his recent autobiography to the praises of this sort of vacation. He declares that it saved his life many a time. The muscles are hardened to steel; the nerves are restored to perfect poise; the lungs are cleaned of every impurity; the mind is made keen and eager. Mr. Roosevelt also rejoiced in this sort of vacation. It used to be more in vogue than in our day. The health authorities are inclined to prescribe rest rather than hard physical exertion for the modern man. Recuperation is the great need of the day.

There are some to whom vacation means an opportunity to read hour after hour undisturbed. They save up precious books and when summer comes, on quiet porch or under leafy tree they voyage to far-off realms of fancy and walk on shores of gold. One great man told us that he simply took along his Shakespeare and three or four other great books and read and re-read them with unalloyed joy. Others keep the new but great books of the year—novels, essays, or even theological books, and read them with avidity and delight.

Character and the Soul

SOME construe sacrifice as related to their money. They suppose that when they have given that in abundance their meritoriousness cannot be questioned. But though the command to deal rigorously with material possessions is the very last that many Christians heed, there are other and greater offerings to be consecrated. We submit that intellectual pride and rebellion against the revealed truth of God is a quality to which we cling more tenaciously than to monetary wealth. Few have this wealth; nearly all have their opinions, prepossessions, prejudices, bigotries, and the like. They consume the piety and fraternity of the community and prevent our concerted action in behalf of truth. Custom and convenience require deference to their errors. The steady advance of knowledge is obnoxious to them. Ease and profit betray the just, the right, the verifiable. Exploded traditions are paraded for the security of a false phrase of belief or of society. Reforms are indefinitely postponed and needed corrections of popular fallacies linger and wait because we are not willing to bring every thought into captivity unto obedience of Christ. You recall His valiant stand for the truth when He appeared at the bar of Pilate. The words He uttered there should be graven on the minds of His disciples. He was born, as He said, and also came among us for the truth, not only in the Church, but in the State; in art, in science, in literature, in the souls of men and of their various organizations. To find it, to keep it, to protest it against assaults and invective and against the peculiar malignancy which is ever ready to distort or defeat it, is your first summons and obligation. Every Christian who really cares for the welfare of his fellows will not count the cost of pursuing truth or of being loyal to its demands. They will have the premier place in his affections, and he will not be guilty of that unfaith which shelters behind prejudice or pretense, because while wearing the mask of faith it dreads faith's contact with reality.

The concrete body of truth which we have before us in the Bible has not been received by this nation in any such measure as is necessary for the general morals. While disputes center about its teachings and a multitude of books and pamphlets explanatory of views upon the Scriptures teems from the press, they are relegated to the rear or reserved for sad episodes and for the disenchantment of age. Yet the Scriptures are as far above all creeds, cults, confessions and theologies as the Alps are above the plains beneath them. Why not take and read them, putting aside the ephemeral stuff which debilitates your hearts and brains, and becoming lovers of the law and the testimony? These words are spirit and life, able to make you wise unto salvation. And if it can be shown, as we think is the case, that our children's education in the Bible has been grievously neglected, shall we allow our attachment to any political heritage to intervene between them and such an education? What sacrifice of ideas, of effort, of time, is not utterly reasonable in this emergency? God desires a holy nation, and the remainder of its attributes, even though cherished by us, should be subordinated to that end.

As you trace the courses of the Old Testament and the New their reiterated assertions that men and their associations must be made one with God cannot but impress you. Here, as it seems to us, the United States, and for that matter the world, has come to a terminus. We cannot get away from the decision to accept or reject this dominion. Upon that decision depend consequences which we need not depict. Sacrifices of many reputably honorable things for the sake of His will has been the record of nation builders. Pilgrims, pioneers, missionaries, explorers, who at stated times and in divers manners expanded the frontiers of His Kingdom, did so by dint of expatriation, peril and hardship. Separation from the ordinary motives dubbed as respectable was their first act. They became, in this sense, holy, since to be holy means to be separate, a man or a people, apart, dedicated, monopolized, a royal priesthood, a peculiar nation. You will be looked upon as strange, fantastic, abnormal. So were St. Paul and St. Francis and Wesley and General Booth. But behind them stood the Christ, who was crucified because He was different, vastly different, from those who nailed Him to the gibbet. In His references to sacrifice He used speech redolent of the soil, simple imageries of the garden and the vine. But no utterances have ever denoted the premier place of discipline in the soul's culture as

His utterance denoted it. Evidently He had no use for a mediocre, accommodating, pliant type of professional belief. He does not want the rotten trees of which Shakespeare speaks, which are pruned in vain and cannot so much as a blossom yield in lieu of all expended pains and industry. The keen knife severs the barren branches from the vine. They have either to bleed or burn. Yet the hand that uses the blade is guided by the heart that craves your further fruitfulness. Would you arrest that hand? Then take the cross itself out of the universe you visualize. Let all its harvest be as though it had never been. Consent to drift toward inferior breeds, stunted, crabbed and misshapen by inordinate desires and by cowardly preferences.

There is no right-minded man present who is willing to adopt so ignoble a policy. Our practise may be indifferent, but our theories are polarized by sacrifice. The husbandman who in the rude winds of March covers the snow with the superfluous branches has his eye on the purple clusters of luscious grapes ripening in the mellow glow of September, so to you sacrifice comes unbidden. The blow descends, and what you fain would hold fast is removed at a stroke. But rightly understood, or even not understood at all, the severance means character. And character is the sole distinction that accompanies the soul with eternity. This sequence of sacrifice and fruitfulness is the controlling factor of the mystery of pain. The leaf of the vine may be a poem, the blossom a picture. But your Lord is looking for fruit, for humbler hearts, cleaner lives, purer motives, larger sympathies, wider usefulness. Some religionists pay particular attention to forms and ceremonies. The etiquette of piety is their aim. Give them a silver stand for the grapes or a golden goblet for the wine and they are satisfied. Jesus did not authorize their meticulous ritualisms. He was intent on the rich red wine of Calvary's vintage, upon wealthy manhood under poor robes, upon willing and loving resolution in dreadful circumstances. The prunings which not a few complain of as needless mutilations rid us not only of our treasured belongings, but of naughty superfluities. There is an exuberance which is dangerous, over-proud, confounded by its richness. So justice is tainted with corruption, becoming revenge. Growth gives way to weakening fluctuations. Righteous anger degenerates into insatiate vengeance. The Pharisee is a saint spoiled by surplusage of religion turned sour. Lest even our good should be as evil, a pruned life is essential, and an unpruned orchard is a depressing spectacle. The scythe of Time is an indispensable weapon. It mows down tyrannies of the flesh and the spirit. It cuts off these mortal bodies which we adore. It makes short work of the enterprises which have been expensive enough to carry out. Nevertheless, it releases life into new and better channels. It delivers us from an entail which has become intolerable. It prepares us for the morrow of larger things. Meet your unavoidable sacrifices bravely by being sacrificial. Let it be said of you, "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O Lord!" For to those who endure and overcome it shall be given to sit with the High Priest on His throne. Take His grace and salvation to your hearts now. Cast off everything which hinders your surrender to Him. Slay the members that bind you to the earth. Offer the ancient sacrifice of broken and a contrite heart.

The Baptist World Alliance at Stockholm

It was particularly appropriate that the Baptist World Alliance, which meets only once in a decade, should hold its sessions this year in Europe, because the years since the war have witnessed astounding accessions to the Baptist ranks in Europe, particularly among those nations within which the ferment of the new spiritual freedom has been most active. It is not difficult to understand why many who have been suddenly released from the bondage of ecclesiastical tyranny, or who have come to chafe under it through the experiences of recent years, should react in the direction of what may be called the left wing of the free church movement. Certain it is that in Szechoslovakia, Latvia, Rumania, Poland and Russia thousands have adopted the Baptist position. Two thousand were baptized in Rumania last year. It is reported that there are now over a million Baptists in Russia. This has created a situation in which the Baptist churches of England and America are profoundly concerned and interested.

It was appropriate also that the Congress should meet in Stockholm, since the Swedish Baptists are celebrating this year their seventy-fifth anniversary. Stockholm, from July 21st to 27th, was the scene, therefore, of what was called by the local press the greatest religious convention that Sweden has ever known—about twenty-five hundred delegates gathering from every country under heaven. The United States furnished the larger proportion of messengers, from the Northern and Southern Baptist Conventions, almost one-half of the total, as was natural, since two-thirds of the Baptist communion reside in this country; but Great Britain and her dominions were largely represented, and Japan, China, Burma, Assam, the Philippines, Africa, and every country on the continent of Europe, from Lapland to Sicily, were represented by delegations, large or small.

As a mere demonstration of the power of the Gospel of Christ to unify the most diverse national elements the Congress was remarkable in itself. There is a cohesion among Baptists which, in view of their loose denominational system, must seem inexplicable to those who depend upon ecclesiastical organization for their bond of unity. That Baptists also, devoid of any authoritative creed, have still a common attitude and spirit wherever found was also amply demonstrated. Emphasis upon religious experience, the competency of the soul before God and the right to utter freedom of conscience in religion was a common note from whatever land or clime the particular speaker may have hailed.

The special emphasis of the Congress was determined by its place of meeting. The heirs of Roger Williams listened to recitals of hardship and persecution endured by their brethren in newly awakened lands of Central Europe which resembled the story of the apostolic church and the representatives of the churches in lands where religious liberty is enjoyed took steps for the relief and support of their weaker brethren. The meeting of the Congress in Europe, so widely advertised and largely attended, will of itself bring a new prestige and vigor to the work of humble Baptists in every nook and corner of the continent. The messages of President Harding and of David Lloyd George to their "fellow Baptists" in convention were published widely and will not go unnoticed in Europe. The Congress brought untold cheer and encouragement to the forces of evangelical Christianity, by whatever name they may be known, over a very wide area.

Of course, there were notable addresses and sermons delivered by men of international reputation. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, President of the Alliance, died a few weeks before the Congress assembled, and the veteran John Clifford, of England, was prevented from attendance by age. But very many of the leaders of the denomination on both sides of the Atlantic and, in deed, from every shore, were present. Dr. J. H. Shakespeare, by invitation of Archbishop Soderblom, conducted a special service in the Cathedral of Upsala. Dr. George W. Truett, of Texas, delivered the Congress sermon. Dr. J. C. Carlile, of England, delivered a notable address on "Christianity and Industrial Relations." Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery thrilled the convention as she spoke on "New Opportunities for Womanhood."

But the Congress was not merely an occasion for the exchange of ideas, nor merely for the inspiration and encouragement of the younger and weaker members of the Baptist family. It was for mutual consultation, and for the planning of definite lines of work which the Baptists of the world can undertake together. As the world becomes narrower the necessity for co-operation, and the possibility of it, becomes greater.

The Congress at Stockholm was without question the most inclusive and broadly representative meeting of Baptists ever held. It may prove to be the most significant in its results. It is no secret that Baptists do not always agree with one another. But a remarkable degree of unity prevailed at Stockholm. The minor differences of language, race and spiritual heritage of the elements that composed it were so many that it was imperative that accidents be ignored, and that the emphasis be placed upon the really essential things. Men who would have found it difficult to subscribe to any statement of doctrinal belief prepared by any faction of their fellow Baptists in their own land seemed to find it easy to agree upon a statement of Baptist principles and purposes prepared for the Baptists of the world. It was an instructive demonstration of the irenic character of broadly Christian principles in contrast with the divisive influence of insistence upon doctrinal minutiae.

The most exciting moment of the Congress occurred when Dr. A. C. Dixon, of Baltimore, in a somewhat bitter speech sought to place the Alliance on record against his pet aversion, modernism, or liberalism, but it was not well received. Science, said Dr. Dixon, should be regulated by the Bible, not the Bible by science. But the Alliance refused to be drawn into that controversy. It was the only jarring note of the week.

The new President of the Alliance is President E. Y. Mullins, of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville. Dr. John Clifford, acknowledged by Baptists everywhere to be the nestor of the denomination, was made President emeritus by acclamation. A strong Executive Committee, drawn from many lands, will direct the work of the Alliance until its meeting in Toronto in 1928.

A Visit to Stony Brook

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

I HAD many invitations to visit summer schools, assemblies and institutes this year, but had to confine myself to three, and two of these near home. I went first to Winona and wrote about it a few weeks ago. This week I am at Stony Brook, and two weeks hence I expect to be at the Isle of Shoals, off the coast of New Hampshire. Stony Brook is a very interesting place. It is a lovely and wooded spot on the north shore of Long Island, about two hours out of New York. Dr. John S. Carson, of Brooklyn, is the president of the Assembly, and twenty directors, all interested in evangelical Christianity, ably support him. There is a large assembly hall and three or four hotels, all under the control and management of the Assembly. It has been Dr. Carson's aim not simply to have people come for the conferences, but to establish a Christian summer community. As a result about one hundred and fifty cottages have already been built by people who combine summer rest with the study of the Bible and consideration of various aspects of the Christian faith. It seemed to Dr. Carson after a while that these fine buildings—hotels and cottages—might be put to winter use as well as summer, and so the Stony Brook School for Boys was established last fall. It immediately became a success and fifty boys were enrolled last year. A lower school for smaller boys had to be established during the year, so many were the applications from parents who had boys in the regular school.

The conferences begin July 1 and continue in almost unbroken succession to September 9. The conferences this year have been the Near East Workers, The Victorious Life, Bible School Workers, The State and Church, Christian Citizenship, Sacred Prophecy, and finally the general conference on The Religious Life. For these conferences Dr. Carson brings noted speakers from all parts of the country. Among those taking part this year are Mr. Bryan, Dr. A. Wylie Blue of Belfast, Ireland, Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, Dr. David G. Wylie, Dr. James M. Gray, Dr. Ford C. Otman, Dr. John Timothy Stone, Christobel Pankhurst, Dr. James S. Martin, Hon. Sam W. Small, Hon. Charles F. Swift, Mrs. Lulu Loveland Shepard, Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas and Charles G. Trumbull.

It will be seen that this is a thoroughly conservative group. There is no suspicion of heresy at Stony Brook and evidently very few speakers who are in any way suspected of it take part in its meetings. The prophetic element in the Bible and the apocalyptic receive great emphasis in the various meetings, and whole weeks are devoted to these aspects of religion. There is a Platform of Principles which is conspicuously posted in the various halls and bedrooms. The conferences are generally pretty true to these principles, I imagine. My readers will be interested in seeing what they are. (Note the emphasis that the platform puts upon the coming of Christ in glory):

- I. The divine inspiration, integrity and authority of the Bible.
- II. The deity of our Lord Jesus Christ.
- III. The need and efficacy of the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ for the redemption of the world.
- IV. The presence and power of the Holy Spirit in the work of redemption.
- V. The divine institution and mission of the Church.
- VI. The broad and binding obligation resting upon the Church for the evangelization of the world.
- VII. The consummation of the Kingdom in the appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

I have been one of the speakers at the Conference on Christian Citizenship held from August 5 to 10, under the auspices of the National Reform Association. It dealt with such subjects as Christianizing Education, Politics, Commerce and International Relations, with Sunday, Prohibition, Church and State and the Perils of Mormonism. It is the first time that just this sort of conference has been held at Stony Brook, and it is a good sign. Dr. James S. Martin was the guiding spirit and not a thing was said by any of the dozen eminent speakers that was out of harmony with that evangelical spirit which pervades the Stony Brook conferences. Indeed, there is no conflict between the evangelistic message and the social gospel when both are reasonably and sanely presented. One endeavors to win the allegiance of every soul to Jesus Christ, the other endeavors to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to every department of human activity and to every social relationship. There has been a chasm between the two groups of workers because each has suspected the other. The evangelist has suspected the social reformer of being indifferent to the personal aspects of religion, the individual's relationship to Jesus Christ, and the reformer and social worker has suspected the evangelist of being indifferent to the social evils and the pagan practises of business and politics. Both groups have perhaps been open to this criticism to some degree. There are signs that both sides are seeing that there is no conflict between the gospel of personal salvation and the gospel of social redemption. There is no reason in the world that the man who preaches Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of the drunkard from his drink and the man who insists that the traffic in strong drink shall be wiped out of existence because it violates the principles of Jesus Christ should not work harmoniously together and supplement each other. There is no reason in the world why the man who preaches that the reception of Jesus Christ into the heart will make a man pure and the man who insists that the traffic in women shall be stopped because it is a blot on a civilization we want to claim for Christ should not co-operate in every way. There is no reason why the evangelist who preaches the gospel of love displacing hatred in the heart through the presence of the Holy Spirit and the reformer who insists that war must be banished because it violates that very law of love and makes even the individual who has learned to love begin to hate, again, should not clasp hands in a great common endeavor. The evangelist insists that the individual obey the law of God; the reformer says the community is also under the law of God and is accountable to the same moral judgment bar. It is greatly to be hoped that the long conflict between the two groups in the Church will cease. Personally, I think many of our evangelical brethren are making a mistake in confining their message too much to the saving of men out of a sinful world and not devoting enough attention to bettering that world itself. Equally, I think many of our social workers are making a mistake in confining their efforts to the redemption of institutions and not recognizing that every man has a relation to God as an individual as well as being a part of the social organism and the community. Let us all work together to make Christians and a Christian community in which Christian men may live. Let us teach little children personal loyalty to that dear Lord who loved them and claimed them. But let us also insist that that community be cleansed of saloons, brothels, indecent plays, moving pictures and books, gambling, Sabbath breaking, overwork, child labor, foul tenements and everything that has no part with that Christ to whom we would lead them.

I am glad to have visited Stony Brook. I congratulate Dr. Carson on the great work he is doing. I should like to attend the Conference on the Religious Life. In the conferences on Prophecy and the Second Coming of Christ I would have absolutely no interest, and as one who greatly admires Dr. Carson and sees the wonderful opportunities he has there I would frankly say I think they are a waste of precious time and opportunity. I have dropped into many "prophetic" conferences, first and last, and found them simply "guessing games," as practically all the books dealing with the same subject are. As to the second coming of Christ nobody knows anything about it; it is impossible to tell just what the writers of the New Testament themselves believed; it looks as if Paul himself changed his mind about it; equally good men hold utterly varying views about it; it does not seem to have any effect upon character one way or another, as half the saints believe in it and half do not; and what difference does it make, anyhow? As to the times and seasons, every last speaker sets a new time—and none of us know anything about it. I am always afraid, too, that people who get too absorbed in all this speculation and all this cabalistic treatment of the Scripture will neglect the one thing for which, as Christians, we are in this world—to establish the rule of Christ, here and now, both in the hearts of men and nations. I do wish Dr. Carson would tell all his soothsayers, augurs and premillennialites to spend a quiet summer somewhere with the Book of Daniel and the Revelation, with their charts and compasses and zodiacal tables, and put on a whole summer with the biggest men he could find on "How to Build the City of God in the World." That is the sole business and concern of a Christian.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

Through their Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations representing them in the World's Student Christian Federation, students of America are again providing funds for aiding thousands of their unfortunate fellow-students in Russia, Central Europe and the Near East. Up to April, 514 schools and colleges had given to the current year's "Student Friendship Fund," and from outside sources $183,547 had been received. Besides these amounts, representatives of the Fund are administering in Russia a gift of $50,000 from Jewish students in America, given through the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, and $10,000 given by the Baptists. For four months to come 30,000 students in Russia will be cared for, and many hundreds in Central Europe and the Near East are finishing their year's work because of the generosity of students in thirty-five different countries.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Baptist Conception of Religious Liberty*

By E. Y. Mullins, D.D., LL.D.

President, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, U. S. A.

WITH Baptists religious liberty is born of the direct vision of God. Sometimes it has been a dream, when, like John Bunyan in the darkness of prison, they have gazed through the bars at the far-off stars. Sometimes it has been a theme of eloquent discourse, when they have expounded it to others. Sometimes it has been a solace, when they have gone into exile for conscience sake, and sometimes a battle cry, when they have shed their blood for it. But always it has been a passion deep as life welling up from the depths of being in eternal faith and hope.

If I could express in a word the heroic spirit of Swedish Baptists seventy-five years ago, and after, I could tell you what religious liberty means. If I could give to you the distilled essence of the spirit of our Virginia fathers, and once more catch the vision of Roger Williams of Rhode Island, I could set forth the truth. Nay, if I could reproduce in descriptive words the heroism of our brethren and sisters to-day in Russia, in Bessarabia, in Rumania, and many other countries I would need no other words. It was expressed in immortal words in Oncken's reply to the Burgomaster: "Oncken," said he, when he had been arrested, "as long as I can lift my little finger I will put you down from preaching this gospel." "Mr. Burgomaster, as long as I can see God's mighty hand above your little finger I will preach the gospel."

Look, then, at the bases of religious liberty.

There are three great discoveries made by every human soul which grows normally to maturity. First, it discovers the world. To the babe the world is a part of itself. Even our own mothers are at first a mere patch of moving color and a soothing sound. But when the babe tries to pluck the flame of a candle and burns its hand, or bumps its head on the floor, it makes the first great discovery. It discovers that the world is different from itself. The self and the world become henceforth great realities. Later when the moral nature awakes the soul discovers God, the greatest of all realities. When a human soul discovers God the foundation for religious liberty is laid.

Men have wandered from the path of duty, civilization has gone astray, because these three realities, the self, the world and God, have not been properly related. The human problem has been how to relate personality to society, the individual life to the corporate life. But how to relate man to God comes first. It is the key to all problems. The quest for economic liberty, intellectual liberty, civil liberty, all go back to religious liberty as the root.

Thomas Jefferson wrote his own epitaph before his death. It is most remarkable in the fact that although he served as President of the United States eight years, there is no mention of that fact. The epitaph reads as follows: "Here lies buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the declaration of American Independence, of the statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia." Jefferson had the spiritual vision to see that liberty is the fountain head of civilization and that religious liberty is the mother of all other forms of liberty.

Sir Walter Besant, in his little book, "Building the Empire," shows a similar insight. In an early sentence he shocked my American sensibilities by the declaration that the British Empire includes the British Isles, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Canada and the United States of America. The reader is amazed until he reads further Sir Walter's statement that he is defining the empire not as a political or physical, but as a spiritual entity. He means that Great Britain was the seed plot of liberty for all these governments. The love of religious liberty is the deepest bond of unity and friendship among nations.

Religious liberty rests upon man's original creation in God's image. The purpose of God in creation did not appear until the dust stood erect in the form of man as a free and self-determining being. Man as a person created in God's image, free and spiritual, competent to deal directly with God; with an upward look, an endless discontent with the finite and temporal, a passionate yearning for the infinite and eternal; man, endowed with a conscience ringing in the soul like an alarm bell against wrongdoing; man, with a will of his own which he can misuse and bring on moral ruin, but which he can surrender to God; man, with an intellect hungering for infinite truth and eternally discontented; man, with a heart which no earthly object can satisfy; man, self-willed and sinful and then penitent and believing, redeemed by the power of Jesus Christ, Redeemer and Lord; man, recreated in the divine image, with the witness of the Spirit in his soul, telling him of his eternal destiny; man, as a child of God seeking to walk worthily of his calling, and heir of all the ages—this is the being and these the endowments which demand that great boon we call religious liberty.

As Baptists understand it, religious liberty excludes certain things and implies certain other things. It implies certain rights, and along with these involves certain duties and privileges. Let us look at these in order.

First, religious liberty excludes a number of things. It excludes, for one thing, state authority in religion. The state depends on the use of force. Religion is moral and spiritual. The state uses coercion. Religion appeals only to freedom. The state deals with evil doers. Religion seeks to produce righteous men and women. The state represses crime. Religion develops character.

Again, religious liberty excludes the principle of toleration in religion. To put the power and prestige of the state behind one form of religion and merely tolerate others is not religious liberty. It is religious coercion. God has not given the state any power to compel men in religion. Equal rights to all and special privileges to none is the true ideal. Some do not know the difference between toleration and liberty. If a snail could speak it would say to the tortoise, "You go too fast for me." The clod would say to the snail, "You go so fast you make me dizzy." But neither clod nor snail nor tortoise would know of the mighty flight of the eagle overhead. Religious toleration is the snail and tortoise. Religious liberty is the eagle.

Religious liberty excludes the right of the state to impose taxes for the support of one form of religion against the conscience of the people. All honor to the heroes of passive resistance who refuse to pay an obnoxious tax, which the state has no right to impose. A free church in a free state is the goal we should seek.

Again, religious liberty excludes the imposition of religious creeds by ecclesiastical authority. Confessions of faith by individuals or groups of men, voluntarily framed and set forth as containing the essentials of what men believe to be the Gospel, are all right. They are merely one way of witnessing to the truth. But when they are laid upon men's consciences by ecclesiastical command, or by a form of human authority, they become a shadow between the soul and God, an intolerable yoke, an impertinence and a tyranny.

Religious liberty excludes centralized ecclesiastical government. Men, redeemed by Christ, regenerated by His Spirit, born of divine power and grace, are capable of dealing directly with God. Each one has a right to a voice in religious affairs. God speaks directly to men. Even the humblest believer may be a channel of the highest divine wisdom. Democracy, or self-government in the Church, is the New Testament ideal. All believers are entitled to equal privileges in the Church.

Religious liberty excludes priestly mediators and sacramental power of salvation. We have one priest, Jesus Christ, our great High Priest. All believers are priests entering into the most holy place. God's grace flows freely and directly to all who have faith and respond to his call. God has not limited the gift of his grace to any particular human channel. No group of men has any monopoly of God's grace, to withhold or bestow it upon their own conditions. God's grace is direct. It is His free gift. "Let us come boldly to the throne of grace," is the injunction of the sacred writer.

Religious liberty excludes infant baptism. Baptists refuse to treat the infant as a thing. We treat it as a potential person. We recognize its will, its intelligence, its freedom. We will not rob it of the joy of conscious obedience in baptism. Proxy faith is a counterfeit faith. The New Testament recognizes only personal faith. Train the growing child for God. Lead it to Christ. As the living flower at your feet requires the forces of the boundless universe to mould and shape it, so does the child require an infinite spiritual universe. As the flower needs the power of gravitation which grips all the systems, the sunlight that travels ninety million miles to paint its petals, the mysterious and wondrous power of electricity, and the complicated water system of the planet, to mould and shape it, so also the child needs God's infinite truth, His boundless love, His immeasurable power and His unspeakable grace to regenerate and mould the child into Christ's image. Religious liberty requires that we let the child, as it grows up, learn the truth for itself, repent and believe for itself, obey Christ for itself, be baptized for itself, rejoice and struggle and grow for itself. To deny it these things is to rob it of its religious rights

Consider next what religious liberty implies. First of all, religious liberty implies the greatest of human rights. Let us glance at some of these rights.

The first is the right of direct access to God. No cloud, no shadow of human authority, should come between the soul and its God. The second is man's right to search for truth in religion. Jesus recognized this. He did not compel belief by divine authority. He so lived and taught the truth that men discovered His Messiahship for themselves. His revelations became their discoveries. Many things are revealed which men do not discover. The cause of many diseases was clearly revealed in signs and symptoms through the ages. But it required the genius and insight of a Pasteur to discover the germ. When he made this discovery he revolutionized the science of medicine. The facts of the solar system were revealed during all past ages. But not until Copernicus made his great discovery did we know that the sun is the center. Jesus was revealed to the disciples as the divine Son of God, but not until by faith they discovered Him did they understand Him. "Who do ye say that I am?" was His question. "Thou art the Christ, the Son of God," was their answer. He dawned upon them like a sunburst. They discovered His glory and were lifted to divine heights.

So also religious liberty implies the right of free utterance and propagation of truth. The evil powers of the world have ever sought to stifle men. Heroes have led the way in the witness for the truth. Martin Luther is one of the greatest heroes of all time because at a supreme moment in the spiritual history of the race, with every earthly power arrayed against him, at the Diet of Worms he said: "Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. God help me."

Religious liberty implies the right of equal privilege in the church. There are no spiritual lords in the Christian religion, except the one Lord, Jesus Christ. Christ brings the common man to his rights. Under the old human systems the Church or the State was everything, the common man nothing. The Church or State was like the tree, enduring through the generations. Common men were like the leaves on the tree that fell to the ground and perished with the seasons. The State or Church was like the ocean, enduring the centuries; common men were like the waves, rising and falling and disappearing forever. Christ says, "Let the common man speak. Give him a voice in your affairs. Let God speak through him." Look at that group of worshipers in that first church at Corinth. All grades and classes in society are represented. There is a Greek with classic features indicating culture. There is a Roman, rugged and strong of feature. There is a rich man, and by his side a slave. There is a city official, and there is a regenerated outcast. There are the respectable, and among them the Scarlet Woman, washed and cleansed by the blood of Christ. There is a northern barbarian and a swarthy Ethiopian, for Corinth was a cosmopolitan city representing the ends of the earth. The Roman government was an iron band holding the world together by force. Here is a new inward spiritual bond uniting men on a new principle of a common faith and hope and love. Here is loyalty and obedience to a common Saviour, Jesus Christ, who has shown them the way to God. Here is a new freedom, a new equality of privilege, a new brotherhood. This Corinthian church is a new spiritual democracy. It is the seed plot of all future democracies because it is an embodiment of religious liberty in its primary meaning of free access to God.

So also religious liberty implies the right of free association and organization for religious purposes. All men with religious beliefs and convictions have a right to organize and propagate their views. There never has been and never will be any human government, civil or ecclesiastical, with any right to curb or hinder or thwart the utmost freedom of men to associate themselves together, to organize, and to propagate the truth as they see it.

And this leads to the statement that religious liberty implies the right of men to demand of governments under which they live protection in the free exercise of their religion. That government which persecutes men for religious beliefs commits a crime against God and man. That government which is partial in its treatment of religious beliefs violates the principles of common justice, transgresses eternal and inalienable human rights and defies the will of God.

Having considered the rights which religious liberty includes, I consider next what are the duties imposed. Among these duties are the following:

First of all, is the duty to search for and discover truth. God gave us the Bible. God made the world. There is no conflict between truths. The city of truth which science is building up from the earth, when completed and purified, will be seen to be a suburb of the city of God which is descending from heaven arrayed in the glory of a bride adorned for her husband. Let us not fear that God's revelation in nature will conflict with His revelation in redemption. Christ is the key to both. Slowly science is fashioning a crown for Him. Slowly economics and sociology are fashioning a crown for Him. Slowly psychology and biology are fashioning a crown for Him. Slowly His people are fashioning a crown for Him. He who went forth with a single crown will return crowned with many crowns. All the armies of truth shall follow Him, and on his vesture shall be written His name, "King of kings and Lord of lords."

I name next the duty of sacrifice for truth. To discover truth is one thing. To be willing to sacrifice and even die for it is another. Christ's witnesses have ever been Christ's martyrs. Let us never forget:

"Though love repine and reason chafe,
There comes a voice without reply,
'Tis man's perdition to be safe
When for the truth he ought to die."

Let us also remember that--

"By the light of burning martyrs Christ's bleeding feet I track, Toiling up new Calvaries ever, with the cross that turns not back,
And those mounts of anguish number how each generation learned
Some new word in that grand credo which in prophet hearts has burned
Since the first man stood God-conquered with his face to heaven upturned."

A third duty is to protest with all our souls against religious oppression. Baptists believe in religious liberty for themselves. But they believe in it equally for all men. With them it is not only a right; it is also a passion. While we have no sympathy with atheism or agnosticism or materialism, we stand for the freedom of the atheist, agnostic and materialist in his religious or irreligious convictions. To God he stands or falls. He will render his account to the Eternal Judge, not to men. So also the Jew and the Catholic are entitled to protection in the exercise of their religious liberty. Baptists do not desire to share the errors of men, but we are, and ever have been, and ever will be, passionate and devoted champions of the rights of men. The supreme and inalienable right of all men is the right to direct and free and unhindered approach to God.

The next duty involved in religious liberty is loyalty to the state. The state is ordained of God. It serves a divine end and purpose. Baptists have ever been ardent patriots. Liberty is not license. Liberty is opportunity for service. Religious liberty is the prime condition for every kind of human progress. Let a man have free access to God and hear God's voice, and he will become a champion of law and order. He will become a champion of the economic rights of men. He will become an advocate of the Golden Rule in all industrial relations. He will become an evangelist of brotherhood among the nations, of peace on earth and good-will among them. He will oppose war because he knows that war is directly opposed to the Gospel of Christ. He will pray for his own country and for all countries. He will live and strive and pray that his own country may become a part of God's Kingdom.

Finally, religious liberty involves the supreme duty of loyalty to Jesus Christ. Not license, self-will, or human will, but God's will as revealed in Christ is the goal of history and of religious liberty. There is no danger in this religious liberty centered and anchored in Jesus Christ. Catholics are afraid of it and want to impose the authority of the Pope and the Church. Cardinal Gibbons defines religious liberty as "the right to worship God according to the dictates of a right conscience, and practice that form of religion most in harmony with man's duty to God." But a right conscience is a Catholic conscience, and the Catholic religion alone answers the above description as Cardinal Gibbons sees it. Wrapped up in that definition is all oppression. Gibbets and prisons and thumbscrews and racks are concealed in it. It can start martyr fires which would girdle the earth.

Another Catholic writer, referring to the Pope, says: "We acknowledge that authority; we proclaim it; we embrace it, as one surrounded by dark and turbulent waters clings to a lone spar lifting to safety above the perils of the deep. We may, indeed, hear the siren song of liberty; we may feel in our hearts the urge of our race to be free; we may be tempted to turn and walk no more in the way pointed out to us. But we know full well that liberty without authority is the kiss of death. As a kite without a string, a ship without a rudder, a meteor that has strayed from its orbit in the skies, so is man when the tie that binds him to his Creator is cut asunder. He floats through life, a wayward and meaningless atom in the universe, his destiny thwarted, his future nothing but darkness, desolation and extinction. Oh, give us faith, that virtue which reaches down from heaven to lift the universe."

But authority here advocated is that of the Pope and the Catholic Church, and these are not the true authority. Jesus Christ is that authority. Unto Him is committed the destinies of the human race. Let Him have sway in men's hearts and they will realize their true freedom. Freedom only comes when a man finds his true object and is impelled by a higher motive. No man finds his soul's true object until he finds Jesus Christ. None have such spontaneity of action, such unframed energy and buoyancy as men who have acquired the freedom that Christ, the Son, gives. Look at Paul. He abounds in images which suggest spontaneity and exuberant joy. See him yonder when, like a mighty swimmer rising above the billows of adversity and difficulty, he exclaims, "I can do all things through Christ." Hear him as he spreads the wings of devotion and in a splendid flight of mystic passion he shouts, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Observe him as he is caught in the mighty grip of moral enthusiasm and self-conquest, exulting in the joy of battle, "Thanks be to God, who always leads me in victory through Christ." See him again as he is impelled onward, the embodiment of flaming love and quenchless hope and deathless ambition, running the Christian race as one who treads on air, and exclaiming, "Forgetting the things that are behind, I press towards the mark."

The moral career of Paul reminds one of the flight of some mighty eagle long confined in a cage and then released. At first he is uncertain of his new feeling of freedom, but at length, becoming conscious of it, the heavy eyelids open, he looks about him, his drooping wings he gathers for flight, and then with a scream of joy he soars away to the clouds. His eagle soul has found its object, God's free air. Jesus Christ is the atmosphere of the soul. In Him the soul finds its true object and freedom. Men become the slaves of Christ, because He makes them autonomous, sets them free.

Human history has seen the downfall of many false authorities in Church and State. Crowns have been shattered and thrones sometimes broken down. But men have gathered the pieces of the broken thrones and they are erecting another greater than all and they are making of the shattered crowns another more glorious than all. On that throne they are placing Jesus Christ, and that glorious crown they are putting on His brow, and I can hear by the ear of faith the far-away rising and falling of the mighty chorus of the nations:

"All hail the power of Jesus' name:
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown Him Lord of all."

The Road to Religious Reality

By John R. Scotford

DETACHED from the life of common men is the greatest embarrassment under which the Church suffers to-day. To the mass of the people she appears to be concerned in a half-hearted way with certain remote and inconsequential ideals. They cannot see that the Church has much to do with the problems and burdens of their daily lives. They have never been convinced that there was any immediate relation between the message of the Church and their personal needs. As a result they have allowed the Church to go its way while they have gone theirs. Because they have not felt in her ministries the throb of a great purpose, they have not taken her seriously.

Indirectly, the Church is accused of a mild form of insincerity. The workingmen feels that the minister is paid to say certain things, even as he is hired to lay certain bricks. Preaching appears to many people, not as a free quest for truth, but as a labored attempt to arrive gracefully at certain pre-determined conclusions. The pulpit is accused of presenting truth which is agreeable to the pews rather than its own deepest convictions. The result of these suspicions is to surround the ministries of the Church with an atmosphere of unreality.

To keep the message of the Church simple and sincere and directly related to the needs of men is a problem of persistent difficulty. Nowhere is sincerity and truth more essential than in the Church, and yet no institution is more subtly tempted to be something other than its true self. The Church is exposed to a continual undertow dragging it into plotitudes, conventionalities and shams. Let us consider some of these currents towards religious unreality.

The Church is handicapped by her heritage from the past. She is continually tempted to imitate the standards of religious life and experience which the saints of the past have bequeathed to her instead of creating new standards in the light of present needs. By using the forms of life and thought of great men of other days it is assumed that their power may be reproduced. Such imitation may be thoroughly sincere, but it is utterly futile. Whether it be the theology of John Calvin or the antics of Billy Sunday, copying can result in nothing but an atmosphere of unreality.

Another unfortunate legacy from the past is our ecclesiastical vocabulary. The language of the sanctuary is too often an unknown tongue to the man on the street. The message of the Church comes to many ears as a voice out of the past. Much of the blame for this condition can be assessed against the laziness of the ministerial mind. It is far easier and much safer to present Christian teachings in ancient terms than it is to translate them into the language of the day. Radical truth is both harmless and safe if expressed in the terms of the Westminster Confession. The meaning has long since evaporated out of most of our stock religious phrases. Men will not take the Church seriously until she trades in her inherited vocabulary for proficiency in the common vernacular of the people.

The desire to be impressive frequently betrays the Church into unreality. Religion is commonly acknowledged to be one of the great concerns of life, and its representatives naturally desire to be taken seriously. The impulse to "talk big" is perfectly natural, but utterly fatal. In a day when business and science both put great store by accuracy of statement, exaggeration in the pulpit is a sin. Many a sermon has been discredited in the minds of the more thoughtful listeners by the use of an impossible illustration. Even more damaging have been the claims to power which the Church has advanced. Men have frequently been told that if they would accept a certain doctrine, give themselves to a certain sort of religious experience, or undergo a certain rite, that their lives would be changed. Some men may have been so changed, but many more have accepted the offer of the Church only to discover after a week or so that their purposes and desires were much as they had always been. The Church has had scant success in turning sinners into saints over night. Over-statement in either advertising or religion does far more harm than good. The world does not need to be impressed with the importance of the Church, but it sorely needs to be convinced of her utter sincerity.

Behind these surface symptoms of unreality there lies a deeper difficulty. Little insincerities grow up where there is no consuming passion for positive achievement. The Church has imitated the great souls of other days, has used an outworn vocabulary, and has boasted vainly of a power she did not possess, because she lacked a definite objective in present-day life. Aimlessness has begotten listlessness. The Church cannot have present power until she reshapes her teaching and her life upon the anvil of present need.

The need of the Church is a theology built to satisfy the living needs of living men. Reality can only come as our thought and teaching are related immediately to the life about us.

Both conservative and liberal have erred by living in a world of their own imagining rather than in the world of actual life. The worst thing which can be said of the conservative theology is that it has no meaning for the man of to-day. To accept its teachings one must live in an intellectual mansion standing to one side of the highway of life. The liberal has also been guilty of living apart from life, only his bungalow has been on the sunnier side of the road. His notion that the world is incurably good is just as artificial as the conservative teaching that the world is wholly bad. The gospel of sunshine and light may be as far from the truth as that of fire and brimstone. Both have erred because they failed to concern themselves with the realities of common life.

For some years the popular emphasis has been upon a Christo-centric theology. Men have been dazzled by the rather recent re-discovery of the humanity of Jesus. Much preaching has been inspired by the text, "We would see Jesus." It has been popular to disdain all theology and as the phrase goes, "Preach Christ." This tendency has purged the Gospel of many incrustations out of the past, and has pointed the Church in the right direction, but the results have been disappointing. Simply telling the story of Jesus has failed to cure the world of its ills. The danger of the Christo-centric emphasis has been in the substitution of admiration for activity. The results have been intangible because the aims were nebulous.

The purposes of Christ should be emphasized as well as His person. Jesus demanded something more of His disciples than admiration. Never did He seek personal glory. His test of discipleship was not the love of the heart, but the loyalty of the will. His purpose was not to magnify Himself, but to advance the Kingdom of God in the hearts of men. His gospel centred, not in Himself, but in the Kingdom. He called men primarily that they might share this purpose with Him. His ministry was not Christo-centric, but Kingdom-centric. Emphasis upon the person of Christ is futile unless it leads to the acceptance of the program of Christ.

For some years the Church has been groping in this direction. Feeling the need of a definite program, "movements" of various sorts have been initiated. If only the churches could be gotten to march as one body and toot their horns all at the same time it was believed that the walls of Jericho would again fall down. Money being the one goal which the American people thoroughly understand, much has been made of financial objectives. These movements have been an effective stimulus for the local church and have promoted much missionary expansion. Yet at the bottom these appeals have been essentially artificial and unreal. Their goals have been far removed from the lives of the people enlisted. The Church has been under the suspicion of seeking to magnify its own riches and power. These movements have not sprung from the hearts of the American people, and they have not dared to address themselves in any thoroughgoing fashion to the deeper needs of American life.

In the Kingdom of God which Jesus preached we have an ideal which will cut as deep into life as we will let it. The deeper it plows, the more power will it uncover. Starting with our own lives, it moves out into the lives of our neighbors, the community, the nation, and the world. When the Church accepts this purpose it will not need to hunt for a program.

The Kingdom of God is an ideal with as many sides to it as a skilfully cut diamond. Each age is bound to look at this ideal from a different angle and find in it new beauties and new opportunities. To-day there are at least three applications of this ideal to life from which the Church cannot escape if it would be true either to its gospel or humanity. Each of these applications of Jesus' teaching will bring the Church into immediate contact with the naked realities of modern life.

Nearest at hand is the problem of home life. The records of divorce are only the surface ripples of a vast sea of human misery. The family problems of a great city stagger the imagination. Men and women cannot know happiness until they carry into the intimacies of married life the spirit of mutual respect and loving service which Jesus exemplified. The Church must do more than solemnize marriage; it must idealize it. When the Church dares to preach a frank and effective ideal of family life it will find itself ministering to the real needs of real men.

The havoc wrought by selfishness in our commercial and industrial life is another problem which cannot be blinked. Wages and profits are the great realities of life to most men. What has the Church to say about them? What did Christ teach? Is personal gain an adequate or even a respectable motive for the conduct of business? The Church which dares to make a contact with life at this point will find itself not only in the realm of reality, but in the realm of trouble as well. Yet is not a conflict with powerful interests more to be desired than the present state of futile detachment?

The problem of national and race relations is as pervasive as the air which we breathe. Every relationship of life was jarred by the convulsions of the war. The kindred problem of race relationships projects itself sooner or later into every community. Is pagan conflict or Christian service to be the basis of the relations of nation with nation and race with race? Is force or reason to rule the world, What message has Jesus for such a day, Conditions challenge the Church to preach the Gospel of the Kingdom of God. The passion for peace which finds expression in many a pulpit is a much needed note of both sincerity and power. Great is the present opportunity of the Church to influence the life of both individuals and nations.

When the Church dares to face problems such as these her sincerity will no longer be questioned. She will find her power, not in the forms of other days, but in the passion for human betterment. Having something to say, she will speak the language of the day with fluency and force. She will not need to boast her power, for it will be apparent to all. Having dedicated herself to the service of present need, she will come to a new understanding of the mind and life of her Master. The Church which incarnates the Gospel of the Kingdom in its life will fathom the mystery of the incarnation of Christ. The Church which carries the cross of present human need will know the meaning of the cross of Calvary.

Religious Experience and Mental Disorders^{*}

By Anton T. Boisen

WHILE looking over the books in a psychiatric library some months ago I was surprised—in fact, startled—to find a four-volume treatise entitled “The Insanity of Jesus” (La Folie de Jésus) by a professor of psychiatry in the University of Paris. It had never before occurred to me that any man could take such a serious view of the mental condition of Jesus as to use up four sizeable volumes upon it, much less that there was sufficient evidence in regard to it to occupy so much space. A glance at the contents told me at once more about the writer than it did about Jesus. He is entirely hostile to religion in any form. Not only was Jesus a degenerate paranoiac and a weakling, but Paul, Augustine, Ezekiel and other religious geniuses were all afflicted with “paranoïa théomanique,” and if they were living to-day would very properly be confined in hospitals for mental disease. The author is intemperate and violent in his tone, he is lacking in any sense of value or proportion, and he is wholly uncritical in his use of sources. He is not, therefore, to be taken over-seriously.

This book has, however, drawn my attention to a problem of great importance concerning which I find a growing body of literature. Not only Dr. Binet-Sanglé, but also a Dr. Hirsch and a Dr. Lomer, have made psychiatric studies of Jesus and contend that He was a paranoiac. A Danish authority named Rasmussen is of the opinion that he was an epileptic. Meanwhile psychiatric studies of other great religious geniuses are appearing by the score, not merely from the pens of over-rash Freudians, but also from adherents of the more orthodox schools. The theologian, on the other hand, if he is not serenely oblivious to these psychiatric ventures, is very indignant at what he considers assaults upon the heroes of the faith. He is even apt to resent Professor James' sympathetic “Varieties of the Religious Experience,” because it dares to suggest that there is a connection between experiences that to him are sacred and of supreme value and experiences that have in them many elements of the morbid and pathological.

The suggestion that I would offer is that the psychiatrist is right in drawing attention to the common characteristics in the experiences of individuals whom we regard as religious geniuses and those of patients in our hospital for mental disease, but that he has failed to recognize with sufficient clearness the sharp contrast and the real line of demarcation between them. I would offer the further suggestion that the common characteristics are due to certain common causative factors and that therefore study of the one type in the light of the other may be of real value in solving the problem of effective treatment for those who are suffering from mental difficulties, both in their incipient and in their more developed stages.

In making this suggestion I am, of course, assuming that many mental disorders are of mental rather than physical origin, and that in such cases a conflict is probably at the root of the difficulty. Such conflicts, as I view them, are in themselves neither good nor bad. They often represent an intermediate stage through which certain individuals must pass if they are ever to reach a level of development at which their interests, instead of being devoted exclusively to baseball and jazz music and matters that savor of the pornographic, or perhaps being bound up in some hope that cannot be realized, become genuinely attached to things that have enduring value both for the individuals themselves and for the race. Such conflicts are found in all those experiences which the religious worker calls conversions. Not infrequently such conversion experiences are accompanied by voices and visions and other automatisms which the psychiatrist regards as pathological. But the conversion experience has this characteristic: it results or tends to result in a reintegration of the personality around what the individual regards as the purpose of life. The conversion experience, in other words, tends to bring the individual into harmony with himself and with his environment.

But conflicts do not always result happily. Sometimes they result in defeat or demoralization or more or less permanent cleavage. This, as I see it, is the explanation of some psychoses. But between these two end states of clear-cut victory and unification and clear-cut defeat and demoralization there may also be a condition of acute conflict or of unstable equilibrium. This unstable equilibrium I regard as the explanation of many cases of “psychoneurosis” and perhaps of some “manic-depressive” types of mental trouble.

According to this view, the significant thing about Jesus or Paul or Augustine is not the presence or absence of certain pathological phenomena, which may have been incidental to some severe conflict through which they had passed and the consequent sensitizing of their minds; the significant thing is the end attained in terms of character and social helpfulness, in the breadth of their sympathies, in the unification of their interests around a great and socially useful purpose, and in the serenity and beauty and strength of the resulting personality. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance, in the treatment of any case of mental difficulty, to take into account the character of the conflicting forces and the general direction in which the personality is tending. Medical workers are, I think, beginning to see this, and there is significance in the fact that specialists in mental disorders are entering the domain of philosophy and ethics and religion, and are speaking with an authority that the philosopher and the theologian, who start with abstract ideas or traditional dogmas, no longer possess. The physician, as a result of his empirical method and his careful, systematic study of living men and women, has thus in very truth become a physician of souls, while the traditional “physician of souls,” clinging to his traditional methods, has become merely the custodian of the faith.

This raises the question of the relationship between the medical and the religious worker and the need of co-operation between them. The view may be taken that the medical worker has the field and that the religious worker has now become unnecessary so far as treatment of mental disorders is concerned. My own view is that the religious worker, with all his limitations and with his waning influence, has yet in his keeping three things that are of fundamental importance in dealing with this problem:

1. A message with regard to the ultimate realities of life that has brought comfort and hope and strength to many a sufferer. Inasmuch as a sense of being out of adjustment with what they conceive to be the purpose of life is characteristic of many sufferers from mental disorders, the guidance of a wise religious teacher should be of great value.

2. An effective means of re-education through suggestion in prayer. The religious man who is true to the teachings of Christianity has all that M. Coué can give him and much more.

3. A group of socially-minded people of whom the religious worker is the chosen leader and through whom he can greatly multiply his own effectiveness. Such a group can be utilized to provide a wholesome environment for the man in distress.

The task of most religious workers is and must always be to deal with these problems before they reach the advanced or acute stages that we meet with in the hospital for mental disease. But to be able to do this effectively religious workers must have a far better understanding of such problems than they have to-day. To this end there should be specialists in this field who would have much the same relationship to the average pastor that the medical specialist has had to the old-time general practitioner. Such specialists, working in co-operation with medical workers, can bring to bear upon certain acute and difficult cases such insight and experience as the group of religious workers may possess. They can also serve as "liaison officers" between medical workers in psychiatry, with their already advanced knowledge, and religious workers at large. Such a plan, by using machinery already in existence, could without additional expense to the state greatly increase the effectiveness of psychiatric work, not merely in the way of prevention, but in the matter of more sympathetic oversight of discharged patients. I do not mean by this to imply that the medical profession does not already possess facilities for this work, but I do say that the problem is one of such magnitude that the Church can help. This applies not merely to local communities, but to hospitals as well. Those who have had any experience in hospitals for mental disease know that, except in the expensive private sanatoria, the physicians are so busy with their routine duties that conferences with the patients, even though recognized as desirable, are almost out of the question.

In suggesting this plan I am under no illusion as to the present equipment of the average pastor for such work. His academic preparation has not included the consideration of such problems. He finds himself quite at a loss when he meets them in actual life. The one chief piece of machinery that the Protestant Church has worked out for dealing with the man who is sick of soul is the "revival meeting," and it is an open question whether this method in practice does not do almost as much harm as good. What I do see is the potential power of the Church to contribute to the solution of this problem. I also see the influence upon the Church of a new method which will lead the trained religious worker to study the human personality and the forces that operate upon it as medical workers have studied the human body and its behavior.

Can the Japanese Be Assimilated?

By Rev. Paul E. Waterhouse, D.D.

[Dr. Waterhouse's grandfather was one of the pioneer missionaries to Hawaii. He himself knows the Japanese in this country first-hand.]

ONE of the questions about which there is to-day the greatest divergence of opinion is whether or not the Japanese can be assimilated in Western countries.

On the one hand, there are those who deny most emphatically that there is any possibility whatever of a Japanese, or any other Oriental, being assimilated. They insist that he is too fundamentally different in his mental, moral and religious makeup. On the other hand, those who have come into the closest personal contact with the Japanese, such as school teachers or Americanization workers, are equally emphatic in their assertion that not only can the Japanese be assimilated, but that many have already been assimilated to a considerable extent.

In dealing with a question of this kind we must keep clearly in mind that there are two kinds of assimilation—biological assimilation through intermarriage, and the cultural or social assimilation of ideas, ideals and standards of thought, living and character. There is not sufficient data available as yet for scientists to make dogmatic statements, one way or the other, as to the results of a mingling of the blood of the white and yellow races.

Suffice it to say that the difficulties arising from differences of standards regarding the status and treatment of women make intermarriage at the present time quite inadvisable. Hence in this discussion the question will be confined to the ability of the Japanese to assimilate the ideals and standards of American life.

So far as the first generation is concerned, the immigrant from practically every country of Europe as a rule retains his own manner of life and thought, works his women and cares very little about becoming Americanized in any sense of the term. It is in the second and third generations that we see the assimilation processes at work and from which we judge the assimilability of any particular racial group.

With this thought in mind and because up to the present no one has made any first-hand investigation of the trend of thought and life in the second generation of Japanese, the writer has made a partial survey of the younger generation of Japanese in the State of California. Questionnaires dealing with education, occupation, religion, language and future plans were sent out and about two thousand replies received. In addition, many personal interviews were held with both parents and children, with a view to getting as much accurate first-hand information as possible, in order to form a preliminary judgment as to the probable result of assimilation processes in the coming generation of Japanese in this country.

Owing to the fact that the vast majority of the Japanese of the second generation are still very young, nearly sixteen hundred of the replies were from children under fifteen years of age. There is, of course, little value in replies from children, except as they show the general tendencies among them. Practically all of these children were attending American public schools, and nearly two-thirds were attending some Protestant Sunday-school. Thirty-five per cent. gave their religion as Christian; nineteen per cent. were Buddhists; the rest gave no answer regarding their religion.

There seems to be a strong tendency among the boys to become "business men," as they expressed it, while the girls wished to be dressmakers, stenographers or teachers. Scores of them expressed the desire to "become useful citizens."

In talking with the teachers in the grammar schools, as well as the superintendents of schools, about the Japanese children in their classes, the almost universal opinion seemed to be that there was no problem as far as the morality or the studiousness of the children was concerned. In fact, one of the teachers in the Oakland schools said: "We teachers always like to have at least one or two Japanese children in our classes as an example to the other children, for they do study hard."

It is of much greater value to study carefully the answers of those from fifteen to twenty-two years of age. Three hundred and forty-two replies were received, which is approximately forty per cent. of the Japanese of that age born in California. Out of this number practically all had attended grammar school, fifty-one per cent. were attending high school or were planning to go, while fifty per cent. were expecting to go to college.

On the question of religion, one-half were Christians, one-fifth were Buddhists, the rest giving no answer. A great many occupations were represented by the parents, farmers naturally being predominant, others being fishermen, merchants, tailors, laborers, teachers, photographers, florists and gardeners.

It was a noticeable fact that although Japanese children in Japan naturally follow the occupation of the father, seventy-seven per cent. of those answering the questionnaire did not wish to follow their father's occupation, no matter what it was. The most popular prospective occupations among the young men are in the order named: mechanics, engineers, business men, doctors, social service or religious work, farmers, druggists, with a scattering of those who wanted to be diplomats, bankers, aviators, lawyers or artists.

Among the girls stenography and dressmaking were equally popular, while others wanted to be teachers, nurses, musicians, authors or business women. Seventy-seven per cent. of them have no intention of ever going back to Japan to live; the rest were either uncertain or failed to answer the question. Most of them expressed the desire to become useful citizens. It is quite true the Japanese farmers "work their women" in the fields, but it also seems true that this will not be possible with the second generation.

So much for a general summary of the replies. A few of the individual cases prove decidedly enlightening. The son of a San Pedro fisherman says: "I like to stay in America as long as I can, because this is finest country ever I saw. I haven't any plans for the future, but I like to grow up as a man and help the poor people. Even if I were poor, I will help the other with my best wishes and my best love. I do not know what I can do, but I like to do right thing always."

In answer to the oft-repeated statement that the Japanese do not want to become citizens and would not avail themselves of the privilege if it were given to them, let me quote a few of the many replies from young people born in Japan.

A nineteen-year-old student says: "I would like to make a good citizen of the United States." Another says: "I expect to go to high school and to a university and wish to be a useful citizen." A twenty-one-year-old student says: "After my graduation I want to sacrifice my best for America, my second native land, and Japanese who don't understand English." Another says: "I wish to be an American citizen. I wish to write some books. I wish to serve for all equally." This is the spirit of the answers throughout.

"My plan," says the son of a farmer, "is to finish high school, enter college and do something useful in this world; to learn the duties of a good citizen and to become a good citizen of the United States."

"Although I was born in Japan," says a boy who came over here when he was just a year old, "I was and will be educated by the United States, therefore America is dearer to me. I expect to do my best to forward the interest of the country that gave me my education. My greatest wish is to become American citizen."

A nineteen-year-old boy says: "I want American people to talk to me." The feeling of ostracism and the desire to have Americans speak kindly to him and help him to come in contact with the best in American life, is it not expressed in that one little sentence? Some expressed themselves as ambitious along literary lines or in music, and there is a religious note in many of the replies.

A student at Mills College, twenty-one years old, the daughter of a farmer, says: "I do not expect to go back to Japan unless it is the wish of the Heavenly Father for me to do work there. I am majoring in home economics and chemistry and am planning to have social and political science and Bible as my minor subjects before graduating from college. I have taken home economics as my major, thinking that I may be able to do some social work among the women folk, both American and the women of my own race, using this knowledge as the base of my work. Then I thought the knowledge of social science and the Bible will be a great help. Recently I became interested in the Student Volunteer Movement, and although not a volunteer myself, I am willing to go, if God permits and it is His desire, whenever and whatever the call may be."

A twenty-one-year-old man says: "I like to give my whole life in spreading Christianity among the Japanese. I prefer to live in America, but the cry for the need of Christian workers in Japan might necessitate me to go back."

A twenty-one-year-old farmer's son living in Los Angeles says: "I want to earn my living on honest principles and live in peace and harmony. I do not seek material happiness at the expense and sacrifice of humanity, but I prefer to lead a spiritually happy life with clear conscience. Since this is my country and because I consider it proper to abide with its religion, laws and customs, I will not hesitate to exercise my moral and legal rights. I shall consider this my country even though the entire populace of this country should desert me."

One girl's ambition is expressed in this way: "I would like to Americanize many Japanese living in this country to think in Americanized way, so that there would be no friction between Americans and Japanese. If one is born here, understands both languages and the feelings of both people, then it would be easy for her to make her people understand. Troubles many times arise from misunderstandings. So I would like the Japanese to be Americanized and to see from American point of view and to understand."

The results of a careful investigation of the second generation of Japanese in Hawaii conducted by the Territorial Department of Public Instruction of Hawaii show that practically every public and high school pupil in the Territory who, under the dual system, owes allegiance to the United States and to a foreign country as well, will, upon reaching his majority, renounce his foreign allegiance and pledge fealty to the United States alone. It demonstrates the fact that undivided allegiance to the United States is the hope of the rising generation of dual citizens in Hawaii.

The difficulties of language between the American-born children and their parents are brought out by this seventeen-year-old girl: "It is hard to fully explain things to my people, because we do not speak the same language. I always use English, but at home to mother and father, Japanese. We use such English expressions as mama, papa, huh, yes, no, what, oh, and so on. Among ourselves we use English. If only I spoke Japanese well, or they English, or that I could use English to father without embarrassment. But no, it's always 'if only' this or that, always. I believe that children and parents should always speak one common language.

for what is a home life unless the people in it can thoroughly understand each other."

And so it goes, boys and girls, young men and young women, naively telling their hopes and aims and ambitions, a very human story. Can anyone reading these little sketches out of the lives of scores of young Americans of Japanese parentage doubt that the process of assimilation is actually going on and that these young people, if given the opportunity with other Americans, can really fill their place in the life of our nation?

Without hesitation we join the ranks of those who argue that the Japanese can be assimilated, and the more thoroughly we study the situation the more powerful is the conviction that the debate about the Japanese would cease to be a debate at all if only all who argue against them could come into personal contact with the second generation of young men and women.

It is not the purpose of this article to advocate, in any sense of the term, an open door for Oriental immigration. The sole reason for making this investigation was to get some first-hand, verified information as to the trend of thought and life in the second generation of Japanese in California upon which to base a judgment as to the right policy for treating those who are already here in this country.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement---I

By Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

INTRODUCTION.

THE industrial situation has again changed. We have entered upon a new period of industrial development, and consequently a new era of industrial relations. The trend of wages is upward. The multitude of unemployed workers has been absorbed. We may continue to hear much controversy over the open shop movement, but the influence of organized labor is likely steadily to increase for a considerable time.

Yet the period of distress through which we have passed seems to have brought little spiritual gain in the industrial world. A battle has been fought in which neither side has gained a decisive victory, in which all the known weapons of industrial conflict were used, and which has left both sides angry, suspicious and bitter. The public has played very little part in reaching a settlement save to add tenseness to the situation and severity to the struggle. The crisis through which we have passed has apparently not clarified the relation of the community to industrial disputes, nor has it thrown light permanently on the functions of government in maintaining industrial peace and justice. There is nothing in the situation to prevent our having another mine strike as soon as market conditions cease to be favorable to full production, or another rail strike when decisions are rendered causing discontent in the rank and file of the workers.

In all this situation the Church has not succeeded in registering in any powerful way. Great moral issues which the pulpits might have helped to clarify have been so beclouded that well-meaning and courageous ministers have not seen their way. A new opportunity is before us. Some well-informed persons predict a continuance of industrial disturbances, but in any case the atmosphere will be more conducive to sober thinking and righteous judgment. If we are to realize on this opportunity a vastly greater measure of earnest thought must be given to industrial problems. Would it not be well to begin with a study of the labor movement itself?

I. THE WORKERS' STRUGGLE FOR SECURITY.

The beginning of an understanding of the labor movement is an appreciation of what the workman has at stake in his job. Underlying all his acts and attitudes is his anxiety over the security of his position and the steadiness of his wage. When Mr. Whiting Williams set out to discover "what's on the worker's mind" he tried to put himself on an equal economic footing with the men he was to study by pledging himself to depend solely on the few dollars he had in his pocket at the beginning of his adventure and what he could earn with his hands. If he failed to find a way to make his living before that meager allowance was exhausted his forfeit was to be several months of service as a manual laborer. And under the goad to which he thus exposed himself he felt the iron of the ruthless competition for bread entering into his soul. Commenting afterward on his experiences Mr. Williams said: "It almost makes me shiver with the cold of those February mornings before the great factory gates when I think of the heart-sick dejection, the demoralizing loss of standing as a man, and the paralyzing fear of the bread line which fill the mind and soul of the man who, after days of seeking, has no job and knows not where to find one." Yet his hazard was small by comparison with that of the workingman who has a family dependent upon him, when his job is wholly unprotected by contract, and his savings are too slender to carry him over more than the briefest period of idleness. To the man who works for a wage his job means what property means to the owner of a factory or a mine. The history of labor organization since the advent of machine production is the record of a struggle for attainment of security—a security that was at least approximated in the life of the workman before the modern industrial system took his tools and his economic independence from him. There was, to be sure, a division in the medieval guilds between the master craftsmen and the "journeymen" who worked for them, but all participated in the benefits of the guild which gave to its members a definite status in industry and in the community. But with the coming of capitalistic organization of industry and the conquest of manufacture by power machinery, commonly called the Industrial Revolution, the manual worker occupied a vastly inferior position. He became subservient to the machine—his freedom was gone.

It is in relation to this loss of independence and security that the labor movement can be best understood. It is not to be expected that such an understanding will result in an idealistic picture of the labor movement, or will justify all that has been done by labor unions. Labor can be, and has been at times, unjust, aggressively unjust. But is not our first task to achieve an understanding of what the workers seek and why they seek it, without reference to questions of justice and wisdom? First, understanding; then, judgment!

The origin of the trade union movement as we know it today is found in the separation between owners and workers in industrial enterprise. "It has, indeed, become a commonplace of modern trade unionism," say Sidney and Beatrice Webb, "that only in those industries in which the worker has ceased to be concerned in the profits of buying and selling—that inseparable characteristic of the ownership of the means of production—can effective and stable trade organizations be established." But even this cleavage between capital and labor would probably not have resulted in a strong labor movement had not the workers found themselves increasingly at the mercy, not merely of their employers, but of a huge, implacable, impersonal thing—the modern industrial machine.

Shortly after the close of the Great War a writer in "The Review," a journal of very conservative opinion, published in New York, discussed the cause of industrial unrest. He insisted that the workers were well treated, even unreasonably so, yet he added, "But the new era has put personality in a steel niche, and it must stay put, else large-scale production is impossible. The strikers on our streets to-day are men entering a blind protest against a system that has taken the fun and romance out of their work, even though it has brought them a standard of living superior to the days of individualism. . . . Some plan must be found whereby men may become interested in their day's work—this is fundamental. It is a twentieth century problem, and history gives us no clue to the solution."

If such a description can be soberly given of industrial processes to-day, what should be said of the conditions that existed in England when the foundations of the modern labor movement were being laid?

The effects of the industrial revolution, the magnitude of whose results are comparable with the political consequences of the French Revolution, were most marked in the textile industries, where the installation of power machinery was rapid and thoroughgoing. "The hand-loom weavers," says a historian of the period, "kept up a hopeless struggle in the attics and cellars of the factory towns, while their wages were sinking lower and lower, till finally the whole generation died out." The mills which supplanted the cottage looms were miserable, unsanitary places, in which men, women and children worked ten, twelve and even fourteen hours a day. Housing and sanitary conditions became all but unbearable in the communities where the factory workers congregated.

Even where the mechanism of an industry was comparatively simple, as in coal mining, the effect upon the individual of an inexorable industrial régime was equally marked. The report of the Children's Employment Commission in England in 1842 shocked the nation with a recital of conditions in the mines. Women and girls were working, scantily clothed, alongside boys and men. Describing the findings of the commission, Professor Cheyney says: "Young women appeared before the commissioners, when summoned from their work, dressed merely in a pair of trousers, dripping wet from the water of the mine, and already weary with the labor of a day scarcely more than begun. A common form of labor consisted of drawing on hands and knees over the inequalities of a passageway not more than two feet or twenty-eight inches high a car or tub filled with three or four hundred weight of coal, attached by a chain and hook to a leather band around the waist."

It was against such a background that present-day labor organizations appeared. Furthermore, it must be remembered that a great change had taken place in the status of the workers with reference to the community and the state. Today we are likely to imagine that protective legislation for working people is new. The truth is quite the reverse of this. Prior to the Industrial Revolution it was taken for granted that the state must safeguard the health of the workers and protect them from exploitation. The "right of maintenance" was a well-recognized principle. We find, for example, Parliament in 1563 undertaking to secure to all wage earners a "convenient" livelihood. The state undertook, in short, to regulate industry as it had been regulated during the Middle Ages, by the ordinances of the guilds. As late as 1756 the House of Commons was persuaded to pass an act allowing the justices to fix piece-work rates of wages.

But the succeeding years witnessed a complete change of policy on the part of the government. In 1776, the very year our Declaration of Independence was signed, Adam Smith published his "Wealth of Nations," in which was elaborated the theory of "laissez faire"—the economic doctrine that all questions growing out of a conflict of interest between the parties in industry and commerce should be left to settle themselves through the free play of competition. We have lived under that tradition both in America and in England virtually ever since. Before the days of the machine the worker himself was the center of industry, and it was obviously to the interest of society to protect him and to maintain his status. A long apprenticeship gave his trade something of the dignity of a profession. With the advent of the machine the worker himself no longer dominated the situation. Not he, but the machine, was the factor most reckoned with. Why should the state preserve by law an apprenticeship when a few weeks at the longest was sufficient to master the new process? A workman's place was easily filled. The stimulus of machinery made competition keen. There was a prospect of unparalleled competition from other nations. All industry seemed to be in the grip of a new force; economic and political philosophy were transformed by it almost in a decade. "Laissez faire"—let alone—became the unwritten law. Our modern version of that slogan now heard with new insistence is, "Less government in business."

To be sure, the crude workings of "supply and demand" have been mitigated in no small measure by factory legislation, workmen's compensation laws, and similar social enactments, but it is doubtful if even the limited amount of such legislation that is now effective in America would have been enacted without the persistent efforts of an aggressive labor movement.

The historic background of the American labor situation is not so dark as that of British labor. This is manifestly due, in large part, to our almost inexhaustible resources and the ease with which a wage earner has been able to better his status in a constantly developing country whose industries have called constantly for more labor. But American industry has witnessed in the sweated garment trades an unspeakable degradation of labor from which only a powerful organization was able to redeem it. And, which is more, the contrast between the status of labor in the organized trades where jobs are relatively secure and wages are high, and the status of workers who have to meet keen competition without organized bargaining power—that contrast speaks louder to labor than all other argument. Labor unionism has grown up as a defensive movement, and its prevailing psychology is one of fear. Under prosperity the transition from submission to unscrupulous domination is often made with disappointing readiness. But the spectre of unemployment and of a reduced standard of living is ever in the background. Security must come before benevolence and social-mindedness.

In their insistence upon the "right to organize" the more aggressive of our industrial workers are following what seem to them the clear teaching of history—that in the last analysis the only security labor has is what it is strong enough to maintain through organization.

The Labor and Progressive Movements in France

By Jean Longuet

[M. Longuet is a prominent French Socialist leader who recently visited the United States. He is a grandson of Karl Marx, is now an editor of "Le Populaire," a Socialist journal, and has been a member of the Chamber of Deputies.—THE EDITORS.]

FOR any shrewd observer of the relations existing between the churches and the progressive movements there is a real contrast between the Anglo-Saxon countries, Great Britain as well as America on one side, and the various nations of the Continent of Europe on the other. Between France and America the difference is even wider and deeper than between France and the United Kingdom. Of course, the reader must remember that history largely explains the peculiarities of France.

The failure of the great Reformation Movement in France, resulting in practically a victory of reaction against the movement, which was, to a large degree, as the great Socialist orator has shown, a sort of pre-republican awakening, put absolute monarchy and Roman Catholicism in the saddle, and when in the eighteenth century the great emancipation movement of Voltaire and of the Encyclopedists came it took the attitude not of reform, but of absolute negation toward the Roman Catholic Church. The movement became agnostic or even absolutely atheistic. Of course, under the influence of Jean Jacques Rousseau a deist tendency manifested itself, which more or less resembled the attitude of many of the nonconformist churches of England, Scotland or America. During the French Revolution such a pre-eminent leader of the Jacobins as Robespierre belonged, of course, to this school, while in the nineteenth century it was the point of view of many of the great intellectual leaders of advanced and progressive thought, such as Victor Hugo, Lamartine, Edgar Quinet, in France; Mazzini and Garibaldi in Italy. However, the bulk of the more advanced Republican party and later of the Labor and Socialist movement in France was altogether out of all the churches and taking a free thought attitude.

Meanwhile the Roman Catholic Church was in all the struggles of the last one hundred and fifty years the backbone of reaction in its worst forms. Napoleon I established on the ruins of the first republic his militarist empire and was crowned by the Pope in Notre Dame of Paris. When Napoleon was overthrown by the coalition of Europe and the Bourbons were re-established, the domination of the Jesuits was supreme in France. And when thirty-five years later the short-lived second republic was again overthrown after three years of existence by Napoleon III, in his "Coup d'Etat" of 1851, the whole force of the Catholic Church was behind him.

To come to times nearer than these, we find the whole strength of the Catholic Church behind reaction when the third republic had been established in September, 1870. Though the empire had led France to invasion and to ruin, the royalist parties were trying to re-establish monarchy from 1871 to 1877. They were also behind General Boulan-ger's adventures, from 1888 to 1891. Allied with militarists and anti-Semitism, they were again trying to rush back to power at the time of the Dreyfus affair, from 1898 to 1902. And again at the present time we find the same forces predominant in the militarist reaction which, after the war, has been so terribly rampant in France as well as it has been in many other countries victimized by the great bloodshed.

And on the purely economic ground, in the direct class struggle about wages, in all the battles of the trades unions and of the Socialist party, we find the forces of the Church in France, from the high hierarchy of the Cardinals and Archbishops to the more modest village priest, marshaled against all the demands of the working classes and their aspirations. Of course, there has been from time to time a more advanced section trying to remain faithful to those teachings of the Prince of Peace and his love of the poor and the hungry.

In the middle of the last century their noble and much disinterested representative, Lamennais, wrote pages of a burning faith in democracy and progress, but finally was expelled from the Catholic Church as a heretic. Some twenty years ago a more or less similar attempt, if not quite so idealistic, still altogether sincere, was made by Marc Sangnier Lachaud, the grandson of the great Paris barrister, Lachaud. His "young catholic" group of the "Sillon," supported by some rich Catholic elements, very active more especially among the poor Catholic elements of Brittany, made some noise in the political world. Their program included a certain number of labor demands, declared itself very strongly against the monarchists and in favor of the democratic and republican institutions, condemned some of the worst features of modern capitalism. A few years before the war the "Sillon" was solemnly condemned by the Pope as being heretical. Sangnier declared that he would submit to the decision of the Pontiff. As a matter of fact, he practically continued his propaganda under another form. But now his ideas appear pretty much confused. For instance, at the general elections of November, 1919, he accepted candidacy and was elected to the Chamber of Deputies on the Paris National Bloc list, the most deplorable coalition of all conservative and nationalist forces. However, it must be admitted that since he has been in the Chamber, Marc Sangnier's attitude has been altogether very different from what was expected from a man elected by the National Bloc. His attitude on international problems has been a wonder and a dismay for the ordinary rabidly jingoistic French Catholic, while it has been greeted by great interest and sympathy by all progressive audiences. In spite of the rage of the National Bloc majority, he has proclaimed as a Christian from the platform of the House the necessity of reconciliation and friendship between France and Germany. Only a few days ago at a big banquet organized by the French League of Peace, where I had been called to speak as a representative of the Socialist pacifists, I heard the same Sangnier making a burning appeal against our imperialists, denouncing the mad Ruhr adventure, and proclaiming that much more courage was necessary in the world to-day to be a pacifist than a militarist.

But the case of Marc Sangnier is altogether quite exceptional among French Catholics, while there are hundreds of thousands of the nominal Catholics, who oppose the Socialist candidates or the advanced progressives at the general elections, but do so only in direct disobedience of the instructions given to them at each big national consultation by the Catholic hierarchy. As a matter of fact, out of the nominal thirty-six million Catholics who are supposed to exist in France certainly less than one-third follow the instructions of their Church or even practice their religion, with the exception of observance of the ceremonies at birth and death.

But my reader may ask, what about the French Protestant Church's attitude towards progressive thought and democratic movements? He must remember that because of the cruel persecution under the old monarchy and the practical suppression of Protestantism at the time of Louis XIV. Protestantism had been to a large degree totally removed from the soil of France with the few exceptions of some provinces in the south and of course Alsace, where it always remained an important factor representing one-third of the population. Altogether there are not more than eight hundred thousand Protestants out of some forty million inhabitants in France. Protestants have always been republican with very rare exceptions, but of a rather moderate and conservative type. There has been a little group of very progressive ministers and believers, some of them who had joined the Socialist party and had created some years ago a little monthly magazine, "L'Espoir du Monde" (The Hope of the World). The most distinguished French correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, Pastor Wilfred Monod, though not directly affiliated with this group, has frequently shown his sympathy with the more progressive elements in French politics. He uttered such thoughts in very noble words when that great Protestant Socialist, Francis de Pressense, was taken from us a few months before the war—when we most needed his magnificent knowledge of foreign politics and his most noble and courageous character! But altogether we must admit that the bulk of the French Protestant Church has been given during the last years to the most unfortunate nationalist and jingo current which has predominated among so many of the French bourgeois parties since the Great Catastrophe. When a few days ago the Archbishop and the Bishops of Protestant Sweden sent a most noble appeal to French Christianity against the cruel and wicked policy prosecuted in the Ruhr by Mr. Poincaré the Cardinal of Paris and the Protestant Federation of France answered with the same futile, unreasonable and partial arguments, without meeting in any degree the moving appeal of the Swedish Christians. You found in their answer the same spirit of blind hatred, the same narrow denunciations which you found in your daily press or in Mr. Poincaré's bombastic and soulless oratorical expansions.

So it is easy to understand why those who really want to follow the great principles of the "Sermon on the Mount"—which they do not find in the churches of France, but which I was so delighted to hear when I was invited to John Haynes Holmes' church, or when I listened with delight to Dr. Grant's magnificent oration in his Fifth Avenue Episcopal church—find no food for their heart and their soul in our churches as they are, believe more and more that they are practising real Christianity in working and fighting with the International Labor and Socialist movements.

The papers of the last fortnight seem to have been unusually full of talk about prohibition. The president of the Lions Club at their seventh annual convention at Atlantic City put things in a way that ought to appeal to decent citizens: "Straight Americanism is what Lionism stands for," he said, "and straight Americanism means law observance and law enforcement, whether one approves of the law or not. Now is the time, as never before, for organizations such as ours to steer a straight course for good citizenship."

The Church and the Labor Movement

By Rev. Edmund B. Chaffee

THERE has been a great deal of misunderstanding between labor and the Church. Not long ago a man arose in our forum and said, "To hell with the priests, to hell with the ministers, yes, and the rabbis concluded." Denunciations of this kind we hear often. Back in the days of high wages during the war a man was temporarily out of a job. He did not know just what to do until a friend said to him, "Why don't you go over and get a job in the shipping yards? You could get a job as a plumber." "But," said the man, "I don't know anything about plumbing." "Oh," said his friend, "that's not necessary, just go and find some pipes and hammer them." So the man went. He got the job. He crawled off in an unfrequented part of the ship and proceeded to hammer pipes. All went well for a couple of days. But on the third day after he had been at work a little time a man came and sat down beside him; he remained beside him for an hour or so till our hero got worried and making an excuse got away to another part of the ship where he sat down and proceeded to hammer pipes once more. In the afternoon, however, the stranger found him and again sat down beside him. Once more our friend eluded him, but about four o'clock the fellow again found him. He sat down saying, "I had hard work to find you." Our hero could stand it no longer; he was convinced his graft was over so he said, "Well, you've got me, you spy." His follower looked at him rather strangely and said, "Spy, what do you mean, spy? I'm your helper." There has been a lot of such misunderstanding on the part of Labor and the Church.

I wish to consider the relation of Labor and the Church from a somewhat theoretical point of view. We need to have our theories right if our practises are to be just. By the Church I mean Christianity as a whole, but more particularly the Protestant Church. By the Labor Movement, I mean the World Labor Movement, but more specifically the Labor Movement in the United States.

It seems to me fairly evident that the Church must be interested in the Labor Movement. Of the forty-six million Church members in the United States, both Catholics and Protestants, the majority of them, the vast majority of them, go to make up the forty-two million listed in our Federal Census as "Gainfully Employed." As the Labor Movement has to do with the economic well being of these church members they must be interested in it. Again as Christians these church members and the Church as an organization are committed to the ideal of the Kingdom of God, a social ideal. This means that Christians must be interested in every social movement. Then, too, it is simple, common sense for the Church to take cognizance of a movement which is seeking to change the very structure of civilization. The Church must be interested in the Labor Movement.

Just as the Church must be interested in the Labor Movement so I believe Labor must be interested in the Church. How can it hope to win the American people, a people the vast majority of whom are church members, unless it knows something of the aims, methods and spirit of the Church. Moreover as Shaw Desmond points out in his recent book, "Labor, the Giant with the Feet of Clay," Labor sorely needs idealism in its leaders and in the rank and file. In England there are not a few who are of and for Labor who fear that there is not enough honesty and unselfishness in the Labor Movement to promise any lasting social good. Just recently too in New York one of the clothing unions had an emergency store. They had some of their members at work in this store. This store was for the good of the cause and yet those in charge found that it was necessary to have an old-fashioned boss in order to get efficient work out of the men. Knowledge of these things has convinced many of us that Labor needs whatever moral idealism the Church has to give. Just as the Church must be interested in the Labor Movement so I believe the Labor Movement must be interested in the Church.

Now what has been the attitude of Labor to the Church? It is undeniable that in Russia the Labor Movement has been hostile. The property of the Church has been seized, priests have been insulted and murdered. Proclamations have been issued condemning religion as superstition. In many other parts of the European continent there has been a deep antagonism toward the Church and religion. Without doubt the thought of many of the so-called proletariat has been that of the famous anarchist Bakunin who said, "We must do away with the lies and the first of these is God." There is no doubt that continental labor has not been particularly friendly to organized religion. In England, however, the hostility has never been so pronounced. Multitudes have taken little active interest in institutional religion, but with few exceptions there has not been hatred of the Church. Indeed there was in the last century and there is to-day a group of idealists championing the cause of Labor in the name of Christian religion. Moreover in England a number of outstanding leaders of the Labor Movement have been ministers and churchmen of steadfast religious convictions.

In the United States the Labor Movement is relatively small; out of the forty-two million gainfully employed not more than six million or fifteen per cent. are in any kind of union. We must remember, however, that millions are engaged in agriculture and other occupations which are not readily organizable. I believe it is a fair statement to say that about twenty-five per cent. of those who are open to organization are organized. But, however, you may look at it the Labor Movement in the United States is comparatively small. We find that the attitude of Labor here is much the same as it is in England. There is hostility to the Church. There is a large amount of indifference. Then, too, it must be remembered that some of the strongest unions in our country are Jewish. The Church is often looked upon as the champion of things as they are. Its war record is criticized. Churches and preachers are considered as mere instruments and tools of the capitalist state.

What has been the attitude of the Church to the Labor Movement? Turning to Europe again, we find that it has generally been one of hostility. The Russian Church was the buttress of the Czar's government. The priests were often spies. In the Central Empires there was enmity because the Church looked upon the Labor Movement as atheistic and agnostic. In France the leaders of the movement have not generally been good Catholics. In England the Church, as a whole, has been inclined to tell the workers to be content with the estate in which God has placed them. In our own land the Church has been conservative, sometimes reactionary. More often, however, it has been indifferent.

It has had little to say one way or the other. When it has spoken it has generally condemned the Labor Movement as unchristian. Socialists, anarchists, labor agitators have all been lumped together in many a pulpit as exemplifying the spirit of the anti-Christ. Certainly as a whole the Protestant Church has not desired to make contacts with the Labor Movement.

As the Labor Movement viewed the Church with hostility and indifference so the Church viewed the Labor Movement. Then about fifteen years ago a change set in. Rauschenbusch wrote his great book, "Christianity and the Social Crisis," in which he raised very fundamental questions concerning the ethics of Jesus and our modern industrial system. Other writers followed him. In all Protestant countries voices began to be raised protesting against a civilization that could exhibit millions living in poverty on one hand and millionaires and billionaires on the other. The doctrine of the Kingdom of God as a social ideal to be realized upon this earth was proclaimed anew. Ministers began to lose their pulpits because of their championing the rights of the working classes. The vital questions of the Church ceased to be theological; they became economic. Doubts of the Virgin Birth did not matter nearly as much as doubts about the sanctity of private property. Possibly an illustration will make more clear what I mean. If I were to take the Bible and throw it down and stamp on it before your eyes you would not like it, there might be some hisses, but I would be in no serious danger. But if I were to take our American flag and walk on it there would be hisses, and it is quite probable I would be in danger of physical violence. Certainly I would be in danger of arrest and prosecution. This means that the State and what it stands for property rights and all the rest are really more vital even to the men and women of the Church than their Christian faith. That would it not mean if we would give the same loyalty to Jesus Christ that we give to our country. But, as I have said, the attitude of the Church to-day toward Labor is not what it was fifteen or twenty years ago.

I think it fair to say that there are now four main groups in the Church. First, there is an ever growing group which is friendly to Labor and is actively helping it whenever it can. There is, of course, a second group, many of its members men of influence, of great wealth and power, which is hostile to Labor and determined to war upon any of the Church who espouse Labor's cause. There is also a third group, who has no interest one way or another. Like the Ephesian Christians who had not so much as heard that there was a Holy Ghost, this group in the Church does not yet know that there is a Labor problem. Then last of all there is a fourth group, possibly the largest of all the groups, which is perplexed and troubled about the whole matter. The members of this group perceive that the economic question is the great question of our time, but they are not clear as to what the Church can or ought to do. In many ways this group is the hope of the Church.

So far I have been trying to point out what has been the attitude of the Church to Labor and Labor to the Church. Before we can ask what the attitude of each to the other should be we must see something of the aims and purposes of each. What are the principles of the Church? I take it that the principles of the Church are to be found in the teachings of the Founder of the Church, Jesus, himself. The Church of Jesus Christ must be committed to His program or else it is not the Church of Jesus Christ. I believe we would all agree that Jesus taught four great doctrines. The first was the fatherhood of God. The second was the sacredness of personality. Human beings were of infinite value just because they were human beings. The third great principle laid down by Jesus was that brotherhood is the primary human relation. Love is the uniting bond and I take it that when Jesus talked about love he meant not something vague, watery and sentimental, but he meant an active desire that others should have the same abundance of life which we crave for ourselves. I think He would want to emphasize that our love must be something active not a mere pious attitude. Then the fourth great doctrine of Jesus, probably in His thought it was the first, the Kingdom of God, the reign of God in human society. The Fatherhood of God, the sacredness of personality, brotherhood of love, the Kingdom of God. These are the principles of the Church.

What are the aims of Labor? There are, I think, five main aims although I freely admit that other aims may be enumerated. The first of these is the securing of higher wages. The second the securing of shorter hours. In the third place Labor seeks to abolish unemployment and in the fourth place it seeks to secure recognition of the union. The fifth aim is that of the control of industry by those who work in it.

What now in the light of the principles of the Church should be the attitude toward Labor? In regard to the first aim, that of higher wages it seems to me that the Church, believing in the sacredness of human beings, must be interested in securing for all men everywhere, a living wage. Only thus, can our God-given personalities be developed. The living wage must be for the Church something more than, "a mellifluous phrase" as it was called by the United States Labor Board. In the second place, the Church must, I believe, favor shorter hours for Labor. The deadening effect of machine production so dwarfs personality that we must shorten the hours as much as is economically possible. A man working in a motor car company had as his task the making of a certain nut, numbered 822. He made thousands of these a day. Finally he gave up his job and went to one which paid him less. A friend asked him why? He said, "I was afraid if I had kept on with that work I would have turned into Nut Number 822. Our factory civilization tends to crush human personality. Some relief from this is to be found in shorter hours, therefore the Church should be with Labor in standing for shorter hours.

Again the Church must resolutely stand against unemployment because the unemployed rapidly become demoralized. Their character deteriorates. The Church should, I believe, stand with Labor in working against unemployment. As to the aim of Labor, the recognition of the union; this, I believe, the Church should also favor because it is only through the recognition of the union and collective bargaining that the other aims of Labor seem possible of achievement. As to the control of industry by those who work in it; this, I think, would be valuable in developing personality, it would be an offset to the deadening effect of machines and that reason should be viewed sympathetically by the Church. However, just what should be this form of control, how it should be worked out is a matter to be settled by the technicians, the engineers qualified to speak. The Church must insist that the spirit of men be brotherly for without such a spirit we should in vain change our system of production and distribution.

In all this struggle on the part of Labor for the realization of its aims the Church, I believe, must be deeply sympathetic and must help wherever it can. However, it must be pointed out that the Church if it be true to Jesus must oppose violent methods. It is a great regret to many of us that the Church by its attitude during the war, an attitude of toleration and sometimes glorification of war, has nearly forfeited its right to tell the laboring men not to use violence. We as churchmen ought to make clear that we oppose violence on the part of the rich and powerful, on the part of militarists and war lords just as much as we oppose it on the part of the industrial workers. If we are going to preach pacifism to the workers we must preach pacifism to the employers. Indeed to be consistent we must preach that international war is unholy and contrary to the mind of Christ.

So far I have tried to point out what has been the attitude of the Church to Labor and Labor to the Church. I have also tried to show how this attitude has been changed during the last few years. And along with all this I have tried to show the harmony of the aims of Labor with the aims of the Church. All this is true and yet we know there is an immense amount of suspicion and distrust upon both sides. What is the Church doing to help Labor? What is it doing to remove its justifiable hostility and suspicion?

The Church published the Steel Strike Report and it has stood behind it. As far as I can see in spite of the criticism of Mr. Olds and others Bishop McConnell and his associates have stood their ground. There has been no oozing away of their courage. We are proud of what they have done, and I know Labor as a whole has admired their action.

In the second place there is the work of the Federal Council of Churches. This Council has adopted and circulated "The Social Creed of the Churches." It has published timely bulletins on the wage question and the coal question and on other matters. At its last annual meeting as is stated in the report of that meeting: "There was an unshaken conviction of the obligation of the Church to deal positively with the great social issues of the present day and to test all existing social and economic arrangements by the principles of the Christian gospel. No area of life was allowed to be thought of outside of the Kingdom of God." Moreover, the attitude of the Council in regard to political prisoners has been definite and courageous. Indeed Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, a well known leader among the industrial workers, recently said at our Labor Temple Forum: "The Church has done more for the release of political prisoners than Labor has done."

Again may I call your attention to the work of the Y. W. C. A. It has had the courage to adopt a forward looking social creed. It dared to stand for that creed in Pittsburgh. It was attacked for its position and its campaign for funds in Pittsburgh imperilled. Yet it went on. And to the glory of God and the Church the ministers of Pittsburgh stood behind the Y. W. C. A. Moreover in its industrial and student conferences the Y. W. C. A. is putting on a program calculated to make the young women think of the connection between Christianity and the problems of our industrial order. It is an inspiration to talk on these subjects with the leaders of the Y. W. C. A.

Then we must mention the Y. M. C. A. This organization has been accused of being merely an arm of big business, but it seems to me in the last year or two it also is waking up to the industrial issue. Some of the leaders such as Sherwood Eddy have really experienced a conversion. They have come to see that a Christianity which has merely a message of personal religion is not at grips with life to-day. A series of pamphlets is now being published on the application of Christianity to our economic and social problems.

Many of us have felt too that there has been a great awakening in regard to Labor among the theological students of the country and among the men who are actively engaged in the Christian ministry. Those of us who are concerned about the arousing of the Christian conscience in regard to our economic and social system are not as lonesome as we were five years ago.

In outlining what the Church is attempting to do to meet the situation, I want to say a word in regard to the work being done by the Presbyterian Church at Labor Temple, Fourteenth Street and Second Avenue, New York City. This institution, which it is my privilege to serve, was organized about fifteen years ago for the distinct purpose of interpreting the Church and the message of Jesus to the industrial workers. Here on this busy corner, where tens of thousands of workers pass every day old methods and new methods, conservative methods and radical methods were freely tried. Experience soon taught that it was possible to reach these masses on the lower East Side through five different ways.

The first was through settlement work that is through friendly visiting, playgrounds, gymnasium, employment bureau, club and classes we tried to show love in action. Our second method has been the forum. By listening to what the industrial workers have had to say they, in turn, have been willing to listen to us. We have learned from each other. For let me make it clear they have much to teach us, possibly more than we have to teach them. I feel that our forum has been most vital for we have established the reputation of standing for the right of free expression on religious, economic and social subjects. Even in time of war and the reaction following it we have maintained this right. I might say that the forum has provided sufficient amusement to keep us all in good spirits. Some weeks ago a speaker was expounding the point of view of the Committee of Forty-Eight. A boy in the audience (he looked to be fifteen or, at the most, sixteen years of age), obtained the floor and said: "What we need is the twenty-one demands of the Third International. We have had enough of this shallow liberalism, enough of this watery socialism. Let's forget this socialism idea. That took me in too, when I was younger."

Along with our settlement and our forum we have our Labor Temple School. We are trying to do our share in this great movement known as "Workers' Education." We are not trying to make men vocationally better fitted, but we are trying to give them culture, acquaintance with the best that has been known and thought in the world. We have courses in economics, philosophy, psychology, literature, the drama, etc. These people, these workers many of them "ignorant foreigners" come in large numbers to these classes. They are interested more in fundamental subjects than the vast majority of our old-time Americans. Some months ago we had a debate on "The Relative Merits of Plato's Republic and Aristotle's Relatively Best State." We had it on a rainy Saturday night and charged twenty-five cents admission. Over two hundred of these "ignorant foreigners" came to hear it. I doubt if as many would have come to such an event in any of our universities.

We have also built up some very vital contacts by giving Labor organizations the hospitality of our buildings. We have allowed them to hold regular, special and even strike meetings on our premises. This has given thousands of men a different conception of the Church. It is rather a tragedy they find it so difficult to understand that a Church could be sympathetic to them. Just now the dress and waist makers are making use of our building.

Although it was not the original plan of the founders of Labor Temple, there has nevertheless, been built up a duly constituted Presbyterian Church. We call it the American International Church not because it is connected with "The Moscow International" as one wealthy church woman once thought, but because we have people of various races and nationalities in it. Along with this we have a Sunday-school of some seven hundred boys and girls whom we are trying to teach the A B C's of personal and social morality.

Thus through our settlement work, our forum, our Labor

Venezuela

THE United States of Venezuela is one of the most sparsely settled countries of Latin America. With a total population of 2,411,952, according to the official census of the republic for 1920, it has but 6.1 inhabitants per square mile. The natural resources are great and the country could easily sustain a dense population in comparative comfort; but its inaccessibility, the wildness of the interior, the frequent political upheavals, and the difficulties of communication have kept out immigration and the conditions of life in this republic, outside of a few cities and towns, are still exceedingly primitive.

In 1919 there were 12,433 immigrants and 12,879 emigrants, a loss of 446 for the year. The total increase in population for the same year was 20,590, or less than one per cent.

The annual death rate in some of the cities and towns is very high, ranging from 39.3 in Caracas, 41.5 in Maracaibo, 47.6 in Puerto Cabello, to 137.7 in Carupano per thousand. This last figure must be one of the highest in the world, but is vouched for by the Commercial Handbook issued by the United States Government in 1922.

The population of the republic in 1918, according to the official census, was 2,844,618. In 1920 it had fallen to 2,411,952. This somewhat disconcerting loss may be real, but is more probably due to faulty statistics. In the same period the number of Indians increased from 325,000 to 500,000—an increase which would seem to indicate that statistics in Venezuela are largely a matter of guess work. In 1912, of the total births reported to the Civil Register, 23,937 were legitimate and 51,955 illegitimate. This does not represent the real percentage of illegitimacy, since the greater number of births are not reported, especially from the small towns and country districts. No definite figure can be given on the point, but a recent Papal delegate was quoted as having put the number of illegitimates in the country at eighty-four per cent. of the population.

Of the 75,312 mothers in 1912, 51,580 are classified as unmarried and 310 as widows. Of the 24,264 fathers, 486 were unmarried, 23,732 married, and forty-six were widowers. Of 68,849 mothers in another year for which we found statistics, only 16,356 could read and write, and 58,362 of the fathers were illiterate. Only 21,510 of these mothers were married women, and of this number 331 were widows.

Since 1908 the virtual ruler of Venezuela has been General Juan Vicente Gomez, and although he is entitled "Constitutional President," he is, in fact, a dictator and rules as such. His government maintains a strict control over the press and a rigid censorship is enforced. As a consequence of these methods political parties have been practically done away with, or there remains but one—that which favors the present government. One of the prominent men of Caracas once said to the writer: "There is no opposition to the government in Venezuela. All those who might form an opposing party are in one of three places: the cemetery, the military prison or a foreign country."

With the Spanish explorers and conquerors of the sixteenth century came the representatives of the Church of Rome, and right well did they do their part in the subjugation of the Indian tribes and in abetting the endeavors of the King of Spain to maintain his bloody rule in these hard-won lands. The Church was practically supreme in Venezuela, and was the court of last appeal in all matters of state until the coming into power of General Guzman Blanco. In 1873 this dictator expelled the Jesuits and the monks and nuns who had established themselves in the country and confiscated their property.

One of the vacated church buildings, a magnificent edifice now again occupied by the Catholics, was offered to the Protestants of the city, but there was then no organization to accept the offer, which was afterward withdrawn. All parish schools were ordered abolished, civil marriage was instituted, the cemeteries were opened to the dead of all faiths, and priests were deprived of their power as well as their fees.

In 1876 the papal nuncio and the archbishop were expelled, because the latter had refused to order a Te Deum sung in the Cathedral in honor of some of the dictator's victories. It was on this occasion that General Guzman Blanco sent his famous message to the Congress, which not only produced the local effect he desired, but also awakened the minds of public men in other South American lands to the possibility of freeing the state from the incubus of a medieval ecclesiasticism which was always at war with their ambitions for liberty and sought its own aggrandizement.

The message ran as follows and was, of course, equivalent to a demand, which the Congress was quick to grant:

"I have taken upon myself the responsibility of declaring the Church of Venezuela independent of the Roman Episcopate, and ask that you further order that parish priests be elected by the people, the bishops by the rectors of the parishes, and the archbishop by Congress, thus returning to the uses of the primitive Church which was founded by Jesus Christ and His apostles.

"Such a law will not only solve the eternal question, but will be, besides, a grand example for the Christian Church of republican America, hindered in her march toward liberty, order and progress by the policy, always retrograde, of the Roman Church, and the civilized world will see in this act the most characteristic and palpable sign of advance in the regeneration of Venezuela."

It is needless to say that an affirmative reply from the Congress was immediately sent to the dictator and, as representing the mode of procedure under such conditions, merits reproduction. It was as follows:

"Faithful to our duties, faithful to our convictions, and faithful to the holy dogmas of the religion of Jesus Christ—of the Great Being who conserved the world's freedom with His blood—we do not hesitate to emancipate the Church of Venezuela from that Episcopacy which pretends, as an infallible and omnipotent power, to absorb from Rome the vitality of a free people, the beliefs of our conscience, and the noble aspirations and destinies which pertain to us as component parts of the great human family."

Although shorn of its political power by Guzman Blanco, true to its history, the Church has patiently waited its opportunity and has at length succeeded in winning back many of the prerogatives it formerly had. But it has not regained its spiritual power and life. One of the thinking men whom we met said: "The Church has no power in Venezuela, neither political, moral or spiritual. It is degenerate, and we have no use for it and no confidence in it. We have no religion."

At the same time it continues to receive a subsidy from the government as the State Church—as some one explained, in order that it may be kept under the government—and the people are held in ignorance of the Bible and its teachings. The Virgin is exalted in an unusual degree and takes precedence over the Son in the images and paintings of the churches. One great painting in one of the churches represents her as being crowned by the Father and the Son. A white dove is suspended above her head as she sits on her throne; the Father on her right and the Son on her left, all in life-size figures, are in the act of placing a crown on her head, while angels look on in rapt adoration and acclaim her the "Queen of Heaven." This painting, because of a reference made to it by Dr. Pond in a sermon, has now been enclosed in such a way that only those who are known to be faithful Catholics may see it.

Another that represented her in the attire and attitude of a French ballet dancer has also been removed and for the same reason. But such teaching has had its effect on the people of Venezuela, whose thinking men and women reject the only form of Christianity they have ever known.

It was in the midst of a society that was thoroughly inimical to the Church of Rome, yet by force of tradition and teaching unfriendly to and exceedingly suspicious of Protestantism, that the foundations of evangelical work were laid in Venezuela.

The American Bible Society seems to have been the first organization to reach the field. Some time in the early eighties Bishop Patterson, of the Southern Methodist Church, was sent out to establish this society in Caracas, but soon died of the yellow fever. A Mr. Norwood took up his work and about the same time some of the Christian Brethren of England entered the field. A few independents were also preaching, but their work has disappeared.

The first organized mission board of the United States to send its representatives to Venezuela was that of the Presbyterian Board. Representing this board, the Rev. Theodore S. Pond and Mrs. Pond were, in 1897, transferred from the Colombia Mission to open a tentative work in Caracas. Many years of missionary experience in Mesopotamia and Syria, as well as five years in Colombia, where they had learned the Spanish language, were a valuable equipment for the opening of work in this new field. They found the country unoccupied by any mission, though evangelical services were held by an agent of the American Bible Society, while for two months Signor Ferrando, formerly a Capuchin monk, had held Bible classes in his own house. The scattered members of a disbanded church organization, once under the Methodist Board (South), warmly welcomed the new missionaries who immediately began work and laid foundations deep and broad on which it should be possible to build a strong evangelical church in the United States of Venezuela. With that culture without which no one may expect to reach the heart or gain the respect of the Latin American, they made a large place for themselves in the capital city and were instrumental in securing reforms and influencing the life of the city to a degree which few outside the mission even suspected. Dr. and Mrs. Pond retired from the field in 1921, and Mrs. Pond soon after went to her reward. Dr. Pond still lives in the United States and maintains his deep interest in the work of the mission.

Although Venezuela was practically unoccupied by evangelical forces when the representatives of Presbyterianism entered in 1897, other bodies of Christian workers have since entered from time to time, until there are now fourteen organizations in all at work in the republic, in addition to a number of independent workers who have gathered small groups about them. The following statistics, compiled by our missionaries, will show the extent to which the country has been occupied and the number of workers:

In all the republic there are ninety-three foreign missionaries, with fifty national workers who give their full time. A number of nationals also give part time, but are not included in the statistics above. Of the twenty-three States which form the United States of Venezuela twelve have been occupied by both foreigners and nationals, and the latter are at work in two others. In the twenty-two organized churches there are 775 communicant members, of which total 125 were added in the year 1922. In all the country there is an average of 25,437 inhabitants for every Protestant worker. Six cities of over ten thousand, eleven of five thousand to ten thousand, and one hundred of one thousand to five thousand are as yet unoccupied, and it is estimated that a million people live in the unoccupied territory, and that two million in all are without the privileges of the gospel.

The twenty-four Sunday-schools have a membership of 864 pupils, and there are five societies for young people with a membership of two hundred. The sixteen schools enroll 329 pupils. The work done in these schools is elementary, in the most part, and but one has a boarding department.

In Caracas, the capital of the republic, there are nineteen foreign workers, thirteen of whom are engaged in evangelistic work, five in schools and one in industrial work. In the same city there are twenty-one national workers, twenty preaching points, six organized churches with 301 members, five church buildings, six Sunday-schools with 381 scholars and five schools with eighty-six pupils.

There are five evangelical periodicals published in Venezuela by four of the organizations at work, only one of which has a paid subscription list and a wide circulation. In all the republic but two centers are occupied by more than one mission, which fact shows a commendable distribution of the forces. The principal organizations have an understanding that they will not occupy the small towns, nor the same general territory, which insures a freedom from overlapping in the future.

During our stay in Caracas a Conference on Christian Work, organized by the Regional Committee on Co-operation, was held and was attended by representatives of six different organizations, who came to the capital, in some cases; for this purpose. Two were obliged to make long journeys by sea, one from Maracaibo and the other from the Orinoco River Mission, which has its headquarters in Carupano—and others from points in the interior by train or on mule back.

This was the first gathering of the kind ever held in Venezuela and in the opinion of the missionaries will mean much for their future work, since this coming to know each other will make it less difficult to work together without friction and misrepresentation of motives.

At the close of the two days' session of the Conference a strong Regional Committee, with its proper officers, was organized and this group will now carry on in the work of leading the forces of co-operation. For the first time, it may be said, the Christian workers in Venezuela have come to realize that they have a common mission, a common responsibility, a common opportunity and a common Lord.

John Mark

ACTS 12:12, 25; 13:13; 15:36-40; COL. 4:10.

"Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is useful to me for ministering."—2 Tim. 4:11.

"FOR he is useful to me for ministering." "These words," says Professor Swete, "assign to Mark his precise place in the history of the apostolic age." He is associated with three great leaders—Barnabas, Paul and Peter—and always in a subordinate position. He is useful for ministering" to each of them in turn.

The nine references to Mark in the Acts and Epistles reveal him as "a person with a large capacity for being useful in practical matters, but with no special spiritual gifts, and probably with no great force of character." Mark was just an average business man, with energy, common sense and good judgment. But he became much more than an average man. Few men of the apostolic age were more honored of God, and as the author of one of the Gospels his name will ever be held in grateful and fragrant remembrance. Paul counts him among those who have been a "comfort" to him. He cheered his heart by his devotion. A study of Mark is, then, a study of the ministry of an average man who became one of the world's great benefactors.

The world is full of just such men who have not yet found Mark's secret of growth. They are often idle in Christ's kingdom because they know they are not fitted for spiritual leadership. They are content to do little more than give money for the advance of the Kingdom. But it is Mark who reminds us that the Master has given "to each one his work," to the man of practical business ability as well as to the man of more obvious piety. How did this average man find his work and develop a character of such power and influence?

His name is first mentioned in the narrative of the Acts in connection with the release of Peter from prison. He was then a young man, a member of the First Church of Jerusalem, whose mother's house was the meeting-place of the disciples. She was apparently a widow, as her husband is not mentioned, and a woman of prominence and influence. Peter went to her house on his release, as a matter of course. This seems to have been his home when in Jerusalem, and Mark and his mother may have been converted through his ministry. In 1 Peter, Mark is called "my son." The family were Hebrews of the Hebrews (Col. 4:11), and Mark may have been a Levite, like his cousin Barnabas.

An early tradition places the Last Supper and the scenes of Pentecost in the house of Mark's father, then still alive, and identifies him with the man "bearing a pitcher of water" who met the disciples and showed them the way. If this were the case, we can also credit the tradition which identifies Mark with the young man with the linen cloth thrown about him, who escaped from the captors of Jesus (Mark 14:51, 52). Finding the Master gone, he led them to Bethsemane, where Jesus often went. Mark, aroused from sleep by the coming of the soldiers, snatched up a loose tunic and followed the guards, in their hunt for Jesus, to Gethsemane. The servants of the high priest attempted to seize him, but he twisted out of their grasp, leaving the tunic in their hands. Mark alone records this incident, and this would explain why it is included in his narrative.

In the year 45-46 A. D., Barnabas and Saul came to Jerusalem and when they returned to Antioch they took Mark with them. Up to this time the new faith had not gone beyond Antioch, and although Grecian Jews were among the converts, there were no Gentile disciples. But now came the summons to a wider ministry, to which Barnabas and Saul were solemnly set apart. The scope of the work was undefined. Mark accompanied them to Cyprus as their "attendant." His work seems to have been that of a business manager, arranging for lodgings and conveyances and other details of travel, leaving the apostles free to preach and to teach. At Salamis the work was with Jews, but at Paphos the Roman governor became a disciple, the first of Paul's Gentile converts. Then the three crossed to the mainland at Perga. Here Mark left the others and returned to Jerusalem, while they pressed on across the Taurus to Antioch in Pisidia and other cities in the Province of Galatia. No reason is given for Mark's departure. But Paul felt that it was a desertion and refused later to take Mark with him. Whatever the reason was, it seemed ultimately to have satisfied Paul, although at first he was indignant, and he received Mark again into his confidence and affection.

Three or four years pass before we meet Mark again. The controversy about Gentiles had been settled by the council at Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas were at Antioch. Peter visited them there and at first entered into full fellowship with the Gentile believers. But later, when certain strict Jews came down from Jerusalem, he withdrew from that fellowship and would no longer eat with Gentiles, as Paul tells us in the Epistle to the Galatians. Others followed his example, including Barnabas himself. Paul publicly rebuked Peter, and by implication Barnabas and the rest of the Jewish Christians. Apparently Mark was at Antioch at this time, and naturally sided with Barnabas. When, therefore, Barnabas proposed to take Mark with them, as he and Paul were starting to revisit the churches they had founded, Paul indignantly refused to have Mark along. The result was a "sharp contention" between the apostles, and Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus again, while Paul chose Silas as a companion and made the round of the Syrian and Cilician churches.

There is an interval of ten years before we find Mark mentioned again in the New Testament, in Paul's letters to the Colossians and to Philemon. Paul has forgotten his irritation. Mark has evidently also outgrown his Jewish prejudices, for Paul commends him cordially to Gentile Christians as a "fellow-worker."

Three or four years later Paul asks Timothy to "pick up" Mark on his way from Ephesus and bring him to Rome,

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

Where Does the Higher Criticism Fail?*

THIS book is strangely compounded of the salt of common sense and the vinegar of sourness. Setting out to be a "critique of the destructive critics," it appears to define the destructive critics as those who go beyond a point arbitrarily chosen by the author himself. Only against a certain few of the higher critics does Mr. Fitchett bring a real charge, i.e., that of making themselves self-appointed dictators of Biblical interpretation. Thus the very title of the book is misleading. Mean and conceited men fail in the spiritual sense in whatever life-work they engage, but this is not an indictment of their life-work. So higher criticism has its limits. The Bible is much more than an assemblage of literary forms to be dissected, analyzed and compared. Differences of style do not inevitably indicate variety of authorship. And Mr. Fitchett evidently enjoys himself while setting forth these and other rather obvious facts. But to describe the obvious limitations of any special investigation is hardly to bring a charge against the whole special investigation.

The truth is that there are people to whom the phrase "higher criticism" (which it must be confessed is an unfortunate phrase) is like a red rag to a bull. Doubtless such will make merry over this book. But it is just as well to note that Mr. Fitchett himself is a confessed higher critic in accepting the methods of Bishop Gore, although he draws the line sharply this side of Dr. Preserved Smith.

The whole procedure of the book, inexorably considered, comes down to this: You may be a higher critic, but only the kind of higher critic which meets with Mr. Fitchett's approval.

The question thus is one of where to draw the line; and as we go further and consider the contents of the book in detail we believe it will appear that sometimes Mr. Fitchett shows strong common sense and again exhibits the veriest nonsense in drawing that line.

The book is divided into four parts, the first dealing with "The Position of the Higher Criticism." Here Mr. Fitchett quotes with great approval Bishop Gore's statement: "This subject (the higher criticism) is not only a matter for specialized experts or professional scholars. The discussion has been left in the past too much to them. Religion, after all, is for common men. It is in the region of the common reason, at least as much as in the circles of specialized study, that it must be judged. This is, most noticeably, the assumption of the New Testament. It appeals to the common judgment; it summons each man to judge for himself. 'Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?' 'Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.' These words of our Lord and of St. Paul are a challenge to common men."

Of course, this is the exact position of the modern Christian, and it implies a rebuke to only a small handful of men who reserve Biblical questions for "scholars" (usually themselves).

From this point the book goes on to launch a violent attack on Prof. Preserved Smith for his article on "A New Light on the Relations of Peter and Paul." At the end of this section the author refers to Professor Peake and H. D. Major as among the saner critics of to-day who would in no sense be responsible for such "nonsense" (p. 33). But on pages 168-9 the author quotes from Peake's commentary and from H. D. A. Major as opposing Christ's expressions declarations concerning Himself.

The next section of the book deals with the Bible and attacks the higher critics, notably in the person of Principal Griffith-Jones, for trying to walk in two opposite directions at the same moment of time, because they do not take the Bible alone as the source of religious authority. But Mr. Fitchett himself fails to do the very thing he recommends. For example, in dealing with Psalm 23 he says (p. 67); "The one question worth asking about the psalm is, Does that hidden and divine promise in it hold good? Is its story repeated and verified in human experience without failure from generation to generation?" If that is not appealing to religious experience as the final authority for the Bible, we don't know what is. The chapter, "How the Pentateuch Has Suffered," undoubtedly thrusts a sharp elbow into the ribs of certain humorless higher critics, and well repays reading.

The third section of the book deals with miracles and contains both an attack on the "prejudice of criticism" against miracles and the declaration that "the whole drift of modern thought to-day . . . is moving in the direction of miracles." This section begins with a quotation from Butler's "Analogy": "If it can be shown that the proof alleged of all these (Christ's miracles) is absolutely none at all, then is revelation overturned." But Mr. Fitchett has a curious idea of miracle: "Could 'the laws of Nature,' if left to themselves, produce a watch or run a train? The theory that miracles are impossible assumes that God has less power over His own laws than man, His creature, has."

On the much discussed question of the virgin birth the author declares that those who decline to affirm it are faced with "an unchaste woman, who was with child before she was a wife; and Jesus Christ, on this reading, came into our world through the gate of lust—a horrible suggestion!" It is difficult to understand such a jumble of prejudice and ignorance.

And then after this extraordinary utterance, less than ten pages later, the author declares: "All the miracles which mark the ministry of Jesus Christ during His earthly ministry, in a sense, are trivial compared with the miracles which, through twenty centuries, have followed His death and resurrection, of which the first result was the creation of a Church composed of the disciples who had forsaken and denied Him, and of a crowd of three thousand converted Jews who had mocked Him on the cross. This is the miracle of miracles!"

In the final section, "Christ and the Critics," there are a number of fine declarations: "We are all liable to see truth in patches only and to see it out of perspective, and it may be added that the patch of truth we do see and delight to keep where his ministry would be very grateful to the imprisoned apostle.

The last reference to Mark in the New Testament is in the greetings in the first Epistle of Peter, where the writer calls him "Marcus, my son."

The traditions which associate Mark with Alexandria and martyrdom there are without historic foundation.

As we follow this career, certain qualities of character appear. We notice first that Mark was naturally a conservative, tenacious of inherited traditions and policies, and yet open-minded and not impervious to new truth. He was slow to change, but he did heartily adopt more liberal and progressive views. This is always a mark of greatness and the indispensable condition of growth. Well for us if we too are open-minded and obedient to the truth as it is convincingly revealed. Another strong point of Mark's character was his fidelity. He served three men in intimate relations—Barnabas, Paul and Peter. They all loved and trusted him. He served them in turn with equal fidelity.

And such a man inevitably grows and develops. Mark finds his place, step after step, from one stage of development to another, because of his fidelity in each successive position.

The universal tradition of the early church connects the Gospel of Mark with the preaching of Peter. The historian Eusebius, in the third century, quotes Papias, who lived early in the second century, who in turn quotes "John the elder" as follows: "Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down what he remembered, accurately though not in order, of the things said and done by Christ." The evidence of the Gospel itself corroborates the tradition. The book and the man fit each other.

As we read the Gospel with the tradition in mind, we seem to hear Peter speaking. The vivid realism, the picturesque details, belong to the story of an eye-witness. This is a business man's Gospel, brief, direct, simple, straightforward. It is concerned more with the deeds than with the words of the Master. It is the Gospel of action, presenting the public ministry of our Lord in rapid, energetic narrative, seldom interrupted by reflections or comments. But the brief comments which Mark occasionally makes are illuminating. For example, both Matthew and Mark record our Saviour's discourse about the things which defile a man (Matt. 15:1-20; Mark 7:1-23). But Mark alone makes the comment, "making all meats clean." A startling declaration indeed to a Jew!

Many an average man since the days of John whose surname was Mark has followed in his train, and by fidelity and obedience to the leading of the Spirit of God has grown into a career of great usefulness. One naturally thinks of Dwight L. Moody. In his early days no one would have called him anything more than an average man. But his native powers developed through service until he became the greatest evangelist of modern times.

only slavishness of spirit that can betray their souls. . . .

G. J. Bourq, also a ten-year man, writes: ". . . . When I put my name to that Open Letter sent by all of us to President Harding I meant it; and I still mean every word of it. I refuse to accept a life-time parole, and most certainly I would not accept release at the expense of the Sacramento boys who are just as innocent of wrong-doing as I am. . . . Liberty is as sweet to me as to any man on earth, but it is not sweet enough to purchase at the price of principle and self-respect. . . ."

From a long letter from Harry Lloyd I want to quote at least a sentence or two: "I have done nothing that I am ashamed of, and I will recant nothing. . . . Commutation for deportees includes admission of 'moral turpitude.' . . . I refuse to even imply that such work as I have conscientiously done for human betterment in the past was done in mental or moral delinquency. . . . I hold that a man who would so betray all his past life cuts himself off from future usefulness, for how can the promise, the loyalty, the word of such a man ever again be relied on? . . ."

And Bert Lorton: ". . . . I have had as tough a time here as any man in here, and this is the second opportunity I have had to get out from under the principles I believe in, but you can be very sure that I'm never going to crawl out with strings tied to me, and most certainly not on the backs of innocent men. . . ."

I would like to close with a quotation from Mortimer Downing, a man of over sixty years, one of the Sacramento group so stoutly defended by all these others:

". . . . Probably few on the outside can estimate what a simple and earnest deed it was for these men to choose imprisonment rather than liberty; and in one case it means the serving of a twenty-year sentence" (James Rowan). "The essential principle of our whole industrial movement is solidarity. The world has outgrown individualism and all its train of violence and inhumanity. We call ourselves Industrial Workers of the World to emphasize just this basic fact of essential human brotherhood. . . . We can surrender nothing of the principle for which we stand. We are sentries on guard; our stations are fixed until such time as we may be honorably relieved of our responsibility. . . . Never before has material power been so clearly arraigned against the power of the human spirit. How can any honest soul palter with such issues as these? Or cringe or compromise before their challenge? . . .

I feel we cannot, for our own sakes, afford to ignore such straightforwardness and courage as these letters evidence, in this day when courage and straightforwardness are so tragically needed in every relation of life.

And I am constrained to recall, in closing this sequence of quotations, "Greater love hath no man than this—that he lay down his life for his friends." Whether or not we may agree with these men in other matters, we can at least make an effort to understand their own point of view, the motives that actuate them, the complete selflessness of their attitude, and remember that "Inasmuch as ye have done this unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

in sight is often determined not by its intrinsic importance but by our individual preference for it." And again: "The 'biography' of Christ takes in the two thousand years of Christian history; and what kind of events make up this, the true record of Jesus of Nazareth? Every spiritual victory won in the lives of men and women since Christ died on the cross is part of his biography."

But mingled with such fine declarations is an occasional plea for obscurantism and an apparently deliberate failure to perceive that higher criticism is not an attempt to set up the authority of men against that of Christ, but simply to make plain amid the confusions of history the true figure of Christ. Mr. Fitchett accepts the kenosis theory of the incarnation, but he will not permit it to be said that the kenosis in any way affected the person of Christ after he began his ministry.

The book closes with a clear insistence on the fact that it is God who is seeking us, and that it is not the clever brain but the loving heart which best understands God.

Mr. Fitchett has written a book with some needed warnings and some unnecessary folly in it. It will be suggestive to those who are trying to understand and meet the issue before the Church to-day.

We regret that fear seems to have had a greater part in its writing than confidence.

When will men learn to distinguish between a method of study and its results? The proper title for this book is not "Where the Higher Criticism Fails," but "Where I Disagree with the Conclusions of Certain of the Higher Critics."

Temple School our contacts with labor organizations and our church we are seeking to get across to the industrial workers the great fact that men's attitude must be changed from hate and greed to love and unselfishness before we can have that better world for which the idealists in the Labor movement are longing.

We sit in the interpreter's house seeking to interpret the Church to Labor and Labor to the Church.

Labor needs the Church for man does not live by bread alone, and every problem is at bottom a spiritual problem. The Church needs Labor. It needs its courage, its contact with reality, its insight into the evils of our civilization. We need to understand each other better. If we could get more of Labor's radicalism into the Church and more of Christianity into labor we should all be better off. Let us strive to Christianize radicalism and radicalize Christianity.

A NATIONAL METHODIST PRESS SERVICE

On October 1 the Methodist Episcopal Church will inaugurate a National Methodist Press Service at Washington, D. C., with Dr. Harry E. Woolever as editor and director. The Service was authorized by the Book Committee at its annual meeting in April, and the appointment has just been made by the Publishing Agents, John H. Race and Robert H. Hughes.

This Service, located at the federal capital, a center of great and constantly expanding news interest, is designed to serve the million or more readers of the thirteen Methodist weeklies with prompt and accurate information concerning important persons, events, and legislative proposals together with an interpretation of the news from the standpoint of Christian citizenship. Its facilities will also enable the editors of the several papers to secure full and trustworthy reports upon all matters of interest at the capital. It will not be in any sense a denominational propaganda service. Its aim is to give the Christian public, the Protestant public, authentic information as a basis for correct thinking and appropriate action.

Dr. Woolever, who has been carefully selected from a number of nominations, is a native of New York State, and was educated at Cazenovia Seminary and Syracuse University. He is a minister of the Central New York Conference, who has devoted most of his life to journalistic work. From 1912 to 1915 he was editor of The Northern Christian Advocate, and since 1915 he has been assistant editor of The Christian Advocate of New York.

KNOW YOUR OWN BODY

"Have a health examination on your birthday" is a slogan of a nation-wide movement for yearly health examinations for everybody, launched by the National Health Council.

Dr. Donald B. Armstrong, executive officer of the council, says that more than $3,000,000,000 is the annual economic loss to this country from preventable diseases and deaths. Of this amount, he pointed out, $1,800,000,000 is the loss among those gainfully employed, according to totals obtained by the Life Extension Institute.

According to the council, most people wait until they are ill before they go to a doctor. The council wishes to teach them to take measures to prevent illness and, in this connection, the statement is made that people apparently in good health should go to their physicians, have an annual examination of the most thorough sort and find out if their bodies are functioning effectively.

"Our experience has shown," said Dr. Armstrong, "that a large percentage of those who think they are in good physical condition have defects which need medical attention. Many of these defects are not of the most vital importance, but they develop into serious and fatal diseases if neglected."

The goal of the council is the examination of 10,000,000 persons in the year which starts on July 4.

"The carrying out of this plan," says the council health bulletin, "will be a great factor in increasing the span of life. If preventable mental and physical defects are called to the attention of these 10,000,000 persons and they profit by the hygienic advice and medical attention given them, there is no reason why the average length of life in this country cannot be increased at least five years during the next decade."

GRUB IN PLACE OF GOLD

Who cares if the cash has disappeared from the old broken tea-pot?

You can buy a good time with a roast chicken and fixin's down South Carolina way.

For the ancient custom of "payment in kind" has been revived by the Women's Encampment, a unique experiment in county improvement, which has been staged during the summer at Tyron, South Carolina, by the Spartanburg County Home Demonstration Department and the County Young Women's Christian Association. No money for board was required of the campers.

Here is the list of supplies (for three days) which each woman was expected to bring instead: Sandwiches, two hard-boiled eggs, six raw eggs, one-half pound bacon, six small biscuits, one chicken (dressed and placed in jar) one pound sugar, one pound lard, six ears of corn, two quarts Irish potatoes, one-half cup ground coffee, fruit, tomatoes, one cake or cookies, one-half pound butter, pickle.

The camp accommodated fifty women and girls, and many more than this number sent in applications to attend the course.

Two State agents from the Home Economics Department of Winthrop College gave instruction in bread making, meal planning, house planning, the art of dress and similar subjects, and discussions of community interest, and of rural and individual problems were conducted by the Young Women's Christian Association secretaries. There was also a course in Bible study and a carefully planned recreation program.

"County Young Women's Christian Associations in Nebraska, Iowa and the Southwest are watching this experiment with the greatest interest," says Miss Henrietta Roelofs, director of the Rural Committees Work, National Board, Young Women's Christian Associations. "We are confident that this pioneer effort of the association to co-operate formally in so-called county improvement holds great promise for the future of women in rural communities throughout the United States."

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

DISAGREEMENT OF FRANCE AND BRITAIN ON THE RUHR

Ever since the Reparations Commission announced some seven months ago that Germany was in default in her reparation payments, France and Great Britain have disagreed as to the best way of dealing with Germany. Great Britain never countenanced the occupation of the Ruhr. When, on the second of last May, Germany tried to open a new discussion on reparations France and Belgium almost immediately sent a common answer to the German proposition, leaving England, Italy and Japan to answer at their leisure as they saw fit. Germany continued the discussion with a new proposition on June 7. After six weeks of delay the British government, on July 20, submitted to France and Belgium the draft of a note which they proposed the three powers should unite in sending to Germany. This note took up Germany's suggestion that the amount of her reparation payments should be fixed by an impartial international tribunal. Such a scheme, it agreed, might be helpful, but it would be necessary to have the whole worked out in conformance with the Treaty of Versailles. The British note also insisted that there should be some form of international control of German financial administration. The British program contemplated Germany's abandonment of the policy of passive resistance in the Ruhr, to be followed by the resumption of civil administration there with the progressive evacuation of those areas, an impartial investigation of Germany's capacity to pay, and of the economic guarantees which Germany should pledge to the Allies. As soon as these guarantees were in effective operation the occupation of all German territory outside the limits laid down by the Treaty of Versailles was to come to an end. Ten days after the British government submitted this proposed note France and Belgium replied that they could not join in it. On August 11 Lord Curzon dispatched a very long and a very frank communication to the French and Belgian Ambassadors. In one of their earlier notes the French had stipulated that they should receive twenty-six billion gold marks above the amount necessary to meet their debts to Great Britain and America, and the Belgians had insisted on receiving five billion gold marks. But under the schedule last accepted by the Allies, France would have received only seven billion gold marks beyond her debts. As for Belgium, she has already received two billion gold marks under the agreement giving her priority. Neither country proposed to cut her claim at all proportionately to the suggested decrease in German reparations. In the destruction of her ships and the loss of their cargoes Great Britain suffered just as real material losses as did Belgium and France in the devastation of their cities and fields. So Lord Curzon informed the Allies that Great Britain is not willing to alter the percentage of German payments agreed upon at the Spa Conference three years ago. But the most disconcerting part of the note to the French and Belgians was Great Britain's assertion that she has never considered the occupation of the Ruhr legal under the Treaty of Versailles. Of course, the French have been much put out by the British note. Certainly it does seem somewhat late in the day for the British to take up the legality of the Franco-Belgian occupation. So far the discussion seems to be leading nowhere. In the meanwhile, Poincaré is going about France reminding the French cities of what they suffered in the war and the French franc is sinking lower and lower on the exchanges of the world and the stalemate in the Ruhr continues.

THE KIEL CANAL DECISION

During the Russo-Polish War in 1920 the German government forbade the British ship Wimbledon to go through the Kiel Canal because it was carrying arms and ammunition for Poland. The Versailles Treaty provided that the Kiel Canal and its approaches shall be maintained free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality. The Wimbledon case was brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice for decision. The Court, by a vote of nine to two, has decided that Germany was wrong in detaining the vessel and has ordered her to pay a fine of one hundred and forty thousand French francs. It remains to be seen whether Germany will pay the fine. We trust she will. If we are to have a government of law, not war, in the world, nations which are adjudged in error by the International Court must accept their penalties, no matter how difficult it may be to do so.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN JAPANESE EYES

We Americans commonly take it for granted that we are the most unselfish nation in the world, especially in our foreign policy. A great many intelligent foreigners, however, see things in a very different light. A group of leading Japanese, including one of the most prominent Japanese correspondents at the Washington Conference, one of the high officials of the city of Tokyo, and other men of similar standing, expressing themselves frankly at a recent luncheon, depicted American policy thus: "America," they said, "like England, covers up its own selfishness under highly moral terms. Great Britain calls it the duty of the strong race to the weak. Americans may term it 'manifest destiny.' Twenty-five years ago America was determined on industrial expansion and resolved to have a canal at Panama in order to foster her commerce. When Colombia objected, America simply went and took the land. Because you had done it a little too obviously to suit ourselves, you later paid Colombia twenty-five million dollars to salve your conscience. Then you saw the Philippines, and took them, saying that you took them for their own sake. But it was really because of your tremendous overplus energy which you do not know how to expend. As for China, you took much more than you really ought to have taken of the Boxer indemnity, as did the other nations. Then, with an astuteness which you do not appreciate yourselves, you nominally returned part of the indemnity. But in reality you made it a great fund for the penetration of China with American ideas and the American education of Chinese. You are abler than you know in your foreign policy." True, the Japanese are partly wrong in their interpretation of what we have done, but it is well for us to remember that no nation can see the whole truth about itself any more than can any individual.

THE INDUSTRIAL PROSPECT FOR GERMANY

The American section of the International Chamber of Commerce has just made public a report by Basil Miles on the Ruhr economic situation. While the German workmen in the Ruhr have not generally been doing productive work since the occupation, nevertheless they have not been wholly idle. The German government has subsidized the workmen and the union and syndicates of mine owners and industrialists have given them supplementary contributions so that the men have reported for work every day. Employers have busied the men in carefully overhauling factories and plants; they have set them to work opening up new veins of coal and building factory extensions and new housing for workmen. On the Dortmund-Herne Canal at Ruhrort the Germans are putting in an eleven hundred foot lock at a cost, it is said, of three hundred million gold marks. The French have not destroyed any of the factories or transportation facilities of the Ruhr. The result is that "with six months of freedom from Allied control the Ruhr could probably get into greater production than ever before," says Mr. Miles. "Certainly," he adds, "within a year its present capacity could be organized to a production very much in excess of any pre-war year." In other words, the Ruhr, instead of deteriorating in its productive possibilities on account of French occupation, has actually improved. The physical wealth of Germany has not been touched. She has no devastated area either in material wealth, as in the case of France, or in unemployment, as in the case of England. She has continued production and even increased her possibilities for the future. To quote Mr. Miles again, "There is no question but that the country as a whole, although now in dire straits, still has capacity to recover its former industrial position." Moreover, the depreciation of the mark has practically eliminated the burden of Germany's internal debt, and her only foreign debt is payments for reparations. Even if the reparations debt is reckoned at one hundred and thirty-two billion gold marks, it is not greater than the national debt of Great Britain. Since the population of Germany is nearly a third greater than that of the British Isles, it is not wholly unreasonable to say that Germany is in fact to-day better prepared to "come back" than is Great Britain. If the pressure of the Allied occupation were eliminated, Germany would be in a better position to develop and resume normal conditions of industry than any other great country in Europe. At least, such is Mr. Miles's view.

AMBASSADOR GEDDES' REPORT ON ELLIS ISLAND

For the last year or two the British Ambassador at Washington has received so many complaints from British immigrants about conditions on Ellis Island that last December he made a special visit to the Island in order to see conditions at first hand. The British government has now made public his report. The Ambassador found much which he thought might be improved. While he recognized that the present system of cages is very convenient in managing the progress of the aliens from inspector to inspector, when the immigrants are being examined, he also felt strongly that it made the newcomers feel as though they were being treated like cattle. He was disgusted with the dirt. In many corners he noticed "impacted greasy dirt that it was possible to say with certainty had been there for many days, if not weeks or months." After leaving the Island it took thirty-six hours for him to get rid of the aroma which flavored everything he ate or drank. The crowding at Ellis Island has led to the use of two-tiered berths. The Ambassador remarks: "I cannot help thinking that it must be very unpleasant to sleep in the lower of these two-tiered berths when ill luck places a brutalized sort of creature in the berth above." He cites cases which give point to his remark. He learned that sometimes the blankets were not sterilized after use by one immigrant before they were used by another. The food he found excellent. But the whole establishment was pervaded by "institutionalism." Members of families are separated, as for their medical examinations, without knowing why they are taken one from another. The circumstances of the medical examination are offensive to sensitive people. But worst of all is the condition of those who are detained. Every immigrant who is not passed by the Ellis Island authorities has the right to appeal to the Labor Department at Washington. The answer to the appeal often is delayed for weeks, and persons awaiting these decisions and also persons who are to be deported are virtually imprisoned. The Ambassador remarks, "I should prefer imprisonment in Sing Sing to incarceration on Ellis Island awaiting deportation." He sees three possible courses before our government if it desires to improve the immigration service at New York. It can continue Ellis Island as at present, making improvements; or it can build a relief station and supply it at it or at Ellis Island, but not at both, food prepared in accordance with the Jewish ritual, and send immigrant Jews to that station and all non-Jews to the other; or it can abandon Ellis Island and build a completely new station somewhere else near New York. The present Immigration Commissioner, Henry H. Curran, vigorously dissents from Ambassador Geddes' criticisms. He says that the report is unjust because it refers to conditions eight months ago. However, Commissioner Frederick A. Wallis, who had charge of Ellis Island under President Wilson, agrees that the Ambassador's criticisms are justified, and officials of the Department of Labor at Washington feel that the whole report is couched courteously and fairly. Ambassador Geddes' report ought to stir Congress to alleviate the situation. However, the greatest need at Ellis Island now as in the past is sympathetic officials from the highest to the lowest. Some of the staff at the Island are most kindly and considerate, but many immigrants, especially those detained, endure a most wearing discourtesy and heart-breaking anxiety. Ambassador Geddes' suggestion that our consul would have the right to refuse to grant visas to immigrants who would not be accepted in this country certainly ought to be adopted. The more the examination of immigrants is shifted from this side of the water to the immigrant's point of departure the better. Then, too, there are numerous ways in which the immigration service might deal with immigrants more tactfully. It would be well if it printed explanations of the different examinations, inquiries, and so on, through which the immigrants must go, in order that every one might understand clearly the reason for the orders given to him and the arrangements made for him. We ought to make Ellis Island a place of kindness instead of a nightmare.

THE WORLD IN 2023

The other day Charles T. Steinmetz, the eminent electrical engineer, ventured to forecast the condition of the world a hundred years hence. By that time, he believes, practically all our work will be done by electricity. Electric power will be as abundant then as water is now. Smoke will no longer hang over our cities. Every city will be a "spotless" town. Routine work will be reduced, he predicts, to four hours a day and two hundred days a year. Routine work, he explains, is what the average person considers unpleasant work, such as being posted at a lathe in a factory, a linotype machine in a newspaper composing room, a bench in a shoe shop, a seat on a delivery truck, a typewriter in an office or a counter in a department store; "in other words, the dull duties of this complex existence." (Mr. Steinmetz is not quite fair to these tasks. They are not dull to everybody by any means.) The electrician, however, does not anticipate that people will be idle non-producers during all their leisure time. He expects them to occupy themselves "in productive diversions which satisfy the particular instincts of the individual." With the increase of our transportation facilities and of our leisure time, he reckons that millions who now live in cities of necessity will spend most of their time in the suburbs or in the real country, and will raise most, if not all, the food for their families as a pleasant occupation. Leisure will also "stimulate educational interests in every conceivable direction and man will become a highly informed and much more intelligent and self-expressive creature than he is in the mass to-day." Mr. Steinmetz believes that co-operation will be the solution of most of the difficulties which beset mankind. But we have not yet by any means fully learned that lesson. "I look for more wars," he says, "because men and systems continue to struggle against each other instead of with each other. We have not yet sufficiently grasped the philosophy of Christianity, regardless of how many of us profess to be Christians." He believes that the Slavs will be the dominant race of the future on account of their collectivistic tendencies. As he sees it, the German and Anglo-Saxon leadership of Europe received in the last war a blow from which it will not recover. Nevertheless, he thinks that the individualism of the United States will persist and that we shall have on this continent a civilization distinct from that of Europe, largely because we are and shall continue to be a new race of people, compounded from all the rest of the world. He confidently expects that the next century will far excel even the last century in the development of human production and of our control over nature.

THE JUDGE AND THE VOLSTEAD LAW

In one of his recent articles on prohibition in America, Roy A. Haynes, the United States Prohibition Commissioner, animadverted on the attitude of a minority of our judges who do not like the prohibition laws and refuse to take them seriously. If one judge can properly take such an attitude toward the liquor laws, another might as reasonably take the same stand in regard to the laws against murder or against burglary! Judges who speak of the liquor laws with flippancy are breaking down all law. A bootlegger who is an old offender told Commissioner Haynes that he had been arrested four times and added with a grin, "I always managed to get out all right." That remark was in reality a very serious indictment of the judiciary. One judge, it is reported, fined a second offender five cents. When the defendant could not pay the fine, the judge put his hand in his pocket and paid it himself! Before another judge appeared a bootlegger who was reputed to have made more than a million dollars in two years of illicit trading in whiskey. But all the punishment which the judge imposed was to fine him and his employees a total of eight hundred dollars! On the property of another offender was seized one of the largest stills ever found in the vicinity. He might have been punished by a maximum of one thousand dollars fine and imprisonment for one year. He admitted that he knew that his tenants intended to use the property for the illegal manufacture of whiskey. The judge punished him only with a fine of two hundred and fifty dollars. The two men who were operating the still were fined one hundred dollars apiece, although, when it was seized, the still was producing six hundred dollars worth of whiskey daily at bootlegger prices. In happy contrast to such recreant judges is the example of a Federal judge who announced that persons guilty of selling liquor were going to jail. One hundred bootleggers awaiting sentence faced this man at one time. One by one the judge sentenced the men to terms in prison, generally for sixty to ninety days, plus a fine. After about an hour, the Marshal held up his hand. "Your Honor," he said, "the jail is filled." "How about the ——— County jail?" asked the judge. "There's plenty of room there," was the answer. The judge sentenced another thirty defendants to terms there. Again the Marshal held up his hand. That jail also was filled. The judge inquired about two more county jails and proceeded to fill them up, too. No wonder the prohibition laws are now generally respected within that judge's jurisdiction. Indeed, the illicit sale of liquor there has been cut down well toward a minimum. May such judges be multiplied in the land! And let us find some method of impeaching the judge who directly or indirectly teaches disrespect for law.

THE PROGRESS OF "C. E."

Edward P. Gates, general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, presented at the twenty-ninth International Christian Endeavor Convention, Des Moines, Iowa, some interesting figures on the growth of Christian Endeavor. Ten thousand nine hundred and seventy-one new Christian Endeavor societies have been added to the rolls since July 1, 1921. This is the largest number organized in a two-year period for many years. The exceptional increase is in a measure due to the spread of Christian Endeavor in the more newly settled sections of the country, to the growing recognition of the importance of graded Christian Endeavor, and to the addition of new denominations to the Christian Endeavor fellowship. The following States report a net gain of ten per cent. or more in the number of their societies: Arkansas, Arizona, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska,

New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Texas, Utah and Wyoming. Not less than two hundred and fifty thousand young people have completed one or more leadership training courses in the study of missions, church history, methods of church work or similar subjects. California leads with a reported enrolment in study classes of 12,183. California leads the country in all-round promotion of the Four-square Campaign with 619 honor societies, but many other States follow close behind. The roll of States that made exceptional achievements would include nearly all of the forty-eight. Nearly every denomination reports increased interest in Christian Endeavor. Around the world the Methodist Church continues to lead in the total number of Christian Endeavor societies. The union of the Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church, followed by the adoption of Christian Endeavor as the official young people's society of the new denomination has added hundreds of societies to the C. E. fellowship.

THE LUTHERAN WORLD COUNCIL

The Lutherans of the world assembled for their first world convention on August 19th at Eisenach, Germany, meeting in old St. George's Church, where Martin Luther preached in 1521. The one hundred and fifty delegates represented twenty nations and fifty synods. Among them were twelve Americans, one of whom, Rev. H. J. Stub, of St. Paul, Minn., is president of the Convention. Prominent among the questions before the conference are the authority of the Holy Scriptures and matters of church unity and organization. The conference expects to meet again in 1927 and hopes to organize a unified Lutheran Church throughout the world. Such a church would have a membership of eighty million, the greatest Protestant Church in the world.

THE DECREASING USE OF ALCOHOL

American consumers of alcohol have had 250,000,000 gallons less during the last three years of national prohibition, Commissioner Haynes says, than they had in the previous three pre-Volstead years. In statistical demonstration of how the sponge of national prohibition has mopped up liquor supplies, Commissioner Haynes set forth that total withdrawals of alcohol, whiskey and other spirits during three years of prohibition aggregated only 82,503,164 gallons compared with 338,060,418 gallons during the three preceding years. He also cited figures to show how liquor supplies had been dried up and to prove the success of "preventive prohibition enforcement" by its stopping of the sources of alcoholic beverages. The greatest decrease in withdrawals, according to Commissioner Haynes' figures, was in whiskey, gin and brandy, which comprised about sixty-five per cent. of withdrawals in pre-prohibition days. About seventy-two per cent. of withdrawals since prohibition, he said, have been of alcohol, high wines and cologne spirits, largely used for industrial purposes. During the last ten months records of liquor withdrawals show only a third as much taken out as in the preceding year, and withdrawals in the first four months of 1923 were less than half of those of the same period of 1922, totaling, respectively, 3,958,216 and 8,654,734 gallons.

ing of President Harding and the fact that his renomination by the Republican party was an assured fact to restrain them. Now that President Harding is no longer here there is nothing to hold them in check. They are marshaling their forces and are going before the country on the open platform of "isolation" and are going to strain every nerve to put one of their group in nomination. If President Coolidge is going to try to stem this tide by any half-way doctrine of co-operation with other nations, we believe he is doomed to defeat. Such a full and complete, such a bare, bald and positive doctrine of isolation can be defeated only by an equally full, complete and positive doctrine of world co-operation. "Isolation" is never going to be defeated by any semi-doctrine of co-operation such as the World Court, or representation upon a few committees of the League of Nations, or participation in occasional conferences on the delimitation of armaments. The doctrine of absolute isolation can only be met by an equally absolute and positive doctrine of co-operation. Complete isolation from the world can only be conquered by full participation in the world's affairs.

If President Coolidge would realize this, and regardless of friends, advisors, Senators, Cabinet officers and party leaders, boldly call to the people to follow him into full participation in world affairs, boldly say to the people that the time had come for the United States to take her place beside Great Britain and the other nations in the world family; boldly say that the United States is a missionary nation and should be in Europe doing everything in her power to lift the nations out of misery, chaos and poverty into a happy, stable society and into peace, we believe the people would rally to him by the millions. Should they not, his defeat would be that of the prophet and martyr, and he would at least have the success of courage, heroism and greatness. It might mean apotheosis for him; it might mean a Calvary; but some of us believe the greatest success the world has ever known was on a certain Calvary. We would like to see President Coolidge immediately and unreservedly announce to the people that he was going to stand immovably for three great acts on the part of this nation. Should he do it, he would instantaneously put himself among the three or four great Presidents of the United States, among the greatest statesmen of history, and become the hero of unnumbered peoples throughout the world. The very daring of it, the very sublimity of the deed, the very wonder of it would send a thrill through the earth itself. Again we say it would mean sudden victory—(we believe victory would go with him)—or defeat—but what a sublime defeat!

First, we would have him say: "The United States should go into the World Court, and go in on the same terms with all the other nations, without reservations of any kind, and regardless of its origin or its association with the League of Nations." This would only be in fulfillment of a task President Harding had begun. But President Harding was not bold or confident about it. He listened to one group and another. He hesitated. He modified his first views as the irreconcilables began to criticize. His plea lacked that very daring, that very disregard of consequences which wins the enthusiastic support of men. If Mr. Coolidge would disregard all politicians, all parties, and boldly come out for immediate and full participation it would win the people and place him among the prophets.

In the second place, we would have him say, and before he consults anybody—and say it irrevocably—that the time

The President's Opportunities

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE comes into office with great obligations facing him. Unexpectedly and suddenly he finds himself called to fill many unfulfilled tasks—tasks begun by President Harding, but only partially completed. Upon him falls the duty of bringing them to consummation. But while falling heir to great obligations, he faces wonderful opportunities. Would he seize them, he would become either one of the greatest failures or one of the greatest successes in history. But some men who have been the greatest failures have thereby become the greatest successes. It so happens that some of the greatest failures in history, from Jesus down to the most modern idealist, have been the greatest conquerors. We wish President Coolidge might see this and take his chance at sublime failure or splendid victory. We believe with all our heart that had he the courage to make the great adventure he would realize the splendid victory.

Just at this moment the forces which seek the selfish isolation of America are uniting to carry the nation with them. Senator Johnson is their chief spokesman. In his recent speech at New York, upon his return from Europe, he frankly, plainly and bluntly gave expression to this faith and called upon the people to rally around him. Had President Harding lived, Senator Johnson and his followers might have sought their ends less frankly and directly for personal and political reasons. There was the great personal followhad come for the United States to say to Great Britain, France and Germany: "The Ruhr situation is threatening the peace of the world; it is plunging not only Germany but all Europe into financial chaos and ruin; it is holding up the restoration of war-shattered Europe; it is everywhere sowing the seeds of revolution and bolshevism; it is even affecting the industry, the commerce, the agriculture, the well-being of America. It is a sore in the breast of the world. The time has come for all concerned—and all are concerned—to get together and see what can be done. France may be right; but even if she is, no nation has a right to jeopardize all civilization in the seeking of its rights. The United States insists that all the nations concerned meet with her in conference immediately. She is willing to do everything in her power to see that France, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy and Germany get their due and just rights. Let us meet immediately." We believe that should President Coolidge say this, and say it with unequivocal emphasis, that, with Great Britain ready to stand beside her, France could not possibly resist such action—and there are even Frenchmen ready to welcome such action—and the whole Ruhr question and the matter of reparations would soon be solved, and the world not only breathe easily again, but be freed to pursue its healing and constructive tasks. What an opportunity! How great a President Mr. Coolidge would at once become! The world would think of him as in the company of Lincoln and Roosevelt!

Finally, and here would be the greatest test of courage, we would have him say: "The time has come for the United States to enter the League of Nations. The people have always believed in it. It is largely an American conception. It sprang from the brains and hearts of both Republicans and Democrats. It should never have been dragged into the mire of politics. I insist on taking it out of politics, and I appeal to the heart and conscience of the American people. It is the greatest political experiment in history. It is simply the attempt to apply to the life of nations that community principle that has brought peace to individuals. It has been in existence three years and not one of those fears expressed by its enemies has been justified. It has been only a helpful and constructive force in the relationships of nations. It has in it wonderful possibilities. It is the only promise of a peaceful and co-operative world we have. It cannot perfectly function with the greatest nation standing apart from it. It can be made as democratic as we wish, were we there. It is dealing with questions in which we are vitally concerned. It longs for our presence and will make all reasonable modifications in its constitution we might suggest. Our presence there means our faith in co-operation, our recognition of the family and common interest of nations, our faith in America as a missionary nation; our refusal means isolation and the victory of those who preach isolation and shout it from the housetops as not only the true but the traditional policy of America." What would happen if President Coolidge should suddenly say all this to the world? We do not know. We think the American people would rally to him by the millions; we think that they would demand his nomination in 1924; we think that hundreds of thousands of Democrats would vote for him; we believe he would put consternation into the hearts of the isolationists and irreconcilables, and turn the cohorts of Senator Johnson to flight. We know that he would suddenly become one of the great, brave, prophetic statesmen and prophets in the eyes of the world; he would everywhere be acclaimed as hero, and would go down into history with those intrepid souls whom men have crowned with immemorial laurels. What an opportunity for both greatness and enduring influence President Coolidge has, could he rise to it!

The Resurrection of the Church

SHE seemed dead, fast bound in her cerements, unable to come forth. Her enemies tramped over her. You could hear them whispering on every hand, "What are the churches doing? What has the Church to say? The Church, she is dead; no one regards her; trample her under foot." The whole world seemed passing by in contempt, as if now, at last, after the thousand and one threatened dissolutions of the Church, dissolution had really come. The Nietzscheans in Germany and the Bolsheviks in Russia, their echoes and proselytes in our own country, the whole careless mass of pleasure-loving people, the vast armies of the gamblers and the immoral and of the new religions, starting up with bewildering variety on every side, all agreed that the Church was dead, might be henceforth neglected. Her shrines were deserted; her voices were silent. Then came the awakening voice, "Go forth!" and the marvel is that the very things which seemed to be sealing her doom are the very things which have effected her release. The advance of science, the freedom of criticism, the unprecedented activity of thought and of discovery—these are things which seemed a little while ago to threaten the very life of the Church, but they have proved to be her deliverance. They have snapped the swatches that bound her; they have set her free to arise and go forth. Copernicus, Galileo, Lyell, Darwin, and other great discoverers in the realm of science appeared to shatter the Church, but it has proved that they delivered her; it has proved that they were the very people who had released her from her bondage and had set her forth on her new life. The criticism of the Bible seemed to discredit the Bible and to destroy its authority; but it seems only to have liberated the Bible, to have broken the fetters that restrained it, to have set its spirit free by making its message tell. All the violent convulsions of our time, including the war, the rapid discoveries, the new modes of applying nature to human ends or to human destruction; the changes in our life, the rapidity of our locomotion, all the agitation in which we seem to be living; the disturbance of industry, the threatened destruction of commerce and failure of finance—these things seemed, only a little while ago, to be giving the Church her quietus for good. But they have had the opposite effect; they have raised her to life; they have called her, as it were, to a new existence, called her to a new adventure. She is about to renew her youth, to begin again; she comes out of the doom in a great resurrection.

But you may ask, "What is the reason for saying this; what is the sign of the resurrection? Can you point to crowded churches, to large accessions of converts, to renewed respect paid to the Church, to public recognition of her place and work?" Perhaps it would be possible to point, with perfect honesty and truth, to such signs as these and to maintain, on the strength of what is happening to us, that the waters of a rising tide are coming in and breaking over the shallows and the waste places, but it is not this kind of sign which proclaims the Church's resurrection. Such movements as we refer to occur at all times: there is the ebb and the flow. There are the bubbles and then the sinking back to the common level, a movement here and an ingathering there. Some startling preacher crowds a church, some unusual ritual attracts a number of people. But all this is significant rather of man's instability than of the resurrection of the Church. The revived power of the Roman Church in this country cannot be cited in this connection, because the revived power of the Roman Church is rather tightening the cerements about the body, repressing the life which might break forth. No, the Church's resurrection to which we are referring is growing, as it has done again and again in the story of Christendom, because new life and truth are breaking forth from the world. The ideas of Christ, the person of Christ, the intentions of Christ, the power of Christ, are glowing with a new meaning. It is as if we had just discovered it. His everlasting Gospel reveals itself again, in these troubled times, in a new light and a new application. At last, after so many centuries, the Church wakes to the discovery that it is her Lord's intention to make a right social order among men. At last it dawns upon the Church why Christ said so much about the Kingdom of God, why He said so little about the Church. The very prayer He taught us, which has been grained in upon us until we know it all by heart, opens out with a new meaning, like the seed that has lain in the hand of a mummy and now springs into life again. We see why, when He taught us to pray, He used words which we have only just begun to see the full meaning of. We see why He said that we were to pray always, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done upon earth." As it dawns upon the Church that that was His meaning, and that He put it there for that purpose, we seem to rub our eyes with amazement and wonder why we did not understand what it was that hardened our hearts.

The Church is seeing now, for the first time in her history, that it is her task, appointed to her by her Lord, to secure a society on earth, a society of a certain kind, a society of equal rights and opportunities, a society in which men can always get their daily bread, a society in which men can all share in the riches and productivity of the earth, a society in which health and culture and a full development of individual powers may be the portion of everyone; in which the great will be those who serve, and in which the most ordinary individual will be honored because he, as an individual, is precious in the sight of God. The Church has just begun to see that this was Christ's intention, and that He called men together to carry out that plan. She has begun to grasp it in the light of developments which have made it clear to her and have forced it on the attention of the whole world. You say, of course very naturally, "If that was Christ's intention, was not that always the Church's task, was it not the reason for the Church's existence?" Yes, it was. But men missed the mark, they failed to see the point, they forgot; and as we look back over these centuries of Christianity it is astonishing how clear the situation becomes. You can see that the mistake was that the Church became an institution which existed for its own sake, and the great object was to maintain the Church, to defend the Church, to secure its power and its authority and laws, to secure its property; and for centuries we wasted the precious time of human life in that futile attempt to build up a Church which should dominate the world. That perversion of Christ's thought was in a sense discredited at the Reformation; it was the great work of the Reformation to discredit it. It was called in question, it was shown to be false, and a great part of Christendom repudiated it. But, alas! another misconception took its place, and in the Church that was called the "Church of the Reformation" the task was—putting it quite simply, as Calvin used to put it—to gather together the elect and to secure for them the heavenly home while the rest of men should be cast into hell. That conception of the Reformed Church has lasted more or less down to our own day. It has been the implied supposition all along that by Christianity is meant essentially saving the souls of men for the next world, and the Kingdom of Heaven is that future to which we are going and not the condition to be sought and produced here. You can, in that brief record of the Christian centuries, see with startling clearness, looking back where the mistake was made and what the mistake is; the misunderstanding of the thought of Christ and the wrong direction taken as a result. But now, after all this time, and as a result of the great convulsions through which the world is passing and the great discoveries of science and the work of criticism—now we see that the first task of the Church may be, and indeed is, to regenerate the individual. We see that the promise of the Church is necessary and valuable; that there is a world beyond, and that thought of the heavenly life spanning this life and qualifying its brief uncertainty is necessary; no one disputes that. We see, as our fathers saw, the necessity of regeneration. We see, as everyone has seen, the all-important truth of the life eternal to which our life will go when death takes us; that we see, but what has dawned upon us at last is this, that the task of regenerating individuals in the society that is called the Church is to regenerate society; to find and to establish the right social order, the right social relations. To get the will of God done on earth means that the Kingdom of Heaven should come into existence in human life; that has dawned upon the Church at last. It is a new vision; it is a new call, and the Church is rising to undertake the new task, and it is rising to undertake it because it becomes clearer than ever that to do that great task a divine power is needed; and that though men may struggle in their own strength to promote the reformation by social reconstruction, they will never achieve the Kingdom of God on earth except by the power of God, and by those instruments of that power, love, mercy and truth which are the essentials of God's nature, and with which the Church has been endowed.

Now, as that opens before the world to-day there are these two lines of a practical nature that have become already apparent. First of all, it is necessary that the ministry of the future should be trained for this purpose; that the minister of the Gospel should become a carefully trained and equipped leader for the purpose of bringing the powers of Christ to bear on the social structure of his country and of the world. A minister must be taught the meaning of the times in which he lives, must be taught the bearings of industrial developments, must be taught the relation of the individual to society; and while he has to work for the individual with all his heart and with all his love, he is not to stop there, but he is to learn how to apply the truth of Christ to society, to such things as labor and capital, as production and distribution, as education and social welfare, as wise legislation and right international relations. The demand for the future is a ministry of sound leadership, a ministry of enlightened people who have learnt what Christ means for the world as it is here, and for human society, of which we are all bound to form a part. The other line that becomes apparent is that the Church must become more and more a school in which its members, by study, by reflection, by fellowship, by prayer, are equipped to carry out the great thought in the society of their time. We have to educate ourselves. The members of a church must be educated people in the Kingdom of God, scribes in the Kingdom, bringing out of the Treasury things old, but also things new. Such a training must be systematic and complete, so that every member of the church is trained in the ways of the King, and can be, in his position in life, a leader in the coming of the Kingdom. Henceforth a church member must not be one who has made sure of heaven for himself, and keeps in touch with the church for the good he can get, but must be one who, being Christ's, is striving to get Christ's purpose realized on earth, and finds in the church his opportunity, the school where he learns the power by which he can act and the means by which his own life may become a part of the great purpose, for the welfare of society, for the salvation of mankind. This is the line which is opening up clearly before us to-day.

R. F. H.

Unprofitable Servants

WE know pretty well what is meant by doing our duty, taking the word in its ordinary sense, and as generally viewed in our common life. Jesus says that a life so lived is unprofitable. He does not mean that it is not good, nor that it is worthless. Any of us can see at once that if all people lived up to that conception of duty the world would be a much better place than it is. Immense evils would be got rid of, endless disputes would be settled. If economic justice were done, and commercial morality secured such as would satisfy a common standard, it would not be unprofitable as compared with life to-day. But here is the point: Jesus was not comparing it with life as He found it, but life as He conceived it and wanted it to be. He was speaking from the point of view of the ideal Kingdom of God. What He meant was that a life of duty in the ordinary sense would never realize the Kingdom of God. Unprofitable means not making profit, and profit means that which remains over and above when the working expenses are paid. Now, the life of duty, the life of what we might call natural virtue, the life which men generally will expect a man to live, only pays the expenses of living, so to speak. That standard is necessary to the maintenance of society. Those who fall below it are betrayers and anti-social forces. What men demand of each other, and have a right to expect, is the minimum that will keep society together. But this life of duty does not yield a profit over and above the maintenance of society as such for the creation of a higher type of society, and that is what Jesus means by saying it is unprofitable. A world in which all ordinarily conceived duties were faithfully done would not be by any means an ideal world to live in; it might be a very stern, unlovable world, without grace or beauty or tenderness. Give us only men filled with the contract-idea of duty, and no kingdom of heaven is possible. You may imagine if employers and workmen in a large works establish justice, the master paying the right wage and the men doing the proper amount of work in the right way, it would be an infinitely better state of things than when these duties are not done. There would probably be no strikes, and no anger and bitterness. But it does not follow that they would greatly love one another, and there is no ideal society without a great love. Think of a bank where it is highly important that every man should do his duty with the strictest integrity. And, speaking generally, our banks maintain that standard, otherwise it would be impossible to do business. But we are not aware that people in banks love one another in any special degree. The doing of duty does not yield a profit for the production of that higher life. It only meets working expenses, so to speak. It is a great achievement, but it is not the kingdom of heaven. We do not begin to build the real human fellowship until we transcend the ordinary idea of duty.

We may afterwards carry the word with us into the higher sphere, but its meaning will be changed. Some men think that they can put the world right by setting men on the track of claiming their rights and filling them with the spirit that demands things. This is a necessary function so long as men are denied their rights. But Mazzini saw long ago how necessary was a stage beyond that, and insisted that the working classes should not merely claim their rights, but emphasize the idea of duty. Jesus would go far beyond even that demand. Even doing faithfully what is expected of us in our own places in society will never bring us the best life. So much service for so much pay; so many things done and so much for doing them; such and such facilities extended and returned; behavior up to the standard prescribed or expected—these terms alone will never realize the Kingdom of God, nor bring to full expansion the possibilities of our human soul. This is the truth that Jesus was trying to get into the minds of His disciples. What He wanted to create between men was a new sense of their true relationship. "If thy brother sin against thee," He says. You see He wants you to regard the man who sins against you as your brother in spite of that sin. This is something out of the reach of contracts and bonds and quid pro quos; it is a realization of our common humanity underlying all our differences, and even our grievances.

It is what we do over and above the common claim that proves the presence of great reserves of love and loyalty which are the reservoirs of that life which God is building in the world. Baron Von Hugel, in his "Christianity and the Supernatural," distinguishes between natural and supernatural good. By "supernatural," however, he does not mean "miraculous," and by "natural" he does not mean "not divine." All natural virtue springs ultimately from the life of God in humanity. We think it would not be unfair to say that by "natural good" he means very much what we have been describing as the life of duty, and by "supernatural good" he means the good that is on a much higher level, and transcends any claim that society would make upon a man. In this higher stage "decency is carried up into devotedness, and homeliness into heroism. Here the activities are primarily concerned with the soul. Simple justice and average fairness are transfigured into genial generosity and overflowing self-devotion. Competition is replaced by cooperation, indeed, even by vicarious work and sacrifice." Of course, this higher life is attained at a cost. "For it means high heroism; yet also hospitable homeliness; it means the Alpine uplands—the Edelweiss and the Alpine rose—as well as the Lombard plains with their corn and their potatoes; it means poetry and prose, a mighty harmony and a little melody, or rather it means, taken as a complete whole, a great organ recital with the Grand Jeu stop of supernature drawn out full and all the pipes of nature responding in tones each necessary in its proper place, yet each sweeter and richer than its own simple natural self." Nor is it only in the sphere of massive heroism, but also in the homely common things that we can attain to this over-and-above standard, which is not indeed a standard, but a spirit. When this deeper spirit is once awakened it works wonders in the common sphere. Let it once invade a place of business by the employers doing for the men or the men for the employers something which no agreement demands, some overflow of graciousness, something to prove that they do not regard each other merely as master and men, and the whole business thrills with a new feeling and lights up like a landscape with the unveiling of the sun.

We do not say that such a thing often happens in business, but it has happened many a time, and altered the whole spirit of an establishment. The best things done in this world are not those ordinarily called duties at all. Who would have ever said it was Dr. Barnardo's duty to give his life, to spend and to be spent for the little waifs and strays of England? He did not feel it as a duty, but as an inspiration. Robertson Scott tells us of a poor Japan peasant in a time of famine who happened to be the possessor of the only unbroken bale of rice in the village. He died of hunger rather than use that bale of rice because it was the only store which the village would have for sowing in the spring. There is no ethical code in Japan that would have told that man it was his duty so to die. This is the kind of thing that Baron Von Hugel calls "supernatural good." And the spirit of such an act is what Jesus relied upon for creating the ideal society. Baron Von Hugel tells the story of the young Anglican officer, Captain Horace Vere, who, after being wounded in the Crimean War, came back to England and recovered health, was happily married and the father of two little girls. One day on parade a trooper who had an unjust grudge against him shot him through the back and lungs, and he died in a fortnight from the wound. The trooper's vindictiveness was not assuaged by his act. Though he knew he would have to die if the captain died, he declared that he wished he would die. But the captain, after providing for his wife and little girls, concentrated all the strength that remained to him to win his murderer's forgiveness, and so to soften that poor, hate-blinded heart. And he succeeded. "The captain," says Von Hugel, "died fully resigning into God's hands the wife and the children and his own life, still well on the upward grade. He lost his bodily life, but he gained a soul; he went to God assuredly a saint, the selfless victor in a struggle between malignant hate and perfect love." No one would describe that as the life of duty, or of natural virtue. It was the victory of the Divine Spirit in the man, the victory of the grace of God in the human heart, flowing out over all the boundaries of any ethical code men would ever draw up. And it is this spirit, the spirit that flows out in service without considering demands or promises or expectations, or asking questions about duty, that makes the Kingdom of God on earth and avails for the redemption of man.

THE OBSERVER

Music and the People

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

LAST night I witnessed what was both an interesting and encouraging sight. Sixteen thousand people sat in the open air for two hours listening to a great orchestra playing a Tschaikowsky symphony and pieces by Wagner and Liszt. I was thrilled by the sight of the vast multitude as much as by the wonderful music. Some years ago Mr. Adolph Lewisohn presented the College of the City of New York a great concrete stadium seating ten thousand people. His idea was not only that the students could use it for their athletics, but that the city might have a suitable place for pageants, out of door dramatic performances and concerts during the summer months. The Greek tragedies have been performed there. Percy Mackaye's symbolical drama, "Caliban," was given there for several nights before thousands of people. Each summer an orchestra has given nightly concerts before large audiences. These concerts have been of a high standard, although not strictly classical. This summer an experiment was tried. The Philharmonic Orchestra, one of the finest in the world, was engaged with their famous conductor, Mr. Hoogstraten. They have been playing every night for two months, last night's concert being the closing one of the season. The outstanding point is that they have played exactly the same sort of programs that they play at their weekly concerts in Carnegie Hall during the winter months. There was doubt in the minds of some as to whether the people would come to hear Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss. Mr. Lewisohn, who headed the experiment, had no doubt. He had faith in the people, and that faith has been justified. The attendance has been larger than at any previous season, the Stadium often having been filled to capacity. Last night not only was the Stadium filled, but there were six thousand people in the field surrounding the platform on which the orchestra was placed.

I felt a new hope for art in America when I entered the field last night. Here were sixteen thousand people sitting under the stars listening to real music—the kind of music which requires some brains to appreciate as well as a sense of tune and rhythm. And the best music, the Tschaikowsky symphony, received the most applause of all. I was interested in noting, too, that this last program was one chosen by the audience. Last week slips of paper were distributed among the audiences asking for votes on a final program. The people chose such selections as Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger." The great throng listened in absolute silence while this program was being played. The programs of the whole season have been of the same character. Symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schuman, Dvorak and Goldmark have been played. The great tone poems by Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss, Moussorgsky and Sibelius have been favorites and played again and again. Whole evenings have been devoted to Wagner. The orchestra has played superbly, the hundred men being inspired by the big audiences and the masterful conductor. Mr. Hoogstraten has just come to America from Amsterdam to take the place left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Stransky. He was known only by reputation. At the opening concert it was evident that he was a great interpreter of noble music. Last night the audience was quite wild in its enthusiasm, remaining for ten minutes after the concert to clap and shout and express its gratitude.

A friend, to whom I made known my enthusiasm over the changed attitude of the American people toward music, tried to chill my faith by remarking, "There were no Americans there. They were all Germans, Italians and Russians, of whom there are hundreds of thousands in New York. You couldn't get an audience of one thousand Americans to sit through a program of real music for sixty consecutive nights." I think he was mistaken, for I studied the audience at several concerts, and while no doubt the nationalities he mentioned predominated, yet there were many Americans present. Sometimes it seemed to me that at least a quarter of the audience present were Americans, and considering the indifference of the average American to music, this is a good showing. This increased love of music and interest in it is due to two things: First, the teaching of music in the public schools, and secondly, the hearing of it for twenty years. Love of art, except in exceptional cases, comes from familiarity with it. Theodore Thomas, the Damrosches, Seidle, and the other men who went on playing year after year to empty houses, gradually building up an appreciative audience, deserve great credit. So also do those who have insisted on summer music for the masses in Central Park, Madison Square Garden and the Stadium. At last their efforts are bearing fruit, and an annual course of summer concerts at the Stadium is assured.

The one thing that is doing most to hinder the appreciation of music in America and prevent the love of it is jazz. People cannot escape it. It is in every restaurant and every theater. Our children hear it everywhere. We are even degenerating Europe with it. Every phonograph is screeching it in every home. It destroys the appreciation of music as surely as the reading of trash kills all taste and enjoyment of good literature. Children brought up on comic supplements are not going to care for literature. They will hanker after the stuff on which they have been reared, not for Hawthorne, Scott, Shakespeare or George Eliot. People who live in an atmosphere of jazz are going to find Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and Tschaikowsky very dull and stupid. There has been no such blow to music as jazz, and there is not much hope for a general love of music so long as it continues. Indeed, the psychologists are going much further than this and saying it has a degenerative influence on character, and they have coined such phrases as the "jazz age" and the "jazz temperament." I believe all this, but it is its power to destroy the love of music that I am emphasizing here.

Might I say one word to ministers and choir masters in conclusion? You have a great opportunity to counteract this deadly attack on music by "jazz" by familiarizing the children in Sunday-school and church with the best music. Use hymns that are set to music, not to ragtime. In the church see that your choir sings music, not sentimental doggerel, vapid anthems that are composed by the yard and have no more breath of life in them or real music than Walt Mason's verses have of poetry. It would be a blessing if the music library of the average choir loft could be burned. There is such wonderful, beautiful church music. All the great composers—Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Brahms, Verdi, Rossini, and many others—were devout and religious men and consecrated their genius to God through exquisite music for His worship. Use it. Throw away the trash. God deserves the best. Always see that your music is as lofty in style and as noble in tone as the words of the English Bible you read. The music following the Gospel should be as great in every regard as the passage from the Gospel or the prophets or the epistles that precedes it.

A Students Co-operative School

A SCHOOL, owned and controlled by students, without principal, superintendent or board of directors, where committees elected by the students decide everything from the question of teachers' salaries to the selection of teachers and the determination of a program of courses and schedule of classes, is a student's dream of Utopia. Such a dream has been realized by the students of the Co-operative Educational Institute of Brooklyn. Writing in a recent issue of "The New Student," an intercollegiate fortnightly paper published by the National Student Forum, J. L. Afros, the registrar, relates how this school came into existence.

"In June, 1919, conditions in a local college preparatory school became such that the students went out on strike to protest the autocratic dominance and profiteering policies of the 'principal' and owner of that school," he says. "He charged exorbitant fees and imposed many intolerable rules. His instructors were incompetent, for he paid inadequate salaries. His classrooms were overcrowded and the curriculum did not satisfy the students. •

"Those who were of a fighting spirit and imbued with a desire for liberalism in education realized that there was an opportunity to use this ever-growing dissatisfaction in favor of the co-operative schools. We started with no material help from any source save the enthusiasm of a group of conscientious students. We held street corner meetings, issued circulars, picketed the private schools and gained the confidence of many students. We were undeterred by any obstacle in our effort to organize a 'students' school. We possessed no building and had no equipment or funds with which to acquire them. After a struggle lasting the entire summer of 1919 we enrolled two hundred students.

"Of course, we have made many mistakes in solving our many problems, both administrative and tactical. Ours was a work of pioneers, and it entailed many sacrifices. It is impossible to recount how those underpaid or totally unpaid workers have given up many necessary hours of sleep and leisure to the building of the first students' school."

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Two-Fold Mission of the Spirit

By Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins, D.D.

Preached at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Whitsunday, May 20, 1923

"The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."—St. John 14:26.

IN these words from this morning's Gospel, Christ indicates the two-fold mission of the Holy Spirit. He is to teach the disciples new things, and He is to bring to their remembrance old things, to remind them of things that they already know. Contemporary religious thought is suffering from two extremes. At the one extreme stands so-called fundamentalism, which believes that God has no new things to teach us by His Spirit. At the other extreme stands the type of modernism which is all for new things, and has no proper reverence for the past, no true appreciation of the permanent and unchanging elements in a revealed religion. Whitsunday is a rebuke to both of these exaggerations. It rebukes so-called fundamentalism by the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, whose mission and function is to teach new things. "I have yet many things to say unto you," said Jesus, "but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth." And then Whitsunday rebukes that type of modernism which is without reverence for the past by showing that the mission of the Holy Spirit is not only to guide us into new truth, but to keep us loyal to the old; faithful to the deep and precious things in our religion which have already been revealed. "The Holy Ghost . . . shall . . . bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

Let us think first of this latter mission of the Holy Spirit. It is the first meaning of what happened at Pentecost. The coming of the Spirit to that little company of faithful people, gathered in the upper chamber in Jerusalem, did not mean the bringing of new truth to them. It meant the bringing of light upon the old truths, so that the truths gripped them, so that forgotten words of Christ came back to them and blazed all at once into new meaning. He had spoken the words while He was yet with them, but they had not understood. Now the Spirit takes those words and makes them plain.

The first bearing of this thought is upon the problem of conversion. The mind of man is now known to be larger than was once supposed. In its depths, submerged below the level of conscious life, all the perception, sensations, volitions of a lifetime are permanently registered. Among these buried elements of personality action and counter-action may be going on of the purport of which the conscious life is quite unaware. Suddenly these elements are acted upon by some powerful contact or suggestion. They rush up above the threshold of consciousness, they establish new series of affinities and reactions, and the man is born again. If the buried elements are base, if the whole waking life has been a living lie, then there is a resurrection to damnation. Nero leaves behind him the promise of his youth, and becomes a blood-guilty madman. Judas goes out from the upper chamber to sell his Master for thirty pieces of silver and betray Him with a kiss. If the buried elements are noble, we have instead the phenomenon of which Pentecost is the perfect symbol the phenomenon of conversion and new births of love and power. A single spark, often a verse of Scripture, precipitates the explosion. St. Patrick, after his escape from captivity in Ireland, dreamed that he heard the united voices of many Irish who dwelt near the sea, exclaiming, "We beseech thee, child of God, come and again walk among us." And soon afterward he dreamed that a voice said, "He who gave His life for thee, He speaks in thee." These words determined his great mission. St. Augustine, tied and bound by the chain of his sins, knowing that carnal-mindedness meant death to all his higher life, yet unable to escape it—St. Augustine was walking in a garden when he overheard children in their play crying, "Tolle lege, tolle lege," take and read. He opened the New Testament and read these words: "Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." And those words set him free. St. Ansgarius, the apostle to Scandinavia, dreamed that he was in a miry bog, striving to regain his footing, when he looked up and near the place saw a lovely meadow, with ladies walking there along a pleasant path, and among them walked his mother, whom he had lost when he was but five years old. One of them said to him, "My son, wouldst thou come to thy mother?" And he said eagerly, "Most gladly would I." Then she answered, "If thou wouldst be of our company, thou must guard against vain waywardness, and pursue a serious course of conduct." And the sleeping boy awoke, dominated by a resolution which led him on heroic ways. Francis of Assisi was attending service at a little church when the Gospel of the day struck home to his heart like a personal mandate from the Saviour: "Go and sell what thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me." That sentence changed his life. And Martin Luther was in Rome, ascending the Santa Scala on his knees, when the true way of salvation was pointed out by a voice audible only to his spirit: "The just shall live by faith."

Now we must note, and it seems to me that this is a point of vital importance—we must note that in all these instances of conversion there had been a previous culture. The Spirit of God acted upon the souls of these men, not directly, with fresh revelation, but indirectly, by bringing lost truths to remembrance and making them real, giving them a grip and hold upon life. St. Patrick had been in captivity in Ireland; his youthful experience had made an ineffaceable impression; when he heard the call, "Child of God, come and again walk among us," he knew the words of the Irish and their needs. St. Augustine had been struggling for years to release himself from the bondage of his passions; the words of the epistle sank into a heart already desperately bent upon obtaining its freedom, and furnished the explosive spark which kindled the will. St. Anschar, poor little motherless boy! His heart was full of memories of that good mother, and the dream that he should one day meet her in God's paradise came from latent recollections of her own gentle words and Christian ways. St. Francis was taken unawares by the Gospel, but his own earlier experiences, the innate heroism of his spirit, his discontentment with a life of ease, had made him quick to apprehend its meaning. Luther's revelation came after travail of soul, after such search for God that his nature lay open, ploughed and harrowed and ready to receive the word. And St. Paul, the classic instance of sudden conversion—in that case, too, we find that there had been preparation. He had been present at the stoning of Stephen. He had witnessed, that is, the first Christian martyrdom. He had seen the face of the first martyr transfigured till it became as it were the face of an angel; he had heard the dying accents, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." No study of the conversion of St. Paul is adequate which leaves this out of account. Conversion is the fruit-bearing of a previous culture. It is the sudden recrudescence of buried elements in human consciousness. It is the Spirit bringing lost truths to remembrance.

If we accept this psychological view of the meaning of conversion, we do not on that account repudiate or minimize the divine agency and operation in it. On the contrary, we emphasize that agency. A better understanding helps, not hinders, because it enables us to co-operate more intelligently with the gracious Spirit who brings lost truths to our remembrance. It confirms us, for instance, in our strong and primary emphasis upon the importance of religious education. Without the good elements of Christian instruction latent in the mind there is, of course, no chance of their revival. A pugilist whose conversion furnished Wales with a useful leader was found to have been trained as a child in Christian doctrine before he lapsed into brutality. That was a profound remark of Jerry McAuley to a friend: "Far be it from me to limit the grace of God, but I never yet saw a man converted who did not have a good mother." The training of the young in the knowledge of the Scriptures and of the primary truths of the Christian religion is a matter of supreme importance, for without that planting of the seed there is nothing in later years for the Spirit to ripen and fructify. The ignorance of the Bible shown by our children and youth means only one thing. It means that they are not receiving religious instruction at home. It means that those who, a generation ago, were brought up under Christian influences, and, although they neglect religion, have still that gracious shadow of it upon their recollections—it means that they are giving to their children only the shadow of a shadow. Take the Bible back to the home. Use it as a text-book of religious instruction. Show the heroes of the Old Testament in their faith and in their valor. Show the Lord Jesus as the Gospels picture Him: merciful, powerful, glorious, without fear and without reproach, the King of Saints, the Lord of loyal men, and in the providence of God that picture, printed upon a child's mind before it is hardened by sin, will do there God's own work.

"The Holy Ghost . . . shall teach you all things." "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth." Whitsunday is a rebuke to that type of modernism which is lacking in reverence for the past, which is lacking in firm hold on the truths of revealed religion. On the other hand, it is equally a rebuke for so-called fundamentalism, which is hostile to new truth. It was the fundamentalism of His day, the literalism of lifeless, crystallized Judaism, which opposed the spiritual teachings of Christ. It was the literalism of the Judaizing party in the early Church which St. Paul, the apostle of liberty, had to contend with in opening the doors of the Church to the Gentiles. It is the same lifeless, Christless, crystallized literalism which is to-day conspicuous in its hostility to the truths which have been made plain to us by the patient and reverent pursuit of truth through the study of the physical sciences. Day unto day of glorious scientific discovery has been uttering new speech of God's handiwork in nature. Night unto night has shown new knowledge of the immensities of His creation, and according to Christ's most true promise the Holy Spirit has guided disciples of a later day into truths sublime and new. But so-called fundamentalism will have none of this. It will not even tolerate the possession by others of a vision of God to which its own eyes are blind, a revelation of Him to which its own heart is cold.

Fundamentalism insists that the Bible be accepted after the manner in which Mohammedanism accepts the Koran, as a book written in heaven and free from any trace of human imperfection. It insists that the Bible is to be regarded not only as a divine revelation, which it is indeed, and not only as a sure guide in matter of religion, which it is, and not only as "containing all things necessary to salvation," which it does, but also as a text-book in geology, biology, anthropology, and every other science which has come into existence during the past two thousand years. Taking baldly the poetic opening chapters of Genesis, it flies to them for refuge from all the new light that science has been able to throw upon the story of the origins of life and its development. To those, on the other hand, who accept Christ's promise that the Spirit of truth will guide us into all truth, the Bible is a work not of magic but of inspiration. They rest upon His promise. They believe that in the past hundred years of scientific research God's Spirit has been guiding us into a truer understanding of God's creation. They believe that in these days of earnest and devoted scholarship God's Spirit is guiding us to a better understanding of the Bible. They are not afraid of Biblical criticism because they trust the Spirit of truth.

"I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth."

That is the ultimate truth for which this blessed day stands, the truth of inspiration. The extraordinary thing about the Church of Christ is not the presence in it of defects and limitations. The extraordinary thing about the Church is the vitality in it, its amazing capacity for restoration. In spite of all defects and limitations, in spite of the worldliness of so many of its members, in spite of the timidity and lack of faith and indifference and sloth of many, in spite of all the pitiful admixture of human weakness, we are never allowed to forget its divine origin. We are never allowed to forget that the Church is Spirit-born. Every now and then, when things have appeared to be at their worst, and vitality has ebbed away, suddenly there has come change, great, authentic, unmistakable, reminding men of its Pentecostal origin. The moral tone of Europe was purified and elevated for two centuries by the revival inaugurated by Francis of Assisi.

Mercy, gentleness, ministrations to the outcast and the degraded, distinguished those who caught and kept its fire. A few generations after that John Tauler and his converts were tried in the balances of the Black Death and were not found wanting. They alone remained to nurse the sick and dying. The Great Awakening in New England was followed by a crusade against intemperance and by an extraordinary quickening of missionary zeal. What the Wesleyan and Oxford movements did for England and her colonies must be told in terms of heightened standards of public morals, a deepened sense of personal responsibility, and a purifying of literature and speech. Always a great revival in the Church is reflected by a lifting of the moral standards of the community. It brings with it temperance, soberness, chastity, and above all it brings a springtide freshness of religious feeling, as of new created heaven and earth.

It is what we need to-day. The lack of it makes the wisest political counsels ineffective. The world from pole to pole is waiting for a healing and renewing which can only come from the breathing upon it of God's life-giving Spirit, making new departures possible for men.

Labor Sunday Message

Of the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches.

THE twelve months just closing have been marked by industrial events which, although of less sensational interest than those of the preceding year, have large significance for the industrial life of America. A period of unemployment has given way to a period of greater business activity and of rising wages. The upward swing of the business cycle has greatly altered the relative position of capital and labor in industrial relations. The activities of labor organizations are no longer so aggressively nor so successfully opposed, and the economic power of the unions is much increased. This economic advantage may indeed be but temporary, but while it lasts it is labor's opportunity to set new standards of public service.

With the essential aims of the labor movement, the Christian Church has deeply sympathized. The criticism is not without foundation, however, that both in its particular objectives and in the means by which they are sought, organized labor sometimes fails to take sufficient account of the needs of the whole community. The fault by no means rests with labor alone; when forced to devote all its energies to a defense of its right to live, the labor movement could not be expected to develop social leadership. But the new economic advantage which with the turn of the business tide has come to labor enhances the stewardship for which it must give an accounting. To the extent to which they are relieved of the necessity of defending rights, labor leaders may give their attention to more constructive undertakings.

Such complaint as may be fairly brought, from the Christian point of view, against the activities of American labor unions, arises out of the fact that they have placed too great emphasis upon the preservation of their own status and too little provision has been made for the growing demands of the community in goods and services. No permanent advantage can be gained by any group which does not enrich the life of the people as a whole. This has been repeatedly asserted and often demonstrated with respect to combinations of capital, and it is equally true of organizations of labor. Labor itself has as large a stake as any other group in the prompt and adequate fulfillment of the community's needs.

It is not to be denied that the distribution of the product of labor is far from equitable, and this fact inevitably weakens labor's incentive to produce. But the basic economic fact in America to-day is that instead of a surplus, the nation has an actual deficit; not enough goods are produced, even assuming the most equitable distribution, to provide the material needs of all our people. Labor cannot, of course, by its own efforts create an economic surplus. It may even be admitted that responsibility for greater industrial efficiency rests primarily with management. But the attainment of this end seems to be waiting upon the leadership of an industrial group that will give second place to defensive considerations in the interest of greater service. There must be a new lead, a breaking of the industrial deadlock. Would any other single act be so potent economically as a concerted effort by the great labor organizations to make industry a public service? The preponderance of economic power still rests with capital, but the improvement in labor's economic status has brought an extraordinary opportunity for moral leadership.

Employers have undoubtedly been too ready to make labor bear full responsibility for low production. Recurring periods of unemployment have struck fear into the hearts of workers, lest increased production should mean a flooding of the market with goods and a consequent shortage of employment. But this fear must give way to a fuller understanding of the nation's needs. In the future, labor unions must attempt more and more to justify themselves by functioning, as the guilds of the Middle Ages functioned, in creating, and to the limit of their power, preserving high standards of production. It is to the interest of labor, as well as of the community, that union membership should have a significance akin to that of membership in a profession. It should be a guarantee of the attainment of high standards in craftsmanship and of a higher order of integrity and fidelity.

We are not without examples of such industrial efficiency and statesmanship. Definite efforts have been made by more than one labor union to create higher standard of service. The absence of the skilled craftsmen from the railroad shops during the present strike has made the country newly aware of its dependence upon them. Likewise the maintenance of efficient production by means of a long-tried agreement in the garment trades proves that vigorous unionism is not incompatible with industrial efficiency, loyalty to the industry and orderly government. This regime of joint government has not ended strikes in the country, but it has very considerably reduced their number.

Not only the aims of labor but the methods by which they are sought must justify themselves before the conscience of the community. In this connection, several events of the year should be instructive to the leaders of the labor movements.

The continuance on several of the railroads of the conflict, now more than a year old, over recognition of the shop crafts' unions, has caused great hardship to the striking employees, enormous expense to the railroads, and a very considerable hazard to traffic. The public has been divided in its attitude, but the resentment caused by the interruption of transportation has made it almost impossible to secure attention to the issues involved. From some points of view the results of such a contest may, in the minds of those who participate, justify the undertaking. Nevertheless, labor cannot afford to overlook the cost and the hazard to its own cause that are entailed by an appeal to economic force.

This does not mean that the effectiveness of collective action by working men can be doubted, or that the propriety of such action should be questioned. The material gains to the working people of America which have resulted from organized effort on their own part cannot be denied. It would be superficial to say that the continuance of strikes is necessarily an evidence of a lack of social motive on the part of labor organizations.

It is quite conceivable that serious labor disturbances may be rather an evidence of a devotion to high ideals of liberty. There have been undoubted examples of justifiable and splendidly executed struggles on the part of labor. What is essential, however, from the social and Christian point of view, is that the aim of every act on the part of labor should square with labor's declared purpose to raise the standard of life for the whole community.

Of much import are the developments of the last few weeks with reference to the long continued regime of the twelve-hour day in the steel industry. An appeal to public opinion based solely upon a regard for the human values involved has brought an unequivocal declaration from the industry that the twelve-hour day would be shortly abandoned. Might not this end have been accomplished much earlier by an insistent and sustained appeal to the nation on the part of organized labor? Labor has played an important part in developing public opinion with reference to this question, but it can hardly be doubted that the labor movement has given too little attention to the possibilities of an appeal to the great body of public opinion which it has helped to create. It is inevitable, and just, that when elemental rights of working men are persistently denied, their economic power should make itself felt in protest, but even then that protest can be effective only in so far as labor commands the confidence of the community as to the breadth of its vision and the sincerity of its purpose.

Of perhaps equal significance is the continuing record for orderly settlement of disputes, in strongly organized industries, through jointly maintained arbitration machinery operating under an impartial chairman. An important feature of this new development is the increasing dependence that certain labor organizations are placing upon research and upon the substitution of proved facts for partisan propaganda and warlike methods. As labor becomes more secure in its rights to collective action, the community expects that an appeal to fairness and justice will take the place of an appeal to force. This does not mean weaker organization; on the contrary, it means more effective organization. But it means that such organization shall justify itself by its social purpose rather than its might.

Labor very properly insists that as its dependence upon economic power is lessened, the moral responsibility of the community increases. There can be no question that the public interest is paramount, but it is coming to be recognized that in time of excitement and stress the most conspicuous factor is less likely to be the public interest than the public's immediate convenience. It will not do to substitute for arbitrary action on the part of labor an equally arbitrary action on the part of the State. In one of his last public utterances, President Harding declared himself against any legislative attempt to compel men, or any group of men, to work against their will, even when a public utility was involved. It is true that this principle has not been fully established in the public mind, but the statement of the late President may perhaps be taken as defining the American public policy on this important issue. Can there be any question that the price of such freedom is increasingly wise and conscientious action on the part of organized labor?

The trend toward a greater measure of social control by no means affects labor alone; witness the report recently made public by the Federal Coal Commission on the anthracite branch of the industry. Perhaps more notable than any specific recommendations in that report is the doctrine laid down that the industry in question "cannot continue to be treated as if it were not affected by a public interest." Can anyone doubt that the great basic industries will be increasingly held to be "affected by a public interest," or that in the development of public policy with reference to them, the primacy of that interest will be increasingly asserted? Labor has an important stake in the application of this principle. Justice in industry rests upon mutuality of responsibility and the greatest possible approach to equality of privilege. It is for this reason that spokesmen of organized religion have been reluctant to call upon labor to abandon aggressive measures, when these measures constituted the only means of balancing the economic power of capital. But as the community checks of the aggressiveness of capital; as it increases the stated obligations and reduces the immunities of industrial employers, labor must expect to be likewise judged by more exacting social standards.

Another issue that labor must face is that involved in the countrywide controversy over the closed shop. The question cannot be settled by a mere declaration of abstract principles. It must be worked out with patience and mutual respect by the parties involved. To the ardent supporter of trade unionism there is no violation of individual freedom in the closed shop principles. He considers it quite as just as the compulsory payment of taxes on the ground of participation in common benefits. From this point of view the individual worker has a moral obligation to the labor movement. But this doctrine cannot be impressed upon the community by force. Open-minded employers are coming to recognize the right of labor to organize and the impropriety and injustice of any interference by employers with such activity. This recognition is far from universal, but it will be increasingly difficult for employers to withhold it, if labor uses its power wisely. Possessed of the right peaceably to persuade workmen to affiliate with the labor movement, may not the representatives of organized labor abandon aggressive attempts, where they are now practised, to enforce union membership through the instrument of the closed shop? The labor movement aims fundamentally to give the worker greater security of status, freedom of expression, and a juster share in the product of his labor. It can hardly be maintained that this ideal is consistent with the use of compulsion, either upon a fellow worker, or upon an employer, in the matter of membership in a labor union.

The controversy over accountability of labor organizations for their own acts has too often taken the form of a demand for drastic court action or for some purely legal device to insure responsibility. The liability of labor organizations for damages resulting from unlawful acts has now been established by the United States Supreme Court. In the light of this fact it can hardly be longer contended that labor is legally responsible. But the ultimate question is one of ethics more than of law; responsibility is not accounted for by the mere satisfaction of a legal formula. There can be no doubt that the continuing power and influence of organized labor, and its standing with the community at large, will depend in great measure upon the degree to which it can be said that labor's word is as good as its bond.

It seems fitting and useful to call attention to these facts as Labor Day for 1923 approaches. Organized labor in America is faced by an unusual opportunity. The liberal policy toward labor organizations which was adopted during the war under the patronage of the Government was all but obscured during the depressing period; but it is probable that in a fair test the public will support the right of labor, uncoerced and uncoercing, to organize on a trade union basis and to bargain collectively through appointed representatives for the improvement of its own conditions. It thus becomes more and more incumbent upon labor to make an earnest effort to introduce social ideals into industry.

The labor movement has a history of important achievement and of patriotic service. It promises to be greater in the future than in the past. But the public will increasingly insist, and the teachings of religion require, that in undertaking to serve the workers organized labor should serve the whole people. In no other way can the interests of labor itself be permanently advanced.

There is reason to believe that organized labor is not unaware of its opportunity and the responsibility which it entails. The recent appeal of the American Federation of Labor for the observance of Labor Sunday gives a clear recognition of the spiritual factors in industrial relations and declares the essentially spiritual aims of the labor movement. This statement commands the respectful attention of the public. The public in turn will expect that the spiritual aims of the labor movement will make themselves manifest in very definite ways during the new period upon which we have entered.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—II.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

II. WHAT IS THE LABOR MOVEMENT?

THE industrial age in the midst of which we now are is taken for granted as inevitable by most of us. Occasionally, to be sure, a writer comes forward like Edward Carpenter, with his "Civilization, Its Cause and Cure," or Arthur J. Penty, with his "Old Worlds for New," and seriously proposes that we should retrace our steps and go back to where the Industrial Revolution found us. But such a course puts a great strain on the imagination, and seems inconsistent with the strongest tendencies of modern life in accord with which it becomes more intricate and its processes become more scientific and technical. Most people who deplore the human consequences of our high-speed industrial régime nevertheless look for the remedy not in the scrapping of our machines, but in making them our servants rather than our masters.

This is the position now taken by the labor movement. There was a time when the workers rebelled angrily against man-displacing machines, and at first the British Government was inclined to support them. The gig-mill was prohibited in 1552 and 1555 by acts of Parliament, which also restricted the number of looms that one person might own. But it would probably be hard to find now a labor organization with any such obstructionist purposes. Labor accepts as a matter of course the whole régime of machine production. There is no apparent desire among workingmen to go back to the days of the craft guilds. To be sure, the slowing down of machine processes by the workers and the limitation of output by both parties in industry are always live questions. But no representative spokesman for labor is ready to-day to advocate anything less than the full and efficient use of our national industrial plan. Mr. Gompers himself has put the matter thus: "The question of increased production is not a question of putting upon the toilers a more severe strain; it is a question of the elimination of outworn policies—a question of the introduction of the very best in machinery and methods of management."

But if we accept the material and mechanical accompaniments of the modern industrial system, how can we escape the fundamental change in human relations within industry to which the new system has given rise? Here are tens of thousands of men in a single industry, whose industrial status is determined by the same employer or groups of employers, whose homes are perforce located in the same congested communities, and whose social satisfactions are limited by the same stern necessity. Could we expect anything else than that they would develop what the sociologists call a "consciousness of kind"—or, in the current vernacular, "class-consciousness"?

What in reality is this labor movement which appears so aggressively upon the scene every now and then to interrupt the current of our peaceful industrial life? The public is, generally speaking, aware of labor unions only when there is a labor disturbance. The unions make a demand and threaten to stop work if it is not complied with; upon which the public assumes very much the attitude of King Ahab in the presence of Elijah, crying, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" The employer takes up the accusation and labor replies—to preserve the Scriptural parallel—"I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house!" Thereupon ensues a bitter contest marked by constant recriminations, in which the effort to fix blame upon one group or the other often obscures the real cause of the disturbance. By the time peace is restored and production resumed, usually through the exhaustion of one side or the other, the public is weary of the whole matter and ready to forget it. Hence the labor union becomes synonymous in most people's minds with the labor strike.

This idea of labor unions is far from accurate, but there is a measure of truth in it which may as well be taken account of at the outset. The "fear psychology" which has characterized the labor movement has been conducive to aggression when opportunity offered, just as the French fear of German invasion has led France to initiate on her own part a course of aggressive harshness in disregard of her Allies. Labor leaders have for the most part been chosen with reference to the strategy of conflict and controversy, rather than for their wisdom and integrity. The labor organizer is not always an attractive figure or a factor of constructive peace. He has to be a sort of drummer whose main business it is to increase the organization membership. "Hence," say the Webbs, in that notable History of Trade Unionism, "the greater part of the organizer's time is taken up in maintaining the enthusiasm of his members and in sweeping in the new converts. This involves constant traveling, and the whirl of excitement implied in the everlasting round of missions in non-union districts. The typical organizer of a labor union approximates, therefore, more closely than any other figure in the trade union world to the middle-class conception of a trade union official. He is, in fact, a professional agitator. He may be a saint, or he may be an adventurer, but he is seldom a man of affairs." This is the testimony of the foremost authorities on trade unionism, recognized as such within the labor movement itself. It sounds strangely like what many employers say. It was written more than twenty-five years ago, but it is still probably not far from an accurate portrayal. There need be no argument about the defects and faults of labor organizers: the true friends of the movement admit them.

Having said this, however, we shall do well to recall the statement of the great English Quaker employer, Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, who reminds us that so long as the British employers chose to fight the labor movement rather than to co-operate with it, British labor elected to leadership its best fighters; but after the employers abandoned belligerent tactics and took labor unionism for granted, labor in turn began to put forward diplomats and statesmen instead of fighters. Can any careful observer doubt that our situation in America is susceptible of the same analysis? We shall recur to this phase of the subject when we take up the question of the closed shop.

The fact is, however, that no labor union worthy of the name is interested chiefly in striking. Such an organization would be comparable to a nation that preferred war to peace as a matter of general practise. Striking is serious and painful and hazardous business. It is not part of a labor union's normal activity. Its very existence grows out of the necessity, from the workers' point of view, of keeping the wheels of industry turning and keeping the pay envelope filled.

The functions and activities of the labor union are many. In its simplest terms it is a social organization. The "local" is a club whose activities in normal times may be but little different from those of a fraternity chapter. Once established the local union might continue indefinitely without reference to its industrial program.

The organizing principle, however, of the trade union is insurance against unemployment and underpayment and a defense against long hours and overwork. It may be questioned whether the trade union movement would ever have become strong and articulate solely for aggressive purposes. As a well known student of trades unionism has said, "Rights grow out of wrongs and wrongs come first." The efforts of the unions during the war to raise their wages was for the most part an effort to resist a virtual reduction, that is to say, a lessening of purchasing power due to generally rising prices. And the strikes following the war during the period of deflation were largely an effort to hold what labor felt had been earned by war-time efforts. It is a mistake to suppose that the unions uniformly demanded a continuance of "peak" wages when the cost of living was rapidly declining. In a multitude, probably the vast majority of cases, the unions accepted proportionate reductions without resistance.

The strike fund of the union is in reality an insurance fund. Indeed, Professor Commons has recently advised labor to invest its money on a large scale in strike funds as the best form of insurance and a virtual guarantee against the necessity of striking.

The labor unions are organized in a manner not unlike our large ecclesiastical bodies. There is the local union known as "Local No. So-and-So," which may represent the craft or industry in question for a whole town or for a small area of a large city. Then comes the district organization, which has general supervision over and responsibility for the locals within its area. This is roughly comparable to the conferences or presbytery or classis of our ecclesiastical organization, save that the districts are usually larger. Finally, there is the national union, which is the supreme authority, and which operates in accord with a large body of constitutional law. Sometimes the union as a whole is known as the "international," but that means only that it has affiliations in Canada or Mexico. The great labor unions of America have no organic relations with those of other countries.

Another parallel to the form of church organization is found in the labor federation. The locals in a city, representing a great variety of trades and industries may associate themselves in a Central Trades and Labor Council, and all such organizations may form a State Federation of Labor. These are inter-union organizations and they tend to effect harmony of purpose and unity of action. Each union, however, retains power over its own funds and the determination of its policy. The culmination of labor organization is in the American Federation of Labor, with which the great national unions, with a number of exceptions, are affiliated. The Federation, however, like the Federal Council of Churches, has no power over the policy of the units which compose it. It is a consultative body having very limited powers of action, but because of its representative character it is extremely influential and powerful.

A very important distinction in labor union theory must be recognized between "craft unionism" and "industrial unionism." The former type is trade unionism proper. It is the form approved by the American Federation of Labor and prevailing, though not exclusively, within it. In the craft union the workers of a single craft act as a unit and may or may not co-operate with the workers in another craft within the same industry. The industrial union, on the other hand, a type of which is found in the United Mine Workers of America, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, combines all the crafts and the "common labor" in the coal mining industry in a single strong — national union. The advantages of this form of organization for certain forms of action is obvious. On the other hand, there is a strong preference among many American labor leaders for the craft principle. The subject relates itself closely to that of revolutionary labor movements which will occupy our attention later.

The Church and the Mass Spirit

By Rev. G. W. Eggleston

of Marcus, Iowa

SO much has been said of late about the Church and its relation to the workingman, the masses, capital and labor, and kindred subjects, that there would seem to be no more room for discussion. In our opinion, much of the criticism of the Church has been overdrawn for the reason that some phases of the situation have been overlooked, so eager have been the opponents to fasten the stigma of failure where they are sure it belongs.

No one element has entered so largely into the difficulties of the work of the Church, and at the same time has been so completely overlooked or ignored, as the mass spirit, the outgrowth of the diminishing power of individuality, as it has been submerged in the massing of men in the great commercial and industrial organizations of the country. It is increasingly customary for large concerns to deal with their men through delegated representatives of unions or brotherhoods who present grievances and make demands in the name of and by the authority of the organization concerned. No individual is considered unless his case is related directly to that of the whole body, for it is a well understood fact that individual matters presented by individuals will receive no reasonable consideration, and many employers will not take up an individual's case without representations from the organization to which he belongs. Thus the massing of forces has reduced individuality to the minimum. Powers that rightfully belong to the individual man have been taken over by his organization. It becomes his brain, for it does his thinking; it becomes his tongue, for it does his speaking; it regulates his conception of justice by formulating a standard which is to be his guide in his dealings with his enemies, and, as may be supposed, it stands higher in his estimation than almost anything else in the world. It enters his home and influences his family. His wife and children take up the battle and wage it as persistently and fearlessly as does the husband and father. Some years ago I was entertained in the home of an engineer on the Northern Pacific Railroad in Montana. Because of his long service with the company he was given an easy run which allowed him to be at home every night. There was talk at the time of a strike on the road and I asked him one evening if he would go out with the brotherhood should they decide to strike. His wife answered for him by saying emphatically, "Indeed we would. Our brotherhood stands above everything else."

Herein lies the secret of the workingman's estrangement from the Church. His labor organization directs his thought and has turned it away from the Church. He gets his idea of the Church, not from the Church, or from anything friendly to it, but from his union. He hears it denounced in speech and remark as the "rich man's club," and knowing the rich man only as an enemy, he puts the Church down in the same class and leaves it out of his consideration.

For this condition the Church is not to blame. It has had no opportunity to direct the channels of industrial development—the capitalist has had that in hand. Indeed, it has often been asked to step aside with its program of the heart and give place to the world's program of the head. The cold, calculating dominance of brains has built up a great system of finance and the heart of the Church and of the Christ has not been permitted to touch it with the spirit of love and truth. The centuries have been marked with trails of blood and greed for personal gain because the head has been allowed to predominate. The disgraceful procedure should have shamed the new-born centuries had they not continued the processes of their fathers and placed the utmost confidence in the ability of brains alone to do that which was best for the world.

Christ established His Church on the basis of heart supremacy in the individual. The world has established the supremacy of the head as the ruling factor and the masses or classes as the medium, and these to-day are cursing the world.

But the wise critic says: "How came the Church to such an impotent condition? It was ordained to overthrow the works of darkness, and why has it not done it?" For the same reason that Christ did "not many mighty works" in the land of His youth "because of their unbelief." The "offended" people limited His work and His influence so that if He were to do His best work He must depart from them, which He did.

The organized masses have not given either Christ or His Church a fair chance. The door has been shut and the divinely ordained agencies cannot and will not force an entrance. Governments and peoples have expressed or implied no inclination to recognize the hand of God, the salvation of His Son, Jesus Christ, or the leadership of the churches in the affairs of nations and of men. No considerations of state are settled on the basis of Christ's teachings. Capital and labor meet with no intention of settling their disputes in harmony with the spirit of the Prince of Peace. They have massed their forces to prevent any such rigid applications of the principles of right. In fact, they know that if these principles prevail every man would obtain what was his right and no more. They all want more, as much more as they can wring from their opponents.

When mass rule shall have worn itself out, as it eventually will, and men think in terms of human brotherhood without reference to industrial differences and distinctions, then and only then will the Church of Jesus Christ find its true place and work in the leadership of men.

The Church to-day 'needs a chance, not a criticism; it needs open human hearts, not soulless labor unions and capitalistic organizations on which to work; it needs doors thrown open and an entrance invited, instead of barred doors and surly invitations to break them down if it thinks it can;

it needs an opportunity to remould human opinion and link it with divine love in that fellowship which abides through time and eternity. Give the Church a chance at the hearts of men in every walk of life and it will recreate the world on the basis of God's desire and purpose.

What Labor Thinks of the Church

A Symposium

[The following is a portion of a symposium printed in "The Homiletic Review."]

SOME surprising answers have rewarded our letter to labor leaders and the editors of the labor press asking for information regarding labor's attitude toward the Church. The old antipathy is breaking. To a gratifying extent, it has already vanished. Serious misunderstandings remain, it is true, and we give first place, accordingly, to the expressions of unfriendliness. They are significant. Many of them will be found instructive, as the writers speak with entire candor and now and then reveal clerical shortcomings which clergymen will know how to correct. But in studying these expressions of ill-feeling, the reader is requested to remember that they are followed by letters displaying an altogether different spirit—a spirit not only new and startling, but in the situation it discloses, highly encouraging.

In our letter we said:

What do you believe to be the general attitude of labor toward the Church? Is it true, as one labor leader has stated, that "the Church is not for workers but for business men and employers"? Do you agree with another labor leader who says, "I don't think very much of the Church because the Church doesn't think very much about us"? Do you believe that when he moved to town he "found out that the city church has no use for the man who wears overalls"?

Is the Church performing the service it should perform among working people, or is it holding too much aloof? Are the criticisms quoted above just? Or are they too harsh? If you believe them to be true, what do you think the Church should do about it? What steps can the Church take to prove its sincere interest in the working man? What do you recommend? What has been the effect upon labor of the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike and the Federal Council of Churches' attitude on the open shop and the coal strike?

C. F. Stoney, former editor of "The Intra-Mountain Worker" (Salt Lake City) replies:

(1). I believe the general attitude of labor toward the Church to be antagonistic.

(2). I would modify the statement of the labor leader a little, making it more plain and definite, and say that the Church caters to the business men and employers and disregards the cause of the toiling masses.

(3). The labor leader who said that he didn't think much of the Church, because the Church didn't think much of the workers, had good grounds for the statement.

(4). I agree with the union official who says that the city church has no use for the man who wears overalls.

(5). The Church is not performing the service that it should perform among working people; it is holding too much aloof.

(6). These criticisms are, in my judgment, just, and not too harsh.

(7). I believe that the Church should "bout face," "clean house," "weed out the followers of mammon," and proceed to teach and practise the doctrines of Christ which are embodied in the Golden Rule and the Second Great Commandment.

(8). There is only one way that the Church can prove its sincere interest in the workingman, and that is to take up the cause of the working man, which is a demand for justice.

(9). I would suggest that the Church cease to follow after gold or be guided by men of vast wealth, and follow in the footsteps of Christ, teaching as he taught and doing as he did, through which course they will build up the brotherhood of man, which will tear down the barriers that to-day are holding the great world classes apart.

(10). As to the effect on labor of the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike, and the Federal Council of Churches' attitude on the open shop and the coal strike, they are regarded as mere incidents. The workers have come to feel that big business controls the Church as it does everything else; and they feel that these are incidents in the general progress to keep the working class in a condition through which their masters can the more readily handle them. . . . The men who occupy the pulpits of to-day are the representatives of the business world. They will tell me that it is right that I be a good servant and obey my master; that there are poor and rich in the world; and that it is part of God's plan that there should be. The working man knows that he will not hear the doctrines of Christ taught; but instead, the doctrines of commercialism, backed by militarism and imperialism, clothed in the robes of "citizenship," from the business man's point of view. As his mind reflects along these lines, and the conditions multiply before him, he may be heard to say: "To hell with the Church and all religion! They have nothing for me, only slavery."

Special interest attaches to the letter sent us by Albert F. Coyle, editor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' "Journal," who writes:

This matter is very much upon my heart, since I at one time intended to enter the ministry, and even now hold a B. D. degree from the Yale Divinity School. I mention this so that you can appreciate that what I have to say comes out of an eager sympathy for what the Church is trying to do, and a very genuine desire that it will remain true to the social ideals of its great Founder. Frankly I believe that the general attitude of labor toward the Church is one of suspicion and distrust. . . . I question whether this attitude is warranted, but it is nevertheless a fact. Why? I think it is largely due to lack of contact, to a failure on the part of both the Church and labor to understand the other's aspirations and ideals.

You ask, What can the Church do to prove its sincere interest in the workingman? Just the same things that you would do if you wanted to prove to an individual that you were his genuine friend. You would evidence a vital interest in his problems, you would champion his cause in so far as it was right, and you would speak out frankly to correct it in case it were wrong. With a few brilliant exceptions, the Church has done nothing of the sort. It has satisfied itself by adopting a social creed, and then sitting back and letting things go on just as before.

The Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike, and the attitude of the Federal Council of Churches on the open shop and the coal strike, the bishop's program of the Catholic Church, and the fearless utterances of such men as Father John A. Ryan and Rabbi Stephen S. Wise are effective in demonstrating that certain great leaders of the Church are sincerely concerned with the lot of the workingman. I have mentioned this fact to countless labor leaders, and the invariable response has been, "Yes, it is all right on paper, but what are those fellows doing for us in this city?" I realize that such a reply is unjustly shortsighted, but what else can you expect of a man whose only contact, for instance, with the Church which Bishop McConnell represents is through a narrow-visioned clergyman who exhibited none of the bishop's deep social sympathy and zeal for industrial justice? . . . I am a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

S. Yankowsky, who edits "Justice" for the International Ladies' Garment Workers' union, tells us:

The Church . . . is with the strong. When labor will have become a force, then and then only will the Church be with labor. It is strange—the Church ought to be with and for the weak, the helpless, the down-trodden; but as a matter of history, the Church has always been the mainstay of the oppressor, of the mighty, of the rich. If the Church does sometimes lift its voice for labor, it does it halfheartedly, and only for a short while—then it assumes the usual attitude of indifference toward the exploitation of man by man. Of course in the Church there are a few good men, who are imbued with the true religious spirit, but they are the exception.

Such is the opinion expressed also by William L. Harfel, editor of "The Weekly Dispatch," who writes:

From reports all over the country it has been gleaned that in communities where the open shop situation was the most aggravated, the preachers were noticeable for their stand in this matter. Those of the big churches were notably silent. They had nothing to gain, as their retainers were from the ranks of the great and mighty. Those of smaller dimensions could not afford to take the workers' side as the support that paid the expenses of the parish would be jeopardized. While there were a very few notable exceptions, they were the acts of the individual preachers of strong mind and independent thought rather than the expression of that particular creed of denomination.

The editor of the "Journal of the Switchmen's Union," W. H. Thompson, complains that—

The Churches' action in the late Steel Workers' Strike affords a good illustration of their aloofness at a time when their co-operation, if exerted at the time most needed, would likely have effected a victory for those crushed steel workers, and have won for them the eight-hour work-day and privilege of contractual relationship with those companies which in their postliminious report they acknowledged those workers were entitled to.

Writes John P. Frey, editor of "The International Molders' Journal":

Even to-day many clergymen feel that their duty toward wage-earners has been performed when they state that the industrial problem can not be solved until employers are more influenced by the spirit of the Carpenter of Nazareth. Such a general statement is much worse than nothing to the intelligent wage-earner, who knows that when there is a specific evil it should be exposed and attacked.

In Tacoma, Washington, John McGivney edits "The Labor Advocate." He says:

The general attitude of labor toward the Church is one of indifference. . . . The reason for this is a feeling that the Church is indifferent to labor. . . . In many industrial centers most of the churches depend upon the support of financial and commercial interests for their upkeep. Few pastors but take pride in a large and imposing church edifice and, to put over such a project, big business must be catered to. The man who holds the pocket-book will, if dominant in the Church (and he usually is), dominate also the attitude of the Church toward labor. . . .

Labor is keenly alive to any discrepancy which many of the preachers may show in preaching and practise. I find among all sorts and conditions of the workers a uniform contempt for men like Billy Sunday, and intelligent labor officials have laughed at . . . the man and his methods, while openly contemptuous of those churches which use him to "revive" their anemic congregations, and the uses which big business is accustomed to put him to as their sole spiritual depository. . . .

The Church too, I mean organized religion, has been so closely identified with "official charity" that frankly it is become a hissing and a byword in the minds of the most intelligent in the labor movement who have taken note of the utter lack of love and kindness in that same official charity.

Ellis Searles, editor of "The United Mine Workers' Journal," brings a similar charge against welfare work:

There is too much "welfare" and not enough real religion in most of the churches. Laboring people have been surfeited with "welfare" and annoyed almost to distraction by "welfare workers," whose principal business appears to be to pry into the most sacred and confidential matters.

President F. B. Wood of the Nonpartisan League, "an organization of farmers to secure political power that economic injustice may be diminished and that farmers may be more prosperous," says:

Our movement has suffered considerably from opposition of many ministers and has been helped by a few. . . . Our opponents have persistently tried to show us as opposed to the Church and to the home as well as to our country. A great number of ministers have accepted and acted on this claptrap of politicians on their mere say so. They do not even do a little reasoning on the matter, such as, Could we Leaguers be such fools as to commit these sins which no one commits who aims at political power?

My general complaint as to church attitude as affecting our organization is that churchmen take too much for granted from "high places." And, "high places"—governors, courts, money-kings—are about as far from Christian ideals to-day as they were in New Testament times.

Several correspondents feel that ministers as a class are unfitted by their training and environment to reach the working class. For example, H. Arends, editor of "The Labor Journal," writes:

In general the minister is raised and educated in another atmosphere than the workingman, few have really worked and gone through the sufferings and hardships workers have to contend with from the cradle. If they have been brought up in a workingman's home the very fact that they want to become ministers shows they are looking forward to something soft. If they have the right principles at the start and make up their minds to follow the true teachings of Christ closely, they have to be exceedingly strong of character. If they are, they will become a failure as ministers. A minister has to cater to the dominating element in his locality in order to make a living. A minister can not teach true Christianity; if he does, he loses his job. It is hard for a minister, after spending all the time to become one, to do something else. Christ associated with the lowly, the people who worked; a minister under the present church system can not do it; the few who do it are severely criticized by their brother ministers and by their congregations.

Teaching real Christianity in the Church is not possible. Therefore we have no hope that the Church will at any time be of any benefit to the labor movement.

Meanwhile, H. M. Fallen, managing editor of "The Advance," official organ of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, observes:

The system of social relationships in which professional churchmen operate and on which they depend for their livelihood and standing is exceedingly complicated. They are themselves, judging by their wages, an exploited part of the "white collar" community. No matter what ideals they may start with, they will end with a set of habits determined by the necessities of conduct imposed on them by their position. Only the foot-loose, the inspired, and those of so great distinction that they need no longer be afraid, have ever been able to form a new sect with heterodox opinions regarding social policy and service.

Still more unsympathetic is a letter from W. F. Dunne, editor of "The Butte Bulletin," who asserts:

The churches have no function in modern society except that of bulwarking the existing order, because the doctrines they preach are untrue and serve only to befog the real issues in the struggle that labor is waging all over the world against the oppression of a privileged minority. During the late war for democracy the churches of all denominations were the most energetic supporters of the war-mongers in their respective nations and even outdid the profiteers and professional patriots in hounding those who tried to show the utterly material issues involved and the crime against humanity that was being committed.

The churches, then, have still to combat a great deal of antipathy in their effort to win the workers. But the outlook is hopeful. Many of our correspondents side strongly with the churches.

Turning to this class of replies to our letter, we find, for example, that James Duncan, international president of the Granite Cutters' International Association of America, denies in toto the charges preferred against the Church.

I do not agree with the statement that "the Church is not for workers but for business men and employers." I do not agree with the expression, "I don't think very much of the Church because the Church does not think very much about us." I do not agree with the statement of the man who "found out that the city church has no use for the man who wears overalls."

These are extreme expressions by individuals who are more governed by prejudice than by normal reasoning. A man with overalls would not be expected by a church to go to church in his overalls, nor would he care to do so himself. . . . Those expressions come very largely from men who have heard sermons or addresses in churches in which the working man is strongly advised by the parson to be satisfied with his conditions and to obey his employer, and which harks back to the "master and the servant" proposition.

Writing from the New York headquarters of the American Federation of Labor, Hugh Frayne, general organizer, remarks:

Organized labor is not unfriendly to the Church; working people generally are not. In fact, representatives of organized labor nationally and locally are constantly meeting, conferring, and co-operating with the representatives of the churches in movements of all kinds that have for their purpose the betterment of humanity generally.

I have no complaint to make and no criticism to offer in regard to what the churches generally have been doing. As time goes on those who now do not understand as well as they should will join forces with those who have been and are still active in the work and much good will come from these efforts, not only to the working people economically, morally, and spiritually, but it will reflect itself on the nation as a whole.

Says L. H. Moore, editor of the "Union Labor Bulletin":

I believe that the Church and labor are beginning to co-operate. . . . That the Church has viewed organized labor with suspicion is perhaps true, but that feeling is rapidly disappearing as the result of education as to organized labor's real mission. I have the honor of belonging to the People's Baptist Church of this city and know that it is thoroughly in sympathy with the working men.

Specific instances are related by Harry W. Semple, managing editor of "The Trades Union News," who tells us:

In prominent churches of leading American cities labor speakers frequently are to be heard addressing sympathetic congregations. In the largest Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, on a recent Sunday night, a member of a labor union spoke from the pulpit on the subject of "Labor and Capital," the radio broadcasting his utterances.

In the Central Labor Union of Philadelphia clergymen often have taken part in the discussions of the delegates at the meetings, which are held on Sundays. They always have been welcomed and what they have said invariably has received the most respectful attention. For many years an eminent clergyman of Philadelphia has been an honorary delegate of the Central Labor Union of Philadelphia.

Throughout the great coal mining districts of Pennsylvania the relations of the Church and the mine workers are as close as family ties. In all controversies between the mine workers and the operators the Church has supported the cause of the mine workers. The influence of the Church with the mine workers is a remarkable feature of the industry.

It benefits the workers and the community. It is exercised for the general welfare and for law and order. It is a dominant factor in preserving peace during strikes.

In the long and bitter struggle of the mine workers and the operators last year, a persistent and effective part in negotiations for a settlement was taken voluntarily by a Pennsylvania priest, acting for the mine workers. . . .

John M. Work, editorial writer for the Milwaukee "Leader," describes himself as:

A Socialist, a union man, and a religious man, though not a member of any Church. . . . When I meet a worker who is a member of a Church, I advise him to stay in it. I have only the kindest feelings toward the Church, even though I criticize it sometimes. In the labor movement some of the immediate things I work for are material, but my ultimate object is wholly spiritual.

You ask for recommendations. I would suggest these:

1. That preachers and priests, in and out of church services, dress like other folks.
2. That church services be made simple and straightforward.
3. That women be placed on an equality with men, in the pulpit and otherwise.
4. That the Church be anti-war and pro-peace, in war time as well as in peace time.
5. That less attention be given to doctrine, and more to practical suggestions for self-development, physical, mental, moral, and spiritual.
6. That the Church actively support labor unions in their struggle for better conditions.
7. That the Church aggressively support good proposed legislation—such as anti-injunction bills, unemployment insurance bills, minimum wage bills, maximum hour bills, old age pension bills, court curbing bills, public ownership bills, etc.—sending delegations of Church members to speak before legislative and Congressional committees in behalf of such proposals.
8. That the Church ardently support the movement toward the co-operative commonwealth, as the essential method of putting Christianity into practise and opening the way to higher spiritual development.

Says B. A. Larger, general secretary of the United Garment Workers of America:

The Church is doing all it possibly can for the workers today. It should not attempt to interfere with labor organizations. That would not be good for the Church or the workers either.

Similarly, the editor of "The Labor World," W. E. McEwen, tells us:

There is a happy rivalry among the several big Church organizations and each seems to be endeavoring to outdo the other in the character of the social service it is rendering.

Daniel J. Tobin, general president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers, and treasurer of the American Federation of Labor, affirms:

Any one who makes a statement that the Church in general is not friendly to labor, is either very ignorant or very much prejudiced against religion in general.

I say to you candidly that the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike was, in my judgment, one of the most helpful documents that has been published in the last fifty years in bringing about a better understanding as to the cruelties and crimes perpetrated on the steel workers by the men who control enormous industries.

The Federal Council of Churches is doing splendid work. Their investigation of the coal strike was extremely helpful because, while they publish nothing that is not already known to the workers, their report and bulletin reaches the masses of those who are sometimes opposed to labor, many of whom are wealthy and inclined to be fair if they knew the facts.

Phil. E. Ziegler, editor of "The Railway Clerk," is of the same opinion:

There has come a change in the churches' attitude toward the problems of the workers. Social aims are being substituted for theological opinions. Social redemption, the kingdom of heaven on earth, is coming to be regarded as rightfully the supreme concern of the Church. The splendid statement of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ and the National Catholic Welfare Council on industrial and social problems; the stand taken by these and other churches—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish—on the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively, employ representation in management, a more equitable distribution of the products of labor; the courageous report of the Interchurch World Movement on the steel strike; the attitude of the Federal Council on the open shop and the coal and railroad strikes, have left little to be desired by labor. The influence of these great Church bodies is beginning to be felt. Their ringing declarations in favor of labor's aims, the establishment of human brotherhood, and the elimination of economic injustice—has, I believe, done much to restore the workers' interest and renew their contact with the Church.

In general agreement with this statement, some of them adding appreciation of the churches' good work in supporting the coal and the railroad strikes are many others.

Of all the letters, the most enthusiastic perhaps, is one from John F. McNamee, editor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's "Magazine." Speaking of the Interchurch Report and similar measures, he predicts:

The effect will undoubtedly be to cause outstanding figures in the labor world to take a prominent part in the work of the Church.

The Anglo-Catholic Congress: What Does it Mean?

[NOTE: Several thousand men and women from all over England recently assembled in London for the Anglo-Catholic Congress. Over a week was spent in great gatherings and crowded services. It was planned evidently with the idea of showing the strength of the Catholic party in the Anglican Church. The following editorial from the "Christian World" of London is a very interesting review of the Congress by a well-known Free Churchman.—EDITORS.]

IT is said that a box was placed at Cardinal Bourne's disposal at the Albert Hall for his representative to follow the doings of the Anglo-Catholic Congress, but it is not reported that any representative of English Nonconformity was offered so much as a back seat. One does not complain of this. When you are going with full press of sail on one tack it is useless to pretend you are on the opposite tack. The message sent to the Pope is another good and honest admission of the bearings that have been taken in the present movement. Tributes were paid at the Congress to the men who began the Oxford movement ninety years ago in college quadrangles and quiet country parsonages, though there does not seem to be much similarity between the scholarship and restraint of men like Pusey and Keble and Church and Isaac Williams and these dazzling limelight campaigns. But what does the Anglo-Catholic Congress really mean?

We must put aside at once the crude idea that Anglo-Catholicism is preparing a surrender to the Pope, or has the least idea of bringing back an Italian jurisdiction into the English Church. To say that it has treachery up its sleeve is to miss the real strength of the movement. Such a view is partly a controversial prejudice, and partly it arises because so many have made the position a bridge-head towards Rome. But that is very far from being the intention of the movement. If the Holy Father is waiting, as the Bishop of Zanzibar said, then he will wait a very long time indeed if he expects a Canossa. There is nothing of that kind in the wind. The dream of the Anglo-Catholic is something much greater than a surrender to the Pope. He thinks to build a new spiritual empire, to set up guarantees and sanctions almost of his own kind for Christian truth, and to proclaim a gospel of salvation through Christ, but a gospel mediated and secured by a priesthood and by a priestly Church which is independent of Rome and stands in its own rights as a living part of the universal Catholic Church. There is something imposing and daring in such an ideal. It is a claim to authority in spiritual things and in the realm of truth and to the possession of sacramental graces in a succession of its own; a claim exactly like that which is associated from of old with the Roman See, but in fact distinct from the claim Rome makes, and held to be valid for whatever Rome may think; a claim founded on the continuity and antiquity and apostolic character of its own Anglican Church. That is the claim. The condition of reunion with Rome is very simple; it is to accept the sovereignty of the Bishop of Rome. But the Anglo-Catholic can never do that without surrendering his whole fighting case.

One of two things need emphasis in considering the present situation. One is that ritual, however extreme, is not the essential point. Ritual is what strikes the onlooker, and if he does not understand the ritual he is confused by it, or perhaps angered; but the ornate service or highly ornamented church has little to do with the question. There was very little of the ornate in the churches of the early Oxford preachers, and when I was at Arundel recently and saw the beautiful Roman church of St. Philip Neri it was very striking how simple the interior was compared with some of the Anglo-Catholic churches. These churches, full of images and fustian decorations, are not the heart of the movement, but its eccentricities. "The Anglo-Catholic is out for truth," said Dr. Winnington-Ingram, "and not primarily for ceremonial at all."

Another thing is that the movement is profoundly evangelistic. It holds fast to a Gospel of Redemption, which it believes passionately and makes great sacrifices to proclaim. In a little country church before a crucifix I found not long ago one of the most tender and heart-searching prayers to Christ that ever the heart could express. The cross and the presence of Christ are not superstitious or priestly charms to these men, though they might seem so on some representations of them, but they are transcendent facts and the very soul of a new life for the world. But these heavenly gifts, they say, are guaranteed to us and made securely our own, in a world gone astray and in a questioning age, only by an authoritative Church to which they are committed as a sort of entail. If you are not in the succession you are out of the inheritance. It is easy to see why Nonconformity was not offered even a back seat at the Congress.

However much one honors the sincerity of the Anglo-Catholic movement, two questions arise: (1) Whether this account of the Church of England really is an account of what the Church of England actually is; and (2) whether Anglo-Catholicism does really offer a tenable position for the religious mind of the modern world.

On the first of these questions it is significant that the crucial point in Prayer Book revision is again adjourned. What is the Church of England going to do with its communion service? Nobody minds much about the imprecatory Psalms. But what about the mass? Is it to be admitted in some form or other, either openly or in disguise, as an alternative use? Whatever the Anglican Church does in the autumn, whether it accepts revision or shuffles the matter off the boards, the question of the real nature of the English Church is now raised with a definiteness the Oxford movement never secured. One recalls the story of how Newman withdrew from St. Mary's to Littlemore, and then later on the sob and heart-break of the sermon on "The Parting of Friends," and the cry against a Church that bids her children begone, and one seems to see another procession going forth. What a drama it is! What an old tale!

And that other question, whether Anglo-Catholicism offers a really tenable intellectual position for to-day. Well, the Bishop of London rather upset things when he told the Congress of Mandell Creighton's saying that the Reformation was "a return to sound learning," and then went on to beg the Congress not to be obscurantist in the matter of sound learning. The "Church Times" remarks that when the bishop left the hall the tone and temperature of the meeting completely changed. But this brings us face to face with the whole challenge to religion from the camps of modern thought. How are the defenses of Christian faith to be strengthened, and how is truth to be maintained? Is the reply to the extravaganzas of modernism to be another extravaganza of a new scholasticism and an authority of illusory make-believe? For the clash of arms is not now whether this or that ecclesiastical theory is old and historical, but whether the revealed truth of God in Christ Jesus has any ground in human reason, and whether faith and knowledge can go hand in hand. When the Vatican in 1870 laid down the doctrine of Papal infallibility it did a bold but unfortunate thing, for men are not convinced of truth at the spear point. Jerusalem that cometh down from above is free. It is not by these ways, and certainly not by local imitations of infallibility, that any enduring authority can be wielded over the human mind. It were better, if it came to that, to go down sailing the seas in search of the immortal treasure than to be marooned souls.

After all, there is plenty to be said for our Nonconformity. If we look on at this controversy with a certain detachment it is because we made up our minds long ago on the issues that are raised. We have made our own mistakes, and not a few of them; but as the religious situation develops before our eyes it justifies the main positions that were taken up when we gained the liberty wherein we stand. This is not a day to forget the rock out of which we were hewn and the spiritual ancestry in which we were born.

An Appeal to America

[Fifteen distinguished leaders of British thought have united in making the following appeal for American co-operation in European affairs.—EDITORS.]

MANY thoughtful men and women in Britain of various or no political attachment, but nourished upon liberal ideas and valuations are convinced that the very existence of Western civilization is in jeopardy owing to the failure of Europe to make a good recovery from the material and moral injuries of the Great War. Believing that the strongest co-operation of liberal-minded people in all countries is urgently required if this peril is to be averted, they would naturally turn in the first instance to the people of America, who have inherited so many of the same traditions and institutions as themselves.

Though grave economic issues are involved in this task of safeguarding our common civilization, it is not for co-operation on the economic plane that we here appeal, but rather for a closer common understanding and sympathy upon other aspects of the situation.

A CONFESSION OF ERROR

Perhaps the best way of approach is by a short general statement of the situation from our point of view. For most of us that statement must be a confession of error and disillusionment. In the heat of the actual conflict many failed sufficiently to recognize the dangers of a victory so complete that the victors would be able to force upon the vanquished any conditions, political, territorial, economic or moral, which the interests or passions of any one of them might prompt. Some of us were not even disabused by the doings at Versailles, but still believed and hoped that the lessons of the war would somehow liberate forces of reason and good-will adequate to redress any excesses in the operation of a dictated peace so as to make possible a pacific restoration of Europe.

Such beliefs and hopes have now disappeared. The events of the past four years have shown us industrial and financial ruin, wars, famines, revolutions, springing up in quick succession over large tracts of Europe and West Asia from seed sown in the peace treaties and the subsequent policies of the great Western powers. The professed conditions of a just and reasonable settlement in these treaties and policies are now seen to have been poisoned by the atmosphere of hate, greed, jealousy and suspicion in which they were conceived and administered. The Sévres Treaty for the settlement of the Near East quickly broke under the early strains of application, and has left a mere mass of political wreckage behind. The follies of the St. Germain Treaty have unfolded themselves in the unspeakable sufferings of Austria and the grave disorders which have occurred in most of the Austro-Hungarian succession states.

THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

But our most intense concern is now centered upon the operations of the Versailles Treaty in the ruthless hands of its chief executant. Experience has shown that the rigorous administration of that instrument can yield neither of the two chief results for which it was designed: "Reparations" and "Security." On the contrary, a sharp contradiction between these two prime purposes is contained in the fabric of the treaty, not in some simple error or inconsistency, but traversing the entire body of the treaty and penetrating its minutest recesses. Everywhere runs the contradictory purpose, the crippling of the economic recovery in the supposed interests of French security and the demand for reparations on such a scale that a complete restoration of Germany's pre-war resources would not suffice for fulfilment.

The occupation of the Ruhr is the supreme instance of the menace to civilization contained in France's separate action, and her now manifest determination to impose her will on Europe, regardless even of the plainest obligations as laid down in that very treaty to which she constantly appeals in justification of her conduct. For though all the Allies are responsible for the follies and injuries contained in the Versailles Treaty, it is notorious that every other government whose will is not controlled by French power now holds it to be unworkable and favors either formal and complete revision, or the more face-saving method of a non-enforcement of its bad provisions. France alone still stands by its integrity. France alone insists upon terms of reparation which all economists and financiers in America and Europe know and have declared to be impossible.

EUROPE'S STATE OF MIND

Our object in this statement of the situation is not, however, to arraign France, but rather to invite consideration of the state of mind which continues to make European recovery impracticable. This state of mind, though not dominant as in France is still prevalent in many circles in our own and other Allied countries. But our people as a whole has thrown off the definitely war mentality, with fear and hate as its chief ingredients, and is anxious for a true peace of Europe and a realization of the ultimate community of material and moral interests between the combatants in the late war.

The signatories of this Appeal stand, in a word, for an international order, not based on a fortuitous harmony of separate national interests, or upon a balance of power, but upon a conscious regular agreement between the peoples of the world to preserve the common order of the world, and to co-operate in other ways for the achievement of objects which lie beyond the limits of merely national endeavor. That is not the cancelment or the abridgment of national patriotism, but its fulfilment. Just as an individual realizes his highest purposes in concert with his fellows, so a nation needs for its national perfection a society of nations. This is no merely pious aspiration or distant ideal. Such effective co-operation is an immediate need. Only by vigorous international co-operation can Europe escape the disaster we have indicated. The waste and ruin into which French policy is dragging Europe are implicit in two mischievous articles of her faith.

MISCHIEVOUS FRENCH POLICY

The first is her insistence upon administering justice in her own case. The second is the execution of this self-made justice by her national force. The recent exchange of notes between France and Germany is the touchstone. However inadequate the German proposals for reparations and security may be, they are strengthened by the offer to accept an impartial international tribunal as the final court of settlement.

If France should continue to refuse this proposal she refuses the only way by which reparations and security can be made compatible. To extricate the mind of France from her fear complex and get her to recognize in international co-operation the only way of salvation, financial and political, is therefore the paramount need of the moment. France cannot extort by force from Germany either the money or the lasting security she needs. Only a wide co-operation in which she has faith can give her what she needs. It is to help in the establishment of that faith that we appeal to America. Will America participate, will she take that leading part to which her strength and disinterestedness entitle her? It is often said that she is not prepared after the recent unhappy experience to entangle herself again in the affairs of Europe. Even those Americans who are least intransigent may be disposed to say, "Let Europe first bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, let her cast out the evil spirits which still rule her policy, let her show by her own capacity of peaceful co-operation that she has learned the lesson of the war—and then we will consider your invitation." As a commentary upon the many ill-considered approaches from Europe in demands for debt remissions and monetary aids, this may well seem unanswerable. How can America be expected to enter into closer political or economic relations with states which amid all their lamentations about poverty are finding fresh means to furnish armaments upon a more lavish scale than before the war, and are spending on them the money which they constantly profess their inability to repay to their creditors?

A SPIRITUAL NEED

But what if Europe is unable by her own moral resources to escape from this evil mentality? The efforts and suffering of war seem to have left an aftermath of spiritual lethargy, making Europe incapable of coping successfully, by her unaided moral resources, with the devastating ravages of fear and hate. Our appeal to America for co-operation is based upon a spiritual need. America is able to perform a great service of healing for the world, on the one hand, because of the position of detachment and security which she holds; on the other, because of the disinterested motives which brought her into the Great War.

Having proved herself a principal agent of victory in the war, she had every right to a determinant voice in securing the fruits of victory through a just and healing peace. Defeated in this work four years ago by the passionate conduct of her war associates, she still retains the opportunity to rescue Europe from the path of ruin. European nations alone have not the moral power to enforce fundamental changes in the terms of peace and in the practical relations between their governments and peoples. America, by her co-operation, could perform this immeasurable service to humanity. Her weight could turn the scale in favor of a just and healing policy. Her co-operation, either by adhesion, with or without reserves, to the League of Nations, or by some other method of her own choosing, would enable her to exercise the greatest influence in the ordering of world affairs ever vouchsafed to any country. It is precisely because her action in the war carried so determinant a weight, precisely because her motives were disinterested, that this opportunity to complete the work in which she was interrupted four years ago arises.

AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY

The war and the subsequent peace do not admit of abrupt separation. By the same act of free choice and moral impulse under which America entered the war she is involved in the sequel. We cannot believe that history will record that America, after throwing her force into the war, refused to bring her contribution of wisdom to the making of the peace. For the peace is not yet made. We ask America's help in its making. We believe that America can, in that making, impose terms by which the future of world history shall bear the clear impress of a just and clearer-sighted view of the needs of a distracted world and of the same policies which should guide its statecraft.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

Conducted by Rev. Edmund de S. Brunner, Ph.D.

Why World Agriculture?

"BECAUSE agriculture is the indispensable foundation of individual and national existence and because more than half the world's population are engaged in it and in the industries directly dependent upon it, no subject has greater importance in the establishment and maintenance of the world's peace. Competition for control of the means of subsistence has been the ruling motive of the past and has reached its inevitable culmination in the Great War with incalculable destruction of the very things contended for. Co-operation in the use of the earth's resources is the alternative for the destroying competitive attitude, and until the peoples of the world realize this and set themselves resolutely to the task of bringing about actual and practical co-operation chaos and a return to savagery stare us in the face. The calling of a conference to consider World Problems in Agriculture and Country Life was the crowning achievement of the work in agricultural education so ably carried on in the American Expeditionary Forces under the inspiration of Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield. This conference will be remembered as one of the most important of the gatherings held in recent years for the consideration of international relationships."

These prophetic words, used by the editor of the quarterly journal, "World Agriculture," in its second issue, June, 1920, are being realized at the present moment and point to even greater fulfilment in the near future. Never, perhaps, has this country focused its desire so ably upon a given goal as in the recent Conference on Armament Limitation. Regardless of politics, of locality, of sex or occupation, the people of the United States spoke, and through petitions and meetings and personal letters made their voice heard at their national capitol; and the voice said: "We want reduction of armament; we want cessation of wars." Feeling the strength of the people with them, our public men at Washington have spoken in a brave and certain way. Reduction of armament, thus sponsored, seemed at first easy of attainment. Reduction of war does not follow as an easy corollary.

There has been much to give pause to the most world-minded representatives of the nations met at Washington. The International Conference for Disarmament had set itself no easy task—some have said it faced an impossible one. A representative of a well-known Pacific journal even went so far as to say that those people were wrong who averred that the task of the conference was to reduce war. It was only to reduce armament—an expense none can afford now—and to straighten out a Far East tangle. "But," replied his companion, "if it does those two things, does it not thereby reduce the chances of war?" We would like further to ask, Does it not really reduce those chances more by finding an answer to the Far East questions than merely by reduction of armament? The practical solution of an economic problem which, unsolved, makes arms necessary, is the only fundamental means of preventing wars.

The World Agriculture Society claims to deal with a whole group of these underlying economic causes. Its purposes is to "conduct a campaign of popular education showing that competition for control of the means of subsistence tends to bring war and destruction of the things contended for, whereas co-operation in the conservation and use of the earth's natural resources is the foundation of world peace."

The society desires, in the first place, to create a clamor for world co-operation—just as the Councils for Limitation of Armament have brought about a universal demand for disarmament. So, by co-ordinating a multitude of individuals and organizations in one fellowship of purpose, it aims to create a social consciousness of the actual preventives of war which have their root in Christian economics.

Secondly, it aims to make available the findings of experts in the economics of agriculture, geography, industry and commerce and apply the results of their investigations to the problem of actual world co-operation. It does this by the following means: (1) Gathering and publishing facts concerning the production, distribution and use of agricultural commodities in all countries; (2) encouraging the formation of study groups to consider problems of rural life and of the world's food supply; (3) securing international exchange of students and teachers of agricultural subjects; (4) enlarging the mental view of the students in agricultural colleges through study of world relationships and actual correspondence with agricultural students in other countries; (5) furnishing agricultural recruits for foreign government and mission fields. Later it hopes to establish chairs of the Science of World Agriculture and eventually a World Agriculture School, which shall make available the experience and erudition of each nation for application to the needs of others. To take one concrete example: Agriculture co-operation and rural credit are in their infancy in this nation of individualism and of wide gaps between capital and labor. We can learn from such nations as have already successfully practiced such credit and co-operation. In some of our states there are already co-operative grain elevators and farmers' unions doing a successful business. One part of our country can learn lessons from the other, but when it comes to even a national program in agriculture the task faced is no easy one. The interests of one part of the country seem to militate against those of another. Still more difficult of solution is the problem of adjustments and harmonious interchange according to a scientifically ordered program between the nations of the world.

But because the task is so stupendous, shall we fail to take hold of the nearest end of the burden? It is because David Lubin took hold of one end with the arm of a strong man, the sagacity of an unusual intelligence and the far view of a prophet that the Institute of Agriculture at Rome was established by the King of Italy. Our country already had a well-established system of crop reports, but the fact that no such system existed in other countries—or where it did there was no co-ordination to render the knowledge available in all parts of the world—left the market unduly influenced by mere rumors. The Institute at Rome, as founded by Lubin, was essentially a working federation or league among nations and has functioned as a government bureau of research and information, but it has not yet reached the ideal which David Lubin had for it as a world parliament of agriculturists. It has been the aim of "World Agriculture" ever since, at its start, it received the approval of Signor Dragoni, general secretary of the Institute, to help fulfil the other half of David Lubin's plan—in the popularization of the agricultural information and the spread of understanding among producers and between producers and consumers.

Signora Agresti, for many years David Lubin's secretary and interpreter, during a recent visit to this country told the story of his "economic tripod"—he saw an economic tripod supporting society. He was fond of illustrating this by placing his three fingers on the table. "These two front fingers," he said, "represent city industry and city finance. The third finger behind them represents the farm. When these two front fingers grow strong, as they do by combination, they bear heavily on the third, and as this third finger all alone grows proportionately weaker, it cannot uphold the extra pressure. What happens? All three go down, and with them the super-structure of society." David Lubin's plea was not a sentimental plea for the farmer as a class—it was a plea for all classes.

It is this plea for all classes which the World Agriculture Society is making through the pages of its magazine—through its study groups and through the fellowship of individuals and organizations—for not only would it bring about a better understanding between nations, but between the warring factions and classes of the same nation by teaching through practical examples that what serves the best good of one in the end serves all, that the farmer is a consumer as well as a producer, and a trader as well as a consumer; that the tariff that brings about a retaliatory tariff on the part of the country that buys his products is not a blessing to him even in disguise. The farmer is no more a citizen of Farmerville than he is a citizen of the world. World politics are his concern as much as they are the concern of the urbanite.

The World Agriculture Society makes its appeal to the city dweller also. It shows him David Lubin's tripod and interests him in keeping the right balance between town and country. It endeavors to open a path for the truth to find its way into action—not crushed against the density of ignorance on one side or overborne by the weight of convention and prejudice on the other. Unbiased by any commercial interests, its journal is free to find and give to the world the fruit of that tree, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations.

The school to-day has a membership of four hundred students, according to Mr. Afros. It occupies a modern building having all the equipment and facilities necessary for the maintenance of an efficient educational institution. A monthly meeting of students is held to discuss the problems of the school. Administration is vested in an Executive Committee of twelve members. The constitution also provides for the election of five officers—a president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer and registrar. The Executive Committee meets every two weeks. In addition, there are sub-committees on Education, Finance, Entertainment, Grievance, Auditing and Co-operation.

The school now has ten instructors in its academic department and a number of visiting lecturers. A business of about $25,000 yearly is transacted. During three years' operation the institute has had an enrollment of more than three thousand students. It is said that the institute is represented in almost every college and university east of the Mississippi.

Co-operative schools have created widespread interest among educators. To understand the mode of operation of these schools Mr. Afros writes: "Co-operation is an organized non-political effort of the people to control the production and distribution of the things needed to satisfy their wants. Convinced that co-operation offered a solution to the many economic and industrial problems, the students looked to co-operation to solve the ever-growing educational problem—the control of education by the few. The students realized that the same principles which apply to commodities apply to service. Education, consisting of knowledge and training, is given to the student by the teacher. Like everything else under the present economic system, education is exploited in the interests of those who own and control our schools and colleges.

ONE BOOK A WEEK

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

League or War*

EVERYBODY interested in seeing the United States true to her traditional policy and manifest destiny will rejoice at this exhaustive survey of the recent endeavor of the people in this direction and this most convincing argument that it is either the League or war. For the traditional policy of the United States has not been isolation. For one hundred years she has been exerting her beneficent influence on other nations, taking active and often energetic part in foreign affairs, as witness, foreign missions, Monroe Doctrine, incidents in China and Japan, feeding Europe, participation in the World War. The present policy of isolation is a sudden and absolute reversal of her age-long policy and is true neither to her character or her destiny. Unfortunately, this sudden reversal of policy has had most disastrous effect upon the world. It is a hard thing to say, but it is true, when one says that the present miserable condition of Europe to-day—the delayed peace and the consequent chaos, anarchy and suffering is largely due to the United States. There is not a shadow of doubt that the situation would have been infinitely better had we stayed, joined the League with the other nations, taken our part in reconstructing a civilization in whose shattering we had a vigorous part. There would have been no Ruhr, no Greek and Turkish war, no German collapse, had we stayed. All this Professor Fisher sees very clearly and enlarges upon it in a most engrossing chapter called “Uncle Sam’s Empty Chair,” or “Isolation versus Participation.” “Had America’s power for unity continued, through our presence in the League of Nations, the German reparations might have been put upon a practical basis and the Turks and Greeks both held in leash so that the Turkish problem would never have become acute. England and France would probably have kept up the spirit as well as the letter of their entente cordiale, the Geneva Conference would have been unnecessary, or had it been held would have succeeded instead of failing. Everybody would have listened to America, victor and vanquished alike. Each country would feel itself facing a united world, frowning down their quarrel at the start, and holding over it the wholesome possibility of force if need be. Moreover, France would never have kept as great an army if her dread of another German invasion could have been allayed by an assurance of peace such as the presence of the United States in the League would have given.”

This next to the last sentence gives the key to Professor Fisher’s argument. The League must be a united world if it is to prevent war. It cannot be a United States of Europe over against a United States of America, as President Butler is reported to have intimated in an interview in Europe the other day. We cannot have a world half League and half outside the League. Then we have a balance of power. There might be some semblance of argument for America’s staying out of the League were she independent of the problems of Europe; but, as Professor Fisher shows, there are no European problems. All problems are world problems. They are just as much ours as Europe’s. The war itself taught us that—and we have forgotten the lesson. But the problems and crises of the peace concern our welfare just as much as did the questions and crises of the war. America is just as near to Europe as she is to Mexico in these days. We should be in the League for our own sake as well as for the service we can render.

The reader will find the most thorough and complete history and interpretation of the League in this book that has been published. It gives the early forecasts of a League of Nations; tells the history of the present League and President Wilson’s connection with it; shows why some form of League was essential in making the peace at Paris and Versailles; thoroughly analyzes the Covenant of the present League; answers all the objections that have been brought against it; tells why the Senators opposed it. Then the book turns to the achievements of the League since its inception. We are glad Professor Fisher has gone into this at some length, for after all it is the best argument against it, and, as the author shows, not one of those terrible things the Senators prophesied has happened. There has been no sign of a super-state; no call for troops to be sent to the uttermost parts of the earth; no attempt to meddle with the internal affairs of any nation in the League. Indeed, the chief criticism of the League has been that it has not asserted itself as it might. The very opponents of the League in America have been asking. Why doesn’t it step in and settle this Ruhr question? Why didn’t it stop Greece and Turkey from going to war? These questions have been coming from those who opposed the League on this very ground that it might “step into” just such quarrels. For one, we wish it would.

Professor Fisher also gives a very helpful survey and criticism of the alternatives that have been proposed. These alternatives are easily dismissed because most of them have been tried before and failed. Others are only partial. All of them miss the one thing, namely, the organizing of the nations into a community. One thing, and one thing only, has stopped war and piracy among individuals, and that is the organizing of individuals into the community life. When individuals ceased acting as their own judge, sheriff and defender and organized into the community with common court, common sheriff and common police, then wars stopped. It is in this way, and no other, that wars between nations will stop, when they stop living purely by the law of individualism and organize themselves into the community life. This is what the League attempts to do. It is an attempt at a community of nations, with common judges, common court, common force and common life. Professor Fisher is perfectly right in saying with all emphasis that it is this community life or 1914 or worse over again—“League or War.” Let us close this review with one of the truest passages in this book. (We wish the book could be sent to every anti-League man in the country):

“We hear people say that the United States should hold aloof until the European nations set their own houses in order, disband their armies, stop inflation and pay their

Luke, the Beloved Physician

LUKE 1:1-4; ACTS 1:1; 16:9-15; COL. 4:14; 2 TIM. 4:11.

"A friend loveth at all times; and a brother is born for adversity."—Proverbs 17:17.

THE material for a biography of Luke is meager, but it is most attractive. What we know is precious, and beyond that is much that we are at liberty to infer.

"Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you." So wrote Paul at the close of his letter to the Colossians. The two names, Luke and Demas, thus joined in Christian salutation, meet us again in almost as close juxtaposition, but with a startling contrast, at the end of Paul's second letter to Timothy—"Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world. . . . Only Luke is with me." What a contrast is this final reference to these two men!

But Paul's reference in Colossians 4:14 is not an introduction to the personality of Luke. If we read the Acts of the Apostles with reasonable care we shall discover along about the middle of the book that the narrative is told in the first person. The change from the third person is so unobtrusive we may not have noticed the first occurrence of the first person. If we read backward we shall at length discover it in Acts 16:10.

"And after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them."

Paul alone saw the vision, but three others "gathered" from Paul's recital of the incident, and from their confidence in him and in the leadership of the Lord, that they were to cross over from Asia into Europe to preach the gospel. Two of them are named—Silas, who started with Paul after the latter had separated from Barnabas (Acts 15:40), and Timothy, whom Paul picked up at Lystra (Acts 16:1-3). The fourth member of the party is not named in this place, but when we look over the names to discover who it could have been that was present on this occasion, and had written the account of the event, we discover that can have been no other than Luke.

Apparently Luke lived in Macedonia and remained there when Paul went over to Athens and Corinth, but rejoined Paul when he began his last journey to Jerusalem. It is in Acts 20:5 that we find the "we" passages, beginning after Paul's departure from Macedonia, and that is when Paul appears to have found Luke again. After that Luke never left him. He was with Paul in that journey to Jerusalem; with him during his two years' imprisonment in Caesarea; with him in his voyage and shipwreck and his winter in Malta; with him when he entered Rome; with him for two years in his first imprisonment, where his own book breaks off abruptly (Acts 28:30, 31); with him in the loneliness of his second imprisonment (2 Timothy 4:11); with him, as we believe and hope, till the sword of Nero fell upon the neck of Paul. All this we know when we add to Paul's brief reference in his letters the content of the "we" passages of the Book of Acts. This process of comparing Scripture with Scripture that so we may have from the Bible itself facts concerning the authorship and date of its several portions is that highly useful and much abused but reverent and indispensable discipline known as the higher criticism. Whoever picks out these passages in the Acts and the Pauline epistles and thereby discovers who it was that wrote these precious records of a faithful eye-witness has accomplished an important result of higher criticism. There is no other way in which we can possibly learn such things about the Bible, and we should be very stupid and foolish if we did not thus learn all that we can of such precious and interesting truth.

Can we imagine what the friendship of Luke meant to Paul? Not many of the early Christians were men of education. Even the twelve apostles were men of very limited learning, and Paul saw very little of them. Many a minister, leaving behind him the academic pursuits of college and university and accepting service among plain people, feels the isolation of a community life nearly destitute of intellectual companionship. There are compensations, but a minister is entitled to friendships, and sometimes has all too few of them. Paul, after he became a Christian, cannot have had many friends who could meet him upon a common intellectual plane. He needed the companionship of men who were, we will not say his equals, but his associates, in kindred ideals, intellectual as well as spiritual.

Luke was an educated gentleman. His writings show that he possessed some measure of scholarship. He was the first professional man, not a minister, to come into companionship of the apostles. No wonder Paul loved him.

But that is not all. It may have been through him that Paul received his vision of the "man of Macedonia." Paul had been seeking most earnestly to discover the particular work to which the Lord was calling him after he parted with Barnabas. He did not readily discover it. The records in the Book of Acts, immediately preceding the story of Paul's crossing the Aegean into Macedonia, show his conflicts and his troubles. He himself tells us that in this period his troubles were many, and that they did not immediately cease; his flesh had no rest; without were fightings and within were fears (2 Corinthians 7:5). It was just before Paul left Troas and shortly before he resolved to go into Macedonia that Luke came into Paul's life. Apparently Paul was sick at Troas. Luke may have come to him in his professional capacity. From whom, if not from Luke, did Paul learn about Macedonia? Luke lived there; he must have talked to Paul about it. Paul dreamed about Macedonia. He saw a man from Macedonia inviting him to come and help. Was that man Luke? Did Luke, influenced by that modesty of which his writings bear such evidence, conceal his own name? But was it his hope that inspired Paul's dream? So far as we know, no other Macedonian had any share in it. Silas was not a Macedonian, and neither was Timothy. Who was the "man of Macedonia" if not Luke himself?

If Luke really did bring to Paul the invitation that grew so insistent and persuasive that Paul could not forget it even in his sleep, we of Europe and America ought to cherish profound gratitude to Luke.

Paul seems to have judged Macedonians, and so all Europeans, and we might almost say Americans, by what he saw of Luke. Luke was then the representative of a continent which as yet had not heard the gospel; and also as the representative of the continent farther west. When Luke said, "Come over into Europe," he was also saying, fifteen hundred years or so ahead of the event, "Come over into America and help us." Luke was the representative of America no less than of Europe.

Luke cared for some things in which Paul was not greatly interested. Paul, for instance, did not greatly care about the mere historic facts in the life of Jesus. Perhaps this was because he met now and then a man who said that Paul, never having seen Jesus in the flesh, could not be an apostle like the others. This irritated Paul, who said that even if a man had known Christ after the flesh, he might better unlearn the mere historic facts than permit too great pride in them to obscure the spiritual content of Christ's ministry.

But if Paul did not know or care much about these facts—and the meagerness of his references to actual incidents in the life of Jesus is clear indication on this point—Luke did care about these very things.

There fell into the hands of Luke and of the Jewish disciple believed to have been Matthew copies of a very brief life story of Jesus by John Mark. Neither of these two men, Matthew or Luke, felt quite satisfied with it. The story as Mark gave it was vivid, terse and full of action, but it contained almost nothing of the teaching of Jesus. It had no Sermon on the Mount and hardly any parables. It was a good outline, but colorless. Matthew rewrote it, and it is interesting to see what he added. He added the Sermon on the Mount, and many parables, and so much of the teachings of Jesus that Matthew has always been the preachers' Gospel. But Matthew was a Jew; and he was eager to quote Old Testament prophecy and to show its fulfillment in Jesus—a matter about which Luke cared little, if he cared at all.

But Luke cared for those qualities in the history of Jesus which touched the life of all men. He alone told of the Good Samaritan and of the rich man and Lazarus, and of the lost sheep, and of the Prodigal Son. These were not Jewish parables; they were honestly human. If Matthew heard Jesus utter these parables he did not select them for record; but they were the very things that most appealed to Macedonian Luke.

Moreover, Luke in some interesting way came into touch with some one who told him the women's side of the story of the ministry of Jesus. Luke has in it a remarkable feminine element. When and how Luke obtained this is an interesting question, and one on which I have my own opinion; for our present purpose, however, the important fact is that Luke alone discovered and preserved this element. But it is just this feminine touch that, added to its other fine qualities, makes Luke a beautiful book. He tells of the birth of Jesus, not in Matthew's blunt man-fashion story of Joseph, but in the delicate cast of Mary's own story. It must have come from Mary. There was no one else who could have told it, and she must have told the Elisabeth story also; and Luke got them both. We need not in the brief compass of this sermon attempt a summary of the feminine element in the third Gospel, but whoever is interested can find it there, and he may form his own opinion as to where and how Luke obtained it.

However Luke obtained his materials, he wrote what is beyond question the most beautiful book in the world. If the Gospel of John is most spiritual, and the Gospel of Mark most concise, and the Gospel of Matthew most filled with the material for instruction, the Gospel of Luke is most human and most intellectual and most beautiful. Through all that is distinctive in this noble book, Luke, the beloved physician, still salutes us.

All professions are liable to abuse. The nobler the calling the more it is capable of harm when it is dishonored. No man can do as much harm in a community as a corrupt and unworthy physician, unless it be a false and immoral minister. But most ministers are good men, and a majority of physicians are men of kind hearts and broad sympathies. No man except the minister can do as much good as a conscientious physician, or deserves more richly the love of the community for the doing of it. Physicians are kind to ministers. For that matter, good and beloved physicians are kind to a great many people, some of whom do not show them much gratitude. Let us honor the good men who by day and night give themselves to the blessed work of healing. Let us hope for the whole profession that it will ever be true to the ministry and the Church, and as Luke was to Paul, a companion and beloved and helpful friend.

UNUSUAL CHURCH ACTIVITIES

Kansas City has several very large churches: First Baptist, 2,700 members; Linwood Boulevard Christian, 2,700; Independence Boulevard Christian, above 2,500; Linwood Boulevard Presbyterian, 1,700. All of these churches have salaried staffs, exceptionally able pastors, and are seven-day churches, and they are growing. The Linwood Presbyterian is completing a great new house of worship, and the Linwood Christian is about to erect a gymnasium and otherwise enlarge its facilities.

Oak Cliff Methodist Church, Dallas, has a free medical clinic. That which is unusual about it is that the church is located in a substantial residential neighborhood. Several churches in Dallas have taken up the clinic idea.—The Christian Herald.

LEAGUE OR WAR

debts. As Ivy Lee says, 'This is easy to say, but cannot be done by any nation acting alone.' Then, says the imperturbable isolationist, let them first agree among themselves. But America is the most effective means of bringing about agreement. It was America which, during the war, created unity of action through the Supreme Council, in the appointment of Foch as Commander-in-Chief, as well as in putting Pershing under Foch. That is, we set the example of internationalism. The Allies remained united just as long as American interest in preserving this unity lasted. As soon as America withdrew from Europe, the old jealousies and quarrels in Europe broke out afresh. They had to, for there was no longer any impartial influence to keep the peace. Again we set the example, but this time not of internationalism but of nationalism. If we keep on waiting for European nations to be united before we unite with them in any peace effort, there is grave danger that we shall wait until there is another world war. It was the spirit of selfish nationalism before 1914 that led to the war; it was the spirit of broad, sane internationalism that won the war; it was the reversion to the selfish nationalism after 1918 which brought war back in Europe, and it will be only by reverting once more, in the future, to the spirit of broad internationalism that we can maintain real peace. The people of Europe will listen to the voice of America because we are disinterested, as well as because we are great and because we hold Europe's destiny in the hollow of our hands."

CORRESPONDENCE

THE SUCCESS OF THE COMMUNITY CHURCH

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

In your issue of July 28 I notice the paragraph "Is a Community Church Satisfactory?" citing the case of an independent church which became denominational in order to have participation in Christian missions and denominational guidance and help.

This undoubtedly puts a finger upon a real point of weakness in the union independent church. In the past, many such churches have become denominational for this reason. We have such cases in Massachusetts.

But that this is not necessary is clear from the cases of union churches that are not merely successful, but also generously missionary. The first national conference of community church workers was held in St. Paul's Church, Beverly Hills, Chicago, Illinois, in May. Under the leading of its pastor, Rev. F. A. Gageby, the church has developed and increased its missionary budget until it actually supports nine missionaries at home and abroad. Mr. Gageby testifies that the more it has given to missions the easier it has become to meet home expenses. In Massachusetts the union churches have been given something of the fellowship and assistance of a denomination through the State Federation of Churches, which might well be called the Union Church of the Commonwealth; and we point out that there are abundant opportunities, as in the support of the Union church in the Panama Canal Zone, for participation in world evangelism, without which no congregation is a true church. Rev. George Frederick Welles has given us a happy phrase, that the climax of development for a church is to be "a community center for world outlook."

May I also take the occasion to object to what I believe to be a misuse of the term "community church"? This should be confined, I believe, to a church which is the sole (Protestant) church of a definite community. A union church may not be a community church, and hundreds of denominational churches deserve the title.

POSSIBLE DEFEAT FOR THE TURKISH TREATY

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

I was much interested in the article by Bishop Cannon about the Turks in your issue of August 4. In regard to the treaty, it seems a foregone conclusion that one will be negotiated with the United States. You seem to forget however, or rather those writing to the President may forget, that this treaty may be defeated by an appeal to the Senate, where it can be defeated by a vote of one more than one-third. One iniquitous provision, that only those made American citizens previous to 1914 shall come under the protection of its terms, is sufficient for its rejection. I certainly hope that the Senate will be asked by the proper societies to reject this treaty unless a just treaty can be negotiated which shall protect the rights of our citizens as well as the rights of minorities.

THE UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

Canada has boldly stepped to the head of the column and said, "The time for talking is passed. The hour for action has come." The only way to bring about Christian unity is to do it, trusting the Holy Spirit to show the way how to do it.

If now all the other churches of these three denominations which have taken this action in Canada will do the same in the United States of America they could go before the Faith and Order Conference in Washington in 1925, so as to put the question squarely up to the Episcopal Convention, which meets that fall, "What are you going to do about it?" This would make the whole of Christendom sit up and take notice.

That combination successfully functioning would easily dominate Christianity in America, and from there would spread over the whole world.

Such an organization could be called the United Church of the United States of America. Possibly with such a living Church so functioning before their eyes the rest of the old, slow-moving Churches would wake up and find a way to get into the procession and win the world for Christ in the twentieth century.

What a glorious consummation would that be—so much to be desired.

In the meantime let all the other Churches take off their hats to Canada, which was the first to take the words of Jesus seriously and to set to work to get them answered in His way.

SENTENCE SERMONS

BY GEORGE WILSON JENNINGS.

Recently passing the Church of Our Father, Grand avenue and Lefferts place, Brooklyn, the writer was attracted by a group of people near the main entrance. Upon investigation I was told that often different sayings and quotations are placed there which have created great interest in the community. These interested people are reading and discussing the merit and value of the latest clever saying placed on the bulletin, which read in this wise, "Worse than a quitter is the chap who is afraid to begin." A young man who stood near me, said, "Have you heard that saying before and do you think it is a quotation?" I replied, "It must be one of the pastor's (Dr. Thomas E. Potterton, D.D.) gifted and unique utterances." An aged man in the group said, "Did you see the saying here a few days ago which read, 'A man to be a success must have more bone in his back than in his head?' There is a wealth of meaning in that line, so I made many copies of it to give to my friends. 'A few weeks ago I read an inscription here, which impressed me, if I can recall the exact wording, 'I tried to be a skeptic, when I was a young man, but my mother's life, example and faith was too much for me.' An aged colored woman overhearing the conversation, said, 'Last week there was one that I liked better than any of them—I am going to remember it—believe me.' The writer requested her to repeat it for the benefit of those present. Having copied, she took it out of her little hand bag, and read the saying, which was truly a wise one, 'Be sure to see with your own eyes and hear with your own ears.'"

The Church of Our Father radiates to the people outside in these many quotations and subjects of deep interest, which speak volumes, ideas that are most helpful and hopeful during the summer days. It is a timely thought of Dr. Potterton's and he is to be congratulated on his earnest and successful Christian work, which is far-reaching in its splendid influence.

Truly, apt quotations carry convictions. All minds quote. Old and new make the warp and woof of every moment. We quote not only books and proverbs, but art, sciences, religion, customs and laws.

We should always repeat an ancient truth, when we feel we can make it more striking by a neater turn, or bring it alongside of another truth, which may make it clearer, and thereby accumulate evidence. It belongs to the inventive faculty to see clearly the relative state of things, and to be able to place them in connection, but the discoveries of ages gone by belong less to their first authors than to those who make them practically useful to the world.

ETHICS IN BUSINESS

Much has been heard recently of the need of codes of ethics in business and professional life. The latest such word comes from the meeting of the Wholesale Grocers' Association held in Washington this spring. The President of the Organization, Mr. J. H. McLaurin, as quoted in the Washington Post of May 23, characterized the present regime as "wild, insane, jungled competition," of which he said, "Such competition as that is destructive of the moral fiber of men and subversive of the highest welfare of the public, and leads only to discouragement, failure and defeat." He declared that grocers "should not, by combination or agreement among themselves, fix the prices at which they sell their goods. Individual grocers, however, should carefully consider the cost of doing business and should demand and receive what their goods cost, plus what it costs to handle them, plus a fair return to themselves. This each grocer should do, not in combination with his competitors, not because anyone suggests it to him, but because good business demands such a policy."

The code of ethics which he proposes in his opinion "would not always control the conduct of the unscrupulous, would not always prevent secret rebates to favorite customers, would not always prevent unfair prices. But such a written code would have its influence and would tend to induce the thoughtless to maintain its principles." —The Christian Herald.

"AND HE WALKS WITH ME"

It was Sunday dinner. The small boy broke out, "Who is this Andy we sing about at Sunday school—'Andy walks with me, Andy talks with me'?" It was confusing.

PERSECUTED FOR ATTENDING SUNDAY SCHOOL

It is hard to realize that any parents would ill-treat their children because they were eager to attend the Sunday school. Yet that is the condition which prevails in some sections of Japan. In most parts of that country the Sunday school is a welcomed institution, and many non-Christian parents send their children to the school where the Bible is the one text-book. H. E. Coleman, Educational Secretary for Japan for the World's Sunday School Association, tells of some conditions which he noted on a recent trip to the West coast. "Christian work in this section is very backward and the Buddhists very active. We found a number of cases of serious persecution. One girl we heard of was taken from a school where she had become a Christian, and when she refused to marry a non-Christian who had been selected for her, she was badly beaten, taken from her sickbed and banished from her home. She was helped by friends and finally found safety in Tokio. At Nanao, a harbor town, where an evangelist went a few years ago, the people refused to sell him anything to eat. At present two earnest girls are conducting a kindergarten, and the little preaching place and kindergarten where I gave my lecture on Sunday school work was well filled. The missionary in charge said it was the largest gathering he had seen there for a long time. Those who become Christians under such hard circumstances generally become good ones.

ANY OTHER building but a church can close its doors when overcrowded. And when the attendance is small the loss is usually a personal matter. But a church can neither close its doors nor run at a loss, as in either case it is a community loss. This is one of the reasons why Wilson Sectionfold or Rolling partitions have been installed in thousands of churches.

With them the whole church can be thrown into one room. Or for small gatherings they make as many small rooms as you want with a big saving in light and heat. No matter how old the building, they can be made to harmonize with their surroundings.

We have an illustrated catalog showing what we have done for other churches. Perhaps it may hold a thought for you. You are welcome to a copy.

give to the Sunday-school teacher inspiring and practical insight into the essential spiritual messages of the International Uniform Lessons. The book consists of a series of short expository sermons on the lessons by such leading American preachers as Francis E. Clark, W. E. Barton, Charles Reynolds Brown, William Elliot Griffis, Cornelius H. Patton, John E. Tuttle, and others.

Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN WORK, says in a recent letter:

"The other day The Monday Club Sermons for 1923 happened to come to my hand, and I was very much impressed both by the list of contributors, and by the unusually fine standard of the execution."

THE COAL SITUATION

Fifty years from now our grandchildren will read with amazement of the coal strikes in the third decade of the twentieth century. It will not be comprehensible to them that a great nation should have so little power to protect itself when employers and employees in a vital industry had a private quarrel with each other. But to-day it is only dawning on the American people that the object of business is not to make money. The real object of business, of course, is to provide a needed service. The people who provide the service have a right to a living in consideration of the useful service which they are rendering. Our present method of supplying this living to the active or silent workers in the enterprise is through wages and profits. The method more or less effectively supplies the living. The difficulty in it is that it disguises the true state of affairs and gives people an inferior motive for working. Through the influence of the Administration the anthracite operators and miners got together again at Atlantic City eleven days ago to see if they could not come to some sort of agreement before September first, when their present contract runs out. The conference had broken up earlier this summer because the operators would not agree to take the union dues, fines, and so on, out of the men's wages, on behalf of the unions. That is the so-called check-off system. When the operators and miners got together anew at Atlantic City the miners began by demanding an increase of twenty per cent. in wages for men paid by the piece system and of $2.00 a day for men paid by the day. The latter was an increase of forty per cent. in wages. The operators would not grant the increase and proposed arbitration with the stipulation that there should be no decrease in wages. The leaders of the miners absolutely refused the proposition. Three years ago when they submitted to arbitration they expected to receive an increase of twenty-seven per cent. in their wages, as had the bituminous miners. The arbitrators gave them only seventeen per cent. That was enough of arbitration for them, says President Lewis. Mr. Lewis spoke most truculently last week. The miners, he estimated, had two million dollars in their treasury, and very great financial resources behind them. "The mine workers," he said further, "are prepared to enter the industrial contest in the anthracite fields and administer to the anthracite operators on these issues the most complete trouncing of their career." When Mr. Coolidge succeeded Mr. Harding the expectation was very general that the new President would deal with the coal situation vigorously and effectively. At this writing it is too early to say whether he will come up to expectations. He has turned over the dispute to Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. Perhaps the Governor can settle it. The talk of anthracite substitutes is not very satisfactory. The people of the northeast do not want to have to use soft coal with its smoke and dirt. And they do not want to be obliged to go to the expense of installing oil heaters. Moreover, in regard to the use of fuel oil, with the rapid diminution of the petroleum supply of the United States it is not fair to future generations to use it up for purposes for which other commodities are available.

TOWARD THE ABOLITION OF SPACE

The performance of "The Covered Wagon" now going on at moving picture houses recalls the days within the span of a life time when men started from Missouri in early summer and arrived in Oregon only when the country was covered with snow. Last week the Mayor of San Francisco read Tuesday's "New York Times" at his dinner table Wednesday evening. The new air mail had come in from the east. The mail left Garden City, Long Island, some twenty-five miles out of New York, at eleven o'clock Tuesday morning. It reached San Francisco at 6.24 Wednesday evening. Allowing for the three hours difference in the time, it took thirty-four hours twenty-four minutes for the mail to cross the continent. From New York to Cheyenne the mail took seventeen hours fifty minutes, an hour and twenty-five minutes less than the Postoffice Department schedule. But the weather at Cheyenne and westward was so thick with fog that the next pilot could not depart from Cheyenne for more than five and a half hours. The first eastbound mail trip was not put through, but on the second eastbound trip the mail crossed the continent in twenty-seven hours twenty-one minutes. The eastbound mail is scheduled to cross the country two hours quicker than the westbound on account of favorable wind. The second westbound mail made the trip in twenty-eight hours forty-four minutes. But the best record in the four-day test was made by the eastbound mail which left San Francisco Thursday and crossed the continent in twenty-six hours fourteen minutes. The mail takes five days to cross the continent by train. The Postoffice Department is reckoning on a twenty-eight-hour schedule for the air mail. The air mail goes by way of Cleveland, Chicago, Omaha, Cheyenne, Salt Lake City and Elko, Nevada. The most difficult element in day and night flight is, of course, the night hours. The Government has placed a powerful beacon every twenty-five miles with smaller beacons every three miles along the way from Chicago to Cheyenne, where the planes travel by night. The Postoffice Department is so well pleased with the four-day test that it will shortly begin a regular coast to coast air mail service. Letters for the air mail should be addressed, "Via Air Mail Service." Postage will be eight cents from New York to Chicago, eight cents from Chicago to Cheyenne, and eight cents from Cheyenne to San Francisco; that is, twenty-four cents across the continent. Physically as well as spiritually we are finding ourselves neighbors one to another, no matter how far away Jews and Samaritans may live from each other.

THE FRENCH ANSWER TO LORD CURZON

Imitating the example set by the British government, M. Poincaré last week promptly gave to the public his answer to Lord Curzon's recent note. Lord Curzon, it will be recalled, had criticized the amount of the reparations payments demanded by France and Belgium, and had declared that the British government had never held the occupation of the Ruhr to be legal. M. Poincaré's note, some fifteen thousand words long, declares that the French government bases the right of the Allies to occupy the Ruhr on Paragraphs 17 and 18 in Annex 2 of the Versailles Treaty. Those paragraphs provide that in case of German default in payment of reparations, the Reparations Commission "may make such recommendations as to the action to be taken . . . as it may think necessary." The measures which the Allied and associated powers have the right to take, in the case of Germany's voluntary default, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, "may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances." France finds her legal justification in the phrase which we have italicized. M. Poincaré points out at length that the British government at one time in the past joined in the occupation of German territory beyond the bounds laid out in the Treaty of Versailles, in order to force Germany to observe her obligations, and has more than once joined in threats to occupy the Ruhr itself. When resistance to the occupation comes to an end, France, says M. Poincaré, will "transform progressively the character of the occupation." "But," he adds, "we will not evacuate the Ruhr against fresh promises, and it is payments which we desire." As for the question of debts, M. Poincaré writes: "France has never repudiated her debts and will not repudiate them, but she is convinced that no British government will ever bring to bear upon an allied country the pressure which the British Cabinet does not think it possible to bring to bear to-day against the former enemies of England and France. We can therefore only repeat that we will be in a position to repay our debt to England, or even to pay interest on it, when payments by Germany shall have enabled us to complete the reparation of damages caused on our soil by invasion and battle." The French appear to have a great deal of reason on their side. With all the difficulties in which Germany has involved herself through her destruction of her currency, it scarcely seems that at this moment any body of experts could reckon how much she would be in a position to pay yearly ten years hence. And it is no wonder that France feels that she has a right to expect that, in addition to the cost of remaking the devastated regions, Germany should pay enough to offset what she (France) may have to pay to Great Britain and the United States. Premier Poincaré suggests that for the future the negotiations between the Allies might be carried on somewhat more privately than they have been of late. Prime Minister Baldwin is spending a fortnight at Aix-les-Bains, and there is every prospect that the two premiers will find an opportunity to talk together in person before he leaves French soil.

HISTORY TO ORDER

It would appear that some one of the self-appointed supporters of the Ku Klux Klan is desirous of entering into competition with Captain Traprock and Stephen Leacock as the leading American humorist. From some unspecified source comes a rare rendering of American history under the title of "A Word to Dragon Fighters." In this brochure we read not only of the probable discovery of America by Leif Ericson in the year 1000, but we learn that the name of America comes from Leif himself. Leif was the son of Eric, or "Americ." What more obvious? We learn further that the Norse colony founded by Leif persisted in America for nearly three hundred and fifty years, until the Black Death decimated Norway in 1437 and stopped further emigration. Then one hundred and fifty years later the Vatican decided that the time was ripe for it to lay claim to the Western Hemisphere in the name of Rome! So Cristobal Colon, its agent, went up to Iceland to learn about the Icelandic voyages. The Roman Church renamed Colon, Christopher Columbus, that is "Christ-Bearer of the Dove" (or Holy Ghost), a name given to him as the bearer of Roman Catholicism to the western continent. So Columbus in due time received the credit of discovering the new world. But these clever Romanists were faced with the problem of finding a derivation for the name America from a Roman Catholic source. With a scrupulousness which we scarcely might expect they searched out another voyager with an appropriate name, Amerigo Vespucci. Him they dispatched to the western continent, where he made "a reputed exploration of a portion of South America," and the Roman Catholic authorities circulated the word that the new continent was to be called America in honor of Americus Vesputius. So much for the derivation. We also learn that it was Roman Catholic intrigue which attached the names Columbus and Columbia to American cities, towns, streets and rivers. One of their most devilish accomplishments was to surround our capital with a District of "Columbia." The Vatican, we discover, was responsible for the Civil War. The great open air memorial to the Confederacy which is being carved on Stone Mountain, Georgia, is another Roman Catholic device to promote schism in the nation. An "All-seeing Eye" should overcap the pyramid on the reverse of our seal. But because of Roman Catholic disobedience to law it is omitted! As for our international relations, "the Pope made desperate efforts to inveigle America into Europe through the so-called League of Nations and the World Court, but Christ is invincible and the dragon has again been defeated!" We discover that no Roman Catholic and no Jew is or can be a citizen of this republic. We further learn that the Negro is not one of us because we are a "white" nation. The most damning evidence of all against him is that "the Roman Catholics were responsible for his presence here in the abject and despicable role of a slave." If the Klan's authors go on at this rate we may look forward to the creation of some of the best humor of modern times within the next few years.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

THE BAPTIST MESSAGE TO THE WORLD

On page 269 we print a message of the Baptist World Alliance to their Baptist brethren and to all Christians throughout the world, adopted by the Third Baptist World Conference at Stockholm this summer. Those who desire an authoritative statement of the Baptist point of view to-day will find it a document worth preserving. Its ringing declaration for religious freedom is courageous and fine. "Baptists have ever insisted upon religious freedom for unbelievers and atheists, as well as Christians. However deplorable their unbelief, they are responsible, not to human authorities but to God." Its words concerning the Sabbath have a like note of just freedom. "Laws to compel the religious observance of the Sabbath are opposed to religious liberty. But laws to protect the Sabbath as a civil institution are right and should be enforced." That is a distinction which we all like to think we regard, but which we certainly have sometimes neglected.

The men who framed the statement were animated by a vision of the Kingdom of God on earth. God's will, they write, "is to rule in the family, the church, in industry, in society, in the arts, in the state, and in international relations." Again, "We must strive also to the end that the organization of society itself shall accord with Christ's will, as well as that one's calling within society shall be comformable thereto." What they say on the family likewise is profound and fine. They emphasize the individual's freedom in the family as well as in the church. "The [child's] will is not to be broken, but disciplined and trained." The principle which they emphasize that the home should be the "living fountain of religious life" needs to get into the thinking of every Christian the world around. They affirm the Christian conception of industrial relations to be co-operative rather than competitive. They stand not only for world peace through international courts of justice, but for industrial peace through obedience to the law of Christ, "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you." And they do well to add the declaration that they stand for domestic peace "by acceptance of the sanctity of the marriage bond and the parental responsibility to train children in the nurture and love of the Lord." Their word in behalf of temperance is good. To be sure, the statement has its weaknesses, too. Its emphasis on the importance of baptizing only adults will surprise non-Baptists. Most Christians find it hard to see how the custom of infant baptism is "utterly irreconcilable with the ideal of a spiritual Christianity." Then the statement's summary of the "common basic beliefs" leaves a good deal to be desired. It certainly does not express the ideas which make a man of broad education turn to Christianity to-day. The "common basic beliefs" enumerated are "the incarnation of the Son of God, His sinless life, His supernatural works, His deity, His vicarious atonement, and resurrection from the dead. His present reign and His coming kingdom, with its eternal awards to the righteous and unrighteous." How different is such a summary of Christianity from the summary of the essentials for life given by Jesus Christ Himself. How foreign most of it is to the Sermon on the Mount. And where is the constitution of Christianity if it is not there? The absorbing interest of Jesus Christ was in the Kingdom of God on earth. Has not the time come when we can define Christianity in the words which most authentically come from Jesus Christ Himself? However, portions of the statement on which we have commented show that the men who drew it up have a far fuller understanding of Christianity than their enumeration of "basic beliefs" suggests. Considered as an index to the thinking of millions of men and women in the world, the document is very really encouraging.

Fifteen years ago the United States signed an arbitration treaty with Japan. Each five years the two nations have renewed it. When our State Department renewed it late last month, it was agreed in the notes covering the renewal that if the United States adheres to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the two governments may arrange to refer the disputes covered by the Treaty to that Court. Our government came to a similar arrangement with France and Great Britain when we recently renewed our arbitration treaties with them.

to point out that the doctrines of materialism are no part of natural science." Now, the supposition that those doctrines of materialism are a part of natural science was in the last generation operative commonly among the intellectual classes; in our day, this notion, more or less vague, has filtered into the minds of great masses of the people. Though they do not pretend to know anything about science itself, they take for granted somehow that the thing has been proved, and that natural science has put God and religion out of the world of sensible men. Well, listen to what Dr. Haldane says: "I think the future generations will look back with the same wonder on the popular materialism of the present time as we look back on the old popular belief in astrology and witchcraft or the ancient Greek conceptions of the physical world." The materialistic theory, he contends, has "all the distorting defects of gross forms of superstition." Surely, this is a turning of the tables. For years now it is the religious man who has been supposed to be superstitious. But here is a scientist telling us that it is the man who supposes that physical science can say the last word about the nature of the universe who is superstitious.

In biology, the science of life, we come a little nearer to a true representation, but that also leaves out any proper account of the behavior of conscious persons. When this latter is considered the conception of the individual life being self-contained is impossible, it only exists in relations, there is constant interaction going on between the individual and nature and between him and other men. There is no ultimate explanation of the human life except in the terms of a larger life. Dr. Haldane concludes that religion is the recognition that the only ultimate reality is found in that supreme personal existence which we call God. Here a man who has devoted most of his life to researches in physiology reaches a spiritual conclusion. "The faith that behind our blurred vision of the world lies the love and power of God is, in reality, the same sort of faith as that of the man of science that behind the confusion of his observations there is intelligible order. But the faith of religion is deeper and more far-reaching, since it covers the whole of our experience and is rooted deep down in its very nature. It was in this faith that our fathers faced trouble, danger and death. Faith in a God working by blind law is not a faith that can ever satisfy us"—think of that from a scientist—"the faith of religion is not something apart from reason. It is in the fullest and deepest sense rational; and nothing is more mistaken than to represent it in any other way. The appeal of religion is an appeal to us to look at our experience as a whole, and not to look merely at partial aspects of it." The last part of Dr. Haldane's article is to us indescribably pathetic. He talks about the Church; he deplores the fact that he himself is kept outside by creeds which he cannot accept. To him the creeds are partly materialistic, partly the degradation of religion into a matter of individual self-interest, and partly associated with questionable historical beliefs. Yet here is a man who believes that when we take all into account, all that appears in conscious life, in our fellowship with one another, and with those who have gone before, and with nature, God is revealed as the ultimate and only reality. God and God's love and omnipotence are within and around us, behind what appears as space, time, the material world, organic life, and individual personality. The material world, as such, is an imperfect appearance, and the only real world is the spiritual world, the only real values are spiritual values. In this knowledge we find inward satisfaction and can

Religion and Science

IN view of the fundamentalist controversy we would call the attention of our readers to an article by Dr. Haldane of Oxford in the April number of the "Hibbert Journal." Dr. Haldane writes as a representative of natural science, he has devoted most of his life to physiological research, and his article is written to warn people against taking the principles of physical science, or even biological science, to be anything more than working hypotheses of limited application, and not the means of discovering what reality is. "We must rid ourselves of the idea," he says, "so characteristic of the present, that the physical interpretation corresponds to reality itself, and is more than a preliminary and quite inadequate representation of it." To him the great illusion with which our age has to contend is the illusion that the physical sciences had given us reality.

To those, for instance, who think that consciousness is only a by-product, or an accompaniment of some kind of material processes occurring in the brain, he says that such reasoning makes the gigantic and unwarranted assumption that we really know what the material processes are, which we do not. The physical scientist does not study the whole of any subject, but only certain aspects. This is true in what is called inorganic nature, it is more true in organic nature, whereas consciousness and personality are of course beyond his measurements altogether. "It concerns me," says Dr. Haldane, "as a representative of natural science, go forward without fear. Here is a man who believes that the mission of the Church is the greatest of all missions. It is to help men to see the universe of their experience whole, and possess spiritual reality at all times and throughout all their occupations, so that they may live steadfast and unselfish lives, and fear nothing except dishonor. Think of a man like this feeling that he cannot join the Church. There must be something seriously wrong with such a Church. There are individual churches, indeed, which he could join if he knew of them. To shut out men of this kind by insisting upon beliefs in creeds which are untenable is worse than a foolish policy, it is unjust to the souls of men. We should remember that just as physical science is not able to carry us to the depths of religion, neither are creeds, nor is ritual, nor any appeal to external authority whether in State or Church or Bible. The depth of religion can only be found in the depth of the human soul, and there alone can God be realized. The well is deep.

Day of Prayer for Schools

THE National Reform Association, moved by a deep sense of the difficulties and dangers which beset our public schools, especially in their bearing on the interests of morality and religion, has recommended that a day in September, every year, be observed as a day for special and united prayer in behalf of the public and private schools of the United States. This was first proposed in 1902. It was warmly approved and commended to various ecclesiastical bodies and adopted by them, including the Presbyterian General Assemblies, North and South, the United Presbyterian General Assembly, and the Synods, Councils and Conferences of a number of other evangelical bodies.

The second Sabbath of September was most appropriately designated. The schools are opening, the churches are filling, the Sabbath schools are rallying. How can the year's work be better introduced than by praying for the children and youth?

This day is meant to concentrate the ordinarily loose thinking about the schools so that there may be more praying and the praying more intelligent. There will be notices and prefaces from some pulpits and stated discourses from others. Sabbath schools will feel their affinity with the theme and its treatment instinctively, and the young people's societies (in which there are always so many teachers and pupils) will be quick to show sympathy. Can there be anything of greater importance than that all, younger and older, teachers, parents and pupils should come to feel the close and vibrant unity existing between school life and church and home life?

The magnitude of the moral and spiritual interests involved in this vast work of education, or affected by it, commend this day of prayer for schools to all Christian citizens. For more than seventy years the day of prayer for colleges has been observed by the Christian people interested in these institutions, and incalculable results for good have been vouchsafed in answer to these prayers. But while the student world in the United States numbers not far from two hundred thousand persons, there are about twenty millions in the common schools of the nation. For every student in our universities, colleges and professional schools there are eighty in our public schools. When we add the private schools which, with certain classes take the place of the public schools, we have before us an agency which gathers under its influence, with insignificant exceptions, the children of the whole people, which is steadily making its work more thorough and complete, and which is confessedly one of the strongest moulding forces at work upon the character of the nation.

What ought to be the bearing and effect of this great agency on the morals and religion of the people? This nation is, in important respects, a Christian nation. The education provided for her future citizens ought to correspond to the national character in this respect, and should aim to transmit that character to the coming generations. The supreme need of the nation is not for intelligence or mental culture in her citizens, important as these are, but that they shall be men and women of good moral character, able to distinguish between right and wrong and resolved to do what is right and to avoid and resist what is wrong. The chief end, therefore, of the schools, to be held supreme above all mere intellectual culture, is to develop the moral nature of the pupils. If these positions are correct, it follows that any proposal to divorce education from the general, fundamental, unsectarian truths of religion, to make our education merely secular, and to absolve the teacher and the school from all responsibility except for the intellectual development of pupils, is subversive of the true American idea of education and fatal to the chief interests for which our schools were established. And yet this bald secular theory of education is accepted in wide educational circles. Many cities and many whole states are moulding their school systems in accordance with it. This very disagreement as to the true nature and objects of education constitutes a grave peril to the schools. Those who believe in God and in the efficacy of prayer will agree with us that interests so momentous and so urgent as these ought, by Christian people, to be spread before the Hearer of Prayer.

These are interests, moreover, which lie very close to the hearts of the people. Parental love and solicitude, as well as the impulses of patriotism, will respond to this appeal. There is a multitude of Christian teachers, superintendents and school officers, unselfishly desiring to do their best for the moral welfare of the pupils and burdened often with a sense of their responsibilities, who will be greatly helped and encouraged by this sympathetic remembrance on the part of the Christian Church. These prayers, moreover, will enoble in the minds of many less thoughtful teachers the work to which they have been called, will inspire them with new and higher motives and set a worthier aim before them through all the arduous labors of the following year. The same impressions will be made, in measure, on the millions of pupils from Christian homes who at the beginning of each school year will hear their pastors entreating God for them, for their teachers and for their fellow-pupils throughout the whole nation, that the true ends of education may be accomplished through the studies and the discipline of their schools.

The general observance of the day of prayer for schools will afford to pastors, insofar as they may wish to embrace it, a natural opportunity to inculcate vital truth concerning the whole work of education, and its relation to the moral and spiritual welfare of the child and to our national Christianity.

If anything more is needed to commend this proposal to devout and thoughtful minds, a glance at the petitions which will naturally be offered on such a day of concerted supplication will suffice. Pastors and churches, Bible schools and families will pray that all school teachers and school officers be guided and helped in their responsible work; that a blessing may attend the reading of the Bible and other Christian literature in the schools, and all instruction, counsel and discipline which have for their end the moral improvement of the pupils; that the vices and sins that often creep into schools may be effectually restrained; that all atheistic and un-Christian tendencies in the world of education, as well as all influences which would pervert the schools to any sectarian ends, may be successfully withstood; that the nation may have the wisdom to use her vast all-embracing system of education for those moral results which will promote the true welfare and glory of the nation; and finally, that the Spirit of God, who is the Fountain of Light, may preside over the schools, quickening and sustaining all intellectual endeavor, and leading teachers and pupils, by all the paths of learning, to Him who is the source of all wisdom and virtue. Merely to state such subjects of prayer is, in our judgment, to justify abundantly the suggestion of the Association, and to secure for it the hearty endorsement of Christian educators and leading citizens throughout the nation.

Presbyterian Missions in Peril

THE Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions is sending out the following statement, which speaks for itself:

"The foreign missionary work of our Church is in the most perilous situation in its history. At a time when its fruitfulness and efficiency are greater than they have ever been, it is threatened with the necessity of a reduction so drastic that in many fields it will have to be cut to the heart.

"What is this situation? The fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, closed with an accumulated deficit of $657,187.57. The expenditures of the current year will be greater than those of last, and if the receipts for the current year are no greater than the receipts for last year, there will be, unless radical reductions are made, an additional deficit on March 31, 1924, of $620,152, making a total deficit of $1,277,339.57.

"How did the existing deficit arise? Let there be no misunderstanding here. It did not arise through any falling off of missionary interest in the Church or any want of confidence in the missionaries. They are the soundest, truest, most faithful body of men and women in the world. It occurred simply from the absolutely unavoidable increase in the expense of supporting the missionaries and their work. The deficit of $657,187.57 was made up as follows:

"$126,298.44 balance of deficit from the war years.

"$409,415.76 required to provide living salaries, necessary furloughs and hygienic homes for the missionaries. This amount needed by the missionaries was carefully worked out in a conference with representatives from all the missions at Princeton in 1920, whose findings were reported to and approved by the General Assembly.

"$121,473.37 required for the direct evangelistic, educational and medical work and for the Board's share in the obligations imposed by General Assembly action in 1922.

"What is needed? An increase of $1,250,000 in the contributions of the Church to foreign missions this year. If this increase is given, deficits can be met or carried forward and the work can be maintained without destruction. This increase is an advance of one-third over the contributions of last year. The churches increased their foreign mission gifts forty-three per cent. between 1913 and 1919 and one hundred per cent. between 1919 and 1921.

"Will the Church not make this increase now? We do not ask for any preferential treatment for foreign missions, much less any transfer of gifts from other causes. We appeal for the full budget for all the boards. But we are setting forth the special trust committed to us and reporting to the Church the gravity of the issues involved. The budget approved by the General Assembly asks for the increase of more than the one-third for which we are now appealing.

"What will happen if this income is not given? These things will happen:

"Reserve funds will be swept away.

"The work will have to be cut to the roots.

"Many qualified young men and women of our church who have consecrated their lives to missionary service will have to be refused.

"Homes cannot be provided for missionary families now on the field.

"The opportunities for which we prayed will have to be rejected, now when God is giving them.

"The work will be set back for years at the very time that it ought to be expanded and advanced. And remember that this work is the only work being done in most of our fields. Here and there other Christian agencies are at work with us, but they cannot take over our abandoned task, and in most places there is no one near. If we stop or reduce, it means that all Christian effort stops or reduces. Is it Christian to require this? We shall be withholding the Gospel when we ought to be spreading it broadcast.

"How can this be averted? By prayer and sacrifice. By a loyal increase of all gifts, enabling all the boards to meet their needs. By special gifts from individuals and churches to meet this emergency. If six hundred churches would give $2,000 each, above their foreign mission gifts of last year, the need would be met. Some can give more than this. Thousands of churches can help with less.

"It must be done now. Let us not be confused or troubled in the face of the clear issue. We have in our foreign missions the greatest work in the world and the noblest and most trustworthy workers. They must not be allowed to suffer.

"Never have we asked for your support of this work as earnestly and appealingly as we ask now. This is no ordinary call. We beg your help to avert disaster. From whom? From the missionaries and their work. It is not the Board which is in need or is making this appeal. The Board is nothing but the agent of the Church and the representative of the missionaries. It is on them and their work that the disaster will fall. They have a right to expect of us that we will do whatever needs to be done and will make whatever sacrifice needs to be made at this time to save them and the work that is theirs and ours.

"Please draw your check now to the order of Dwight H. Day, treasurer, or Lucy Lepper, associate treasurer, and send to the Board of Foreign Missions, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York."

THE OBSERVER

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

The Revolt of Youth

I HAVE been very much interested in reading Stanley High's recent volume, "The Revolt of Youth." (It is published by the Abingdon Press and is a very valuable study of certain phases of awakening among the students of various countries.) I wish I could feel as optimistic as Mr. High does about the outcome of the movement. I have watched the universities for thirty-five years and must confess that my hope in youth has been somewhat dampened. Every class that has been graduated has contained a few fine spirits of high idealism and prophetic outlook, but most of the men have become just good, honest, capable, amiable lawyers, doctors, teachers, clergymen and business men. They are the salt of the earth, but not its fire or spirit. They accept the conventions without question and do what their fathers did, but somehow or other they do not dream dreams or see visions or lead crusades or even smite the evils of the world. Mr. Coolidge is a typical college man and his declaration is, "I am going to continue Mr. Harding's policies." (Mr. Harding was another college man, stable, full of poise, respectable, generous, cultured to a degree.) But suppose Mr. Coolidge had said as his first word, "I am going to lead the world out of this morass up into light and happiness and peace." This is what Mr. High is expecting from the present generation of students. But I am afraid they are much like the old. I see no signs of idealism or leadership in the rank and file of our students. I pick up the circular which has just come from the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a group of ardent, idealistic youth, inviting me to their October conference and I read what these youth stand for:

"The Fellowship of Reconciliation believes that social injustice, war, and every kind of evil can be overcome only by God's power of love, shown in Jesus, working through men and women. We seek, with others, to set up in the midst of the present alienation of individuals, classes, races and nations a family that cannot be divided."

When I get the news from Yale or Princeton or Harvard or Michigan or Minnesota I do not read these things. I read about the students taking military drill, joining certain regiments and camps. I read all about big social events and now and then an expression of opinion on industrial and social matters, but almost always on the side of conservatism and convention. I read the other day about one university where the students refused to hear a group of visiting students from Europe because some of these visitors held advanced ideas about patriotism, the social order and militarism. The students seem the bulwark of the old-fashioned patriotism—the kind that produced the war. They rushed to protect their country when we entered the war, but there is little sign that they have caught any vision of a bigger thing than that, a higher devotion, and there is a much bigger thing, a much higher consecration, namely, humanity and the building of a beautiful world-city of good-will. I look in vain for such manifestation of idealism among the students of to-day.

Of course, as I said, there are some such students in every class, and it is to these, I suppose, that Mr. High looks for leadership, and it is in these he puts his hope. My only question is whether there are as many as he thinks he finds and whether he does not give an unconsciously false impression, whether he is not looking through both rosy and magnifying glasses. I hope I am mistaken, and I want to say again that in every class are these men, that our great Student Movement is of college men, that even such societies as the Fellowship of Reconciliation is itself largely composed of college men.

Neither do I feel so sure as does Mr. High that it is the students of Germany, Austria, Serbia, Hungary and France who, having fought for something they thought bigger and nobler than country during the last war, and who, seeing the disillusionment which the war has brought, are going to rise up and demand a new order. Mr. High says:

"The youth of the world are pointing the way to the new day which statesmen have failed to bring to pass. A larger friendship, a new internationalism, is appearing with these assertions of the youth-spirit. Already to control the potentialities with which it is invested has become the object of preying politicians. But the manifestations of the youth-spirit, as we shall study them in the succeeding chapters, furnish constructive evidence that from the bewildering confusion which seems to have engulfed the world a new world structure may arise, built, perhaps, after the manner of the ideals which youth professes."

While there are a few students who, in their various countries have caught the vision, unfortunately most of them are putting themselves solidly behind the intense nationalism developed since the war. The German students are the bulwark of the monarchical party; the French students are solidly behind the chauvinism of France. The students of Austria and Hungary are so hungry that they are a little more idealistic, but the majority would follow any policy of their respective nations, just as they do in America and Great Britain.

The value of Mr. High's book is that it does survey the various youth movements in the different countries, including China, Japan and South America as well as Europe, and does show us the new forces that are working in the world. They do enter the colleges and they touch a man here and there, but he has to come apart from his college companions, who, on the whole, sit in the seats of their fathers, and join The Young Republic in France or some league of youth in the other countries—and there are several—which rises above nationalism, chauvinism, militarism, stand-patism and the status quo. Mr. High is right in one thing: there is more fermentation and wondering going on in the minds of the students of Japan and China than in our Western universities. Large groups of students in both countries are on the liberal and progressive side. Credit should be given to the large group of students in Oxford who have taken the liberal and progressive side in international affairs. It is an almost unheard of thing that any large, considerable, really influential group in any British or American university has come out ardently for any new order. A very large number of Oxford students joined the League of Nations Movement and a large union was formed composed of students. They even went up and down England on pilgrimages and speaking tours. The youth of America had a wonderful opportunity at the same time to speak unanimously for America's leadership in a new world order, a federation of the world. On the whole, however, they were silent, abiding by isolation, as did their fathers. But perhaps Mr. High is right when he says the forces are gathering that are going to shake these youth. There is my hope. I believe one trouble is that the ideal is not put before our colleges. I happen to know of one or two colleges where the president is a devout Christian, a pronounced idealist, a passionate believer in humanity and the family of nations. I think I can feel a different atmosphere in these colleges. I am also sure, from my own experience with college audiences, that when the larger call, the bigger devotion, the idealistic outlook upon life is presented, the youth respond. Perhaps there is hope after all. Anyhow, let us be thankful that out of our colleges every year come at least a few who see beyond the confines of party, class and nation and recognize themselves as world citizens with duties bounded only by the world.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Larger Nationalism

By Rev. R. F. Horton, M.A., D.D.

THE book on the burning question of Unemployment by Mr. Kirkconnel places all the troubles of to-day to what he calls the "mad nationalism," which appeared to culminate in the war, but has survived and is making the peace of Europe still unattainable, and doing what is called to-day Balkanizing Europe. Now up to a certain point, national feeling, or, as we call it, patriotism, is a very necessary and a very educative virtue. Reformers, for example, used to look on it as a guiding policy for thought in Europe. You will remember, some of you, how reformers rejoiced when Italy, instead of being a geographical expression, became a nation. Some of you even may remember how reformers sympathized with Kossuth in his struggle for Hungarian nationality. It seems incredible to-day, but there were many, led by Thomas Carlyle, who congratulated Bismarck on making the German nation; and always there were many perpetually deploring the partition of Poland and the suspension of Polish nationality. Some even sympathized with Ireland in Ireland's contention that she was a nation. But very few of us in this generation after the war feel such enthusiasm for nationalism. We have seen that German nationalism produced the greatest disaster that we know in history, destroying Germany and bringing destruction and misery to Europe; and we have learned to see that nationalism may be the greatest hindrance to the prosperity of mankind, keeping the world in a perpetual ferment of hatred and jealousy and antagonism. The truth is that nationalism to-day is horribly tainted with commercialism and unblushing greed. The honor of a nation is a fine phrase for securing trade opportunities, the markets of the world, the command of raw materials. It used to be said, "Trade follows the flag," but that has come to mean that the flag is used in the interests of trade.

The jingling of a guinea helps the heart that honor feels, And the nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels.

This nationalism, therefore, that our fathers regarded as one of the great virtues of the human spirit has come to be very greatly suspect. But we must remember that it is not desirable that it should be destroyed. It is a step in the development of humanity; it has played its part in rescuing the world from imperialisms of many kinds, and it has been the training of the people for self-government. But the task of to-day is to cure it of its madness. We want to find out the hellebore for nationalist insanity. Men are beginning to believe that a wise internationalism is going to be, for the future, the most effective safeguard of nationalism. We do not want to destroy nationalism, we want to make it safe; that is all; and the cure for that insanity lies exactly in that Kingdom of God which Christ preached and which must somehow be realized; and the Church's task, and the statesman's task—as many very prominent statesmen begin now to realize—is not to destroy nationalism, which has many valuable features, but somehow or other to apply the laws of Christ to the nations in their relation one with another.

That is the idea which we want to impress upon our readers. And, what is far more difficult, we want to convince you that it is a possible ideal, and that the result will some day be achieved.

A few days ago we were in Norwich, and looking at that masterpiece of medieval architecture—Herbert de Lozinga's cathedral—one of the things that struck us most was that in the front of it is a monument to a great local celebrity, Lord Nelson, and in the rear of it is a monument to another great local celebrity, Nurse Cavell, and that great monument of medieval piety brings together in one those two names that are familiar to us all. Those two names are also brought together in London in a rather remarkable way, for there, in Trafalgar Square, the lofty column of Nelson has been teaching us for more than a century a great lesson, and who shall say that England has not learned that lesson during the century? That column is ever proclaiming to us that England expects every man to do his duty. There is no such inscription upon the column, but we never can look at the figure of Nelson without that word leaping from his lips to our hearts. But that lowlier monument close to Trafalgar

Square, the monument to Nurse Cavell, the monument to a woman's devotion, is ever uttering to us her memorable words as she died. These words are not inscribed upon the monument, any more than Nelson's words are inscribed upon the column. It is not necessary, for to all generations it will speak, and no one will ever be able to look at the statue of Nurse Cavell without hearing her dying words, "I have learned that patriotism is not enough."

Those two monuments stand in Trafalgar Square proclaiming apparently antagonistic sentiments. But they are not antagonistic. We are moving on to the point of development where they will blend. "England expects every man to do his duty" will merge into "God expects every nation to do its duty," and then the love of country will be in a sense transformed; it will mean the passionate desire of every citizen of a great country that his country may be worthy and able to contribute its quota to the general welfare of the world. Go round about Trafalgar Square, consider her columns and her monuments, until that idea becomes familiar, so obvious that no one would venture to dispute it.

Now we are going to offer three considerations which may make this great consummation of history appear not an idle dream, as, we are sorry to say, it still does to a great many people who are pessimistic, but a true reading of the real trend and development of human history. These three considerations will not appeal equally to everyone, one to some, another to another, and the third to a few, but if any of us can estimate these three considerations, take them into account, we shall find a very strong hope growing in our hearts that this Kingdom of God is sure to come, and that what seems to-day so impossible will be realized by ways we never dreamed of, and as we realize the possibility even we shall all rise up to greet it and to accomplish it. Now, the first consideration is this: it is a very obvious one, but it is just as well to point out the things that are happening around us: the rapid and undreamed-of drawing together of the whole world, not only into a unity, but almost into a particular place, must have vast consequences. The conquest of the air, terrible, indeed, if war is to be included in the program of the future, terrible as it was seen to be in that prophetic verse of Tennyson's long ago, this conquest of the air is really one of the greatest possibilities for the realization of the Kingdom of God, because it has speeded up the relations of men with one another; it has brought us into touch with one another. We are told only this past week that an airship is being prepared in Hamburg which will convey three hundred passengers in all the comfort of an Atlantic liner, and will cross from Hamburg to New York in forty-eight hours. The discovery of the wireless telegraphy has brought the world literally together; it has made the world in a sense quite small; it points to the time when men will be able, all over the world, to consult together with more unanimity than hitherto the people of a single nation have been able to consult. And with the application of the same principle to the telephone, and, what is now becoming common, "listening in," listening to things that are uttered many miles away, even thousands of miles away, it all points to something which will soon be the commonplace of our children's experience. The whole world will become one auditorium in which one voice can speak to all mankind. And that significant and almost unimaginable discovery which is implied in this broadcasting, if you come to think of it, is the condition of the nations becoming one, and of mankind living together in the same peace that at present the people of a single country enjoy.

Now, the second consideration is of a different kind. This unification of the nations, this solidarity of man, has always been anticipated and foretold by prophetic minds. For example, in those prophetic writings which are the most familiar to us, the writings of the Old Testament prophets, you can see constantly flashing in upon their minds the certainty of this accomplishment. They see the nations flowing together and coming up to the House of the Lord. They see those nations learning war no more, but changing their implements of warfare into implements of industry; they see the nations of the world harmonized in a common knowledge. "The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." And that prophecy to which we have just referred in passing, that prophecy of Tennyson's, which you must remember was written in 1842, must appear very extraordinary to us to-day. You cannot help thinking that Tennyson was among the prophets, that the spirit of God was guiding him. Or it may only have been that he had studied those Old Testament prophets until their expectations had become his. But that passage which we so often quoted during the war, because it referred to the aerial warfare which was our torment, ends, as you remember, in the forecast of that complete unity of the nations about which we are speaking to you to-night:

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see, Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails, Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;
Far along the world-wide whisper of the south-wind rushing warm.
With the standards of the peoples plunging thro' the thunder-storm;
Till the war-drum throb'd no longer, and the battle-flags were fur'd
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world."

"In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world"—what a prophecy that is! In days when the world had never conceived the possibility of a League of Nations, and when Tennyson himself was farther off from even thinking of it than perhaps any man then living.

But there is a third consideration. Christ must have anticipated this, and He must have pointed the way to its realization. For though He seemed not interested in the politics of His time, and seemed to hold aloof deliberately from any judgment upon a political issue, He uttered that prophecy which covers the whole ground. He said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." And He pictured the end of this world's history as a judgment of the nations brought before His judgment seat. It is therefore evident to us that what Christ was always telling men, though they could not understand it, was exactly what now we begin to hope for—a real parliament of man, a federation of the world. He passed His life in the bosom of a nation that was indeed fanatical in its nationalism, and He was surrounded by that great Roman Empire which was the absolute negation of the Kingdom of God. It demanded worship for itself in the person of its Caesar. German Kaiserism was only the continuation of that Roman conception, and the diseased nationalisms of to-day, since the war, are perpetuating just the blind nationalism of Judah. It was in the midst of those nationalist states or imperialistic conceptions that He passed His life. And how did He treat them? He, as it were, looked over them and took no notice of them. He was a true lover of His people, but He only loved the Jews because they were part of humanity, and He wished them to contribute their quota to the world. Salvation, He said, is of the Jews. His coming among the Jews was the Jews' one contribution to the life of mankind. But He did not love that Roman Empire. He treated it with absolute scorn. Caesar meant nothing to Him. He knew that that, like every other imperialism, would vanish away in dust, leaving nothing but the tragedy of its defilement behind. He stood among men, a true Son of His people, but without any mad nationalism. He stood in the Roman Empire conceiving a Kingdom of God. No rebel against the powers that then were, but ignoring them as transitory and unimportant. For the Roman Empire was to pass away, and many other empires were to pass away, and it mattered little to the world. The one thing that mattered was that the Kingdom of God would come, and that He, Christ, would be Lord of lords and King of kings. And it is that certainty of Christ upon this subject that should give us confidence in believing that this better day is coming, when the nations shall literally flow together and be united in a common faith and loyalty to the supreme good.

A Message to the Baptist World Alliance

To the Baptist Brotherhood, to Other Christian Brethren, and to the World

THE Third Baptist World Congress, meeting in Stockholm, Sweden, July, 1923, and representing with few exceptions the Baptists of every country in the world, a constituency numbering nine millions of baptized members and many millions of adherents, in view of world conditions, and resolutely facing the problems of the future, makes this declaration of Baptist principles and purposes to the Christians and peoples of the world.

We are, first and always, Christians, acknowledging in its deepest and broadest sense the Lordship of Jesus Christ, and devoted to Him as the Son of God and Saviour of the world. We rejoice that the spiritual unity of all believers is a blessed reality, not dependent upon organization or ceremonies. We pray that by increasing obedience to Christ's will this unity may be deepened and strengthened among Christians of every name.

THE LORDSHIP OF JESUS CHRIST

There are various ways of stating the fundamental Baptist principle. If we indicate the source of our knowledge, we say the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are divinely inspired and are our sufficient, certain and authoritative guide in all matters of faith and practice. As to the nature of the Christian religion, we affirm that it is personal and spiritual. We believe in the direct relation of each individual to God, and the right of every one to choose for himself in all matters of faith. A Christian's religion begins in the soul when personal faith is exercised in Jesus Christ, the divine Redeemer and Lord. As the Revealer of God to men and the Mediator of salvation, Jesus Christ is central for Christian faith. His will is the supreme law for the Christian. He is Lord of the conscience of the individual and of the Church. Hence, the Lordship of Jesus Christ is a cardinal teaching of Baptists. It excludes all merely human authorities in religion.

THE NATURE OF BAPTIST UNITY

We desire to impress upon our Baptist brethren in every part of the world the importance of Baptist unity at the present time. Accepting the voluntary principle in religion and regarding the nature of Christianity as a spiritual relation between man and God, we inevitably take the same attitude on questions of faith and conduct as they arise within the Church. We hold fast to the freedom with which Christ has set us free, and this principle implies that we must be willing to love and to work with those who, agreeing with us on the main things and in loyalty to our distinctive Baptist principles, have their own personal convictions upon non-essentials. All Baptist organizations are formed on the voluntary principle. None of these possesses authority over any other. All enjoy equal rights and autonomy within the limits of their own purposes.

CHRISTIAN UNITY

Baptists have ever held all who have communion with God in our Lord Jesus Christ as our Christian brethren in the work of the Lord, and heirs with them of eternal life. We love their fellowship, and maintain that the spiritual union does not depend upon organization, forms or ritual. It is deeper, higher, broader and more stable than any or all externals. All who truly are joined to Christ are our brethren in the common salvation, whether they be in the Catholic communion, or in a Protestant communion, or in any other communion, or in no communion. Baptists, with all evangelical Christians, rejoice in the common basic beliefs: the incarnation of the Son of God, His sinless life, His supernatural works, His deity, His vicarious atonement, and resurrection from the dead, His present reign and His coming kingdom, with its eternal awards to the righteous and unrighteous.

To Baptists it is entirely clear that the direct relation of the soul to God, or the universal priesthood of believers, is the basis of the New Testament teaching as to the Church and the ministry. Christian unity, therefore, as Baptists understand the New Testament, is a result of the operation of the Holy Spirit arising from a common faith in Christ, enlightened by a common understanding of His teachings, inspired by a common vision of the ends of the Kingdom of God, and issuing in a free and voluntary co-operation in the execution of the will of Christ. Christian unity is thus a flexible principle, adapting itself to every situation. It admits co-operation so far as there is agreement, and abstains from all coercion beyond this point.

The implications of the voluntary principle based upon the universal priesthood of believers in their bearing upon Christian unity are clear. Baptists cannot consent to any form of union which impairs the rights of the individual believer.

We cannot unite with others in any centralized ecclesiastical organization wielding power over the individual conscience. We cannot accept the sacerdotal conception of the ministry which involves the priesthood of a class with special powers for transmitting grace. We cannot accept the conception of ordination made valid through a historic succession in the ministry. As Baptists understand the New Testament, all believers being priests unto God, the ministry can possess no sacerdotal powers. They are called to special tasks of preaching and teaching and administration. They remain the spiritual equals of other believers in the Church. Again, the principle of the universal priesthood of believers involves the direct authority of Jesus Christ our great High Priest. Christian unity, therefore, can only come through obedience to the will of Christ as revealed in the New Testament, which Baptists must ever take as their sole, sufficient, certain and authoritative guide.

THE BAPTIST FAITH AND MISSION

As Baptists view it, the Christian religion finds its central truth in the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ, whose sinless life and heavenly wisdom, whose deity, atoning death, resurrection from the dead, and whose second coming and lordship in the Kingdom of God constitute and qualify Him for His work as its Founder and Mediator. God calls all men to salvation through Him, in whom they are freely justified by grace through faith, and regenerated by the operation of the Holy Spirit. Regeneration, or the new birth, is a necessary condition of church membership, since in this way alone can the churches be kept spiritual and responsive to the will of Christ. Church membership of believers only is a fundamental Baptist principle. Each church, as made up of the regenerate, is competent to conduct its own affairs. It is, therefore, by its nature and constitution, a spiritual democracy, free and self-governing, and answering to Christ alone as its ultimate authority.

The New Testament recognizes nothing as baptism but the immersion in water of the believer in Christ upon profession of faith. In the Lord's Supper it recognizes no sacerdotal authority in those who administer it, and no sacramental quality in the bread and wine, by virtue of which it conveys grace through any change in the elements.

In the matter of the polity, the officers and the ordinances of a church, Baptists seek to preserve the spirituality and simplicity of the New Testament, and at the same time the proper proportion of emphasis. A group of great spiritual principles underlies their conception of a church at all points. As a self-governing spiritual democracy, a church recognizes the spiritual competency and freedom of the individual members. Since it requires a personal profession of faith as a condition of baptism, it eliminates the proxy element in faith and respects the rights of personality. Hence, infant baptism is utterly irreconcilable with the ideal of a spiritual Christianity. Voluntary and not compulsory baptism is a vital spiritual principle of the New Testament.

The officers of a church are teachers and leaders, not ecclesiastical authorities. Thus at all points a church of Christ is the outward expression of great spiritual principles; the supreme value of personality, the inalienable rights of free choice and of direct access to God, the equality of all believers, and their common spiritual priesthood. No charge, therefore, can be more groundless than that Baptists are ceremonialists or sacramentalists. They are the exact opposite of these things.

In harmony with the above principles, Baptists conceive their mission to the world to be moral and spiritual. Primarily, their duty is to make known the will of Christ and secure the willing submission of men to Him, as set forth in the Gospel of the grace of God. Evangelization and missions thus become prime factors in the program of Baptists. The command of Christ to preach the Gospel to every creature is of permanent binding force. The necessity for education, philanthropy and civic and social righteousness in manifold forms arises inevitably out of evangelizing and missionary activity.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND ITS APPLICATIONS

Baptists from the beginning of their history have been the ardent champions of religious liberty. They have often been persecuted, but they could never persecute others save in defiance of their own principles. Religious liberty is an inherent and inalienable human right. It arises out of the direct relation of the soul to God. Man is constituted in God's image. He is a free personality. Moral responsibility is based upon this freedom. This is a fundamental axiom of ethics as well as of religion.

Religious liberty, in its broadest significance, implies the following elements: First, no human authority of any kind, in society at large, in church or state, has any right to repress or hinder or thwart any man or group of men in the exercise of religious belief or worship. Second, the right of every man and group of men to complete freedom in the search for, the worship of, and obedience to God. Third, freedom to teach and preach those beliefs and truths which men may hold as committed to them from God to be made known to others.

Religious liberty is inconsistent with any union of Church and State, because the Church rests upon the spiritual principle of free choice, while the State rests upon law with an ultimate appeal to physical force. It is inconsistent with special favor by the State towards one or more religious groups and toleration towards others, because equality of privilege is a fundamental and inalienable religious right of all men. It is inconsistent with priestly and episcopal authority and infant baptism, because free choice and voluntary obedience to Christ are essential to the Christian religion.

Thus Baptists stand for the rights of the individual versus the close ecclesiastical corporation, the direct relation of the soul to God versus the indirect, free grace versus sacramental grace, believer's baptism versus infant baptism, personal versus proxy faith, the priesthood of all believers versus the priesthood of a class, democracy in the church versus autocracy or oligarchy or other forms of human authority. Religious liberty is not license. It gives no right to the indulgence of lust or sin in any form. It confers no exemption from the authority of the State in its own sphere. It implies and requires loyalty to Christ on the part of every Christian. For non-Christians it implies responsibility to God alone for religious beliefs and freedom from all coercion in matters of religious opinion. Baptists have ever insisted upon religious freedom for unbelievers and atheists as well as Christians. However deplorable their unbelief, they are responsible, not to human authorities, but to God.

RELIGION AND ETHICS

Our religion is not only for the salvation of the individual, it is also ethical and social. The new life in Christ creates a new moral character and a new sense of social responsibility. The Christian ideal is God's Kingdom. He is to reign in all realms of life. His will is to rule in the family, the church, in industry, in society, in the arts, in the state, and in international relations.

FAMILY LIFE

Family life of high quality is fundamental to all human progress. Here especially should personality, its needs, its discipline and development, control. Here Christ's law of mutual love and service should rule. Children are free personalities to be reared in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The will is not to be broken, but disciplined and trained. The home should be a living fountain of religious life, where prayer and the study of the Scriptures should not be shifted to the school or to any other agency. Divorce is one of the greatest evils of the day in many parts of the world. The duty of all Christians everywhere is to resist this evil. Christ's teaching on the subject should be respected and every proper means employed to resist and correct the tendency to divorce. The sacredness of the marriage vow and the purity of home life should be safeguarded in all possible ways.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS

There is widely apparent in the churches to-day the growth of a new conscience in relation to social problems and a new quest for the will of God in modern society. We are realizing afresh that the purpose of Christianity is the purification of the entire life of humanity, its end a community truly and completely Christian. The noble and self-sacrificing work of caring for the social wreckage of our time, the poverty-stricken and the outcast, must not cease. But our duty does not end there. Not simply by doing an honest day's work, or by cultivating relations of brotherhood with one's fellow-workers, important as these are, can the Christian obligation be fully met. We must strive also to the end that the organization of society itself shall accord with Christ's will, as well as that one's calling within society shall be conformable thereto.

Baptists gladly recognize the Christian duty of applying the teaching and spirit of our Lord to social, industrial and family relations. While not committed to any of the varied and conflicting theories of economics, we affirm the Christian conception of industrial relations to be co-operation rather than competition. Life is a stewardship held for the enrichment of all, and not simply for personal gain.

We stand for world peace through international courts of justice, industrial peace through obedience to the rule of Christ, "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you," domestic peace by acceptance of the sanctity of the marriage bond and the parental responsibility to train children in the nurture and love of the Lord.

CHRISTIAN STEWARDSHIP

Christian stewardship rests upon the foundation of God's ownership of ourselves and our possessions. "Ye are not your own. Ye have been bought with a price," is the divine declaration. All wealth is to be held in trust as God's gift. It is to be used as He commands. The right of private ownership of property by the Christian does not mean the right to do as he wills with his own, but rather as God wills. The mere accumulation of wealth is not the aim of the Christian business man, but rather the use of wealth in the service of God and men. Under the old dispensation the Jews gave at least one-tenth of their income to the service of God. Christians are not under law, but under the Gospel. But surely their obligation requires giving upon a scale equal to that of Jews. One-tenth, however, does not exhaust the Christian's obligation. All that he has belongs to God and his giving should be in proportion to the needs and requirements of the Lord's work and his own ability, whether it be one-tenth or nine-tenths, or even more of his income.

THE SABBATH

We recognize and reaffirm with vigor the sanctity of the Sabbath; all work except works of necessity and mercy should be avoided on the Sabbath day. God has appointed one day in seven as a day of rest and worship and it should be observed by all men in accordance with the divine command. We condemn as un-Christian the commercialization of the Sabbath day in the interest of business or amusement of any kind. As a civil institution, one day in seven, observed as a day of rest, has proved to be in the highest degree promotive of human welfare. The religious observance of the Sabbath as a day of worship is a matter for free and voluntary action. Laws to compel such observance are opposed to religious liberty. But laws to protect the Sabbath as a civil institution are right and should be enforced.

TEMPERANCE

We record our conviction that the modern movement to curb traffic in strong drink for beverage purposes is of God. We believe that governments should recognize the movement, and that instead of deriving support from it through taxation, should abolish this traffic.

BAPTISTS AND LOYALTY TO STATE

Baptists have always been a loyal and patriotic people. This attitude arises out of their fundamental principles. It is a necessary result of their submission to the will of God as revealed in Jesus Christ. It is seen clearly in the light of their view of the State and of the Church. Baptists believe that the State is ordained of God. It is established to restrain and punish the evil doer and for the protection of human rights. It is, therefore, essential to human welfare. It is not to be used in the interest of any group or class, but to promote the common good. Its duty is to safeguard the personal, economic, civic and religious rights of all.

It thus appears that the work of the Church and the work of the State lie in different spheres. In the one case it is a spiritual, in the other a political task. There is no antagonism, and there should be no conflict. Each should freely pursue its own tasks in its department of life by its own means and methods. Neither should seek to thwart or hinder the other. The members of the churches should obey the laws of the State as loyal citizens or subjects. The State should protect the rights of all men of various religious beliefs. The supreme loyalty of all men is to God. Disobedience to the State, therefore, is never justified except when the State usurps the place of God in trying to compel the conscience in religious matters, or when it becomes a transgressor of the law of God in requiring what is in violation of divine commands.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Nations are morally bound to each other. The State, like the individual, must be regarded as a member of a larger community in which other members possess rights similar to its own. This implies that in an orderly world there can be no real conflict of interests between various governments. Secret selfish diplomacy and intrigue are crying sins before God. National selfishness is a terrible evil.

We record our profound conviction against war. It is destructive of all economic, moral and spiritual values. A war of aggression is a direct contradiction of every principle of the Gospel of Christ. It violates the ideals of peace and brotherhood and is inconsistent with the law of love. It alienates nations which Christ seeks to unity in bonds of friendship. It enthrones hate and dries up the fountains of sympathy. It sets power above right. It creates burdensome debts. It is prodigal in its waste of life.

The true remedy for war is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. soul of the individual. The law of God is thus written upon soul of the individual. The law of God is thus written upon the heart. The greatest need of the world is acceptance of the Lordship of Christ by men everywhere and practical application of His law of love.

We favor co-operation among the nations of the world to promote peace. No nation can live an isolated life. To attempt to do so inevitably gives rise to complicated problems and leads to conflict in many forms. The good of all is the good of each, and the good of each is the good of all. Christ's law of service is the key to all human progress. Nations as well as individuals are bound by that law. By obedience to it shall we hasten the complete realization of God's will among men and the fulfillment of the ideals of the great prayer which the Master taught us to pray, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as in heaven."

We believe that the world has come to a parting of the ways. It is another coming of the Son of man. It is another day of the Lord. The question is whether the world will pass along the way of order and peace and goodness and faith, or whether it will go down into scepticism and ruin. We believe that the simple message of the Baptists, with its union of gospel ethics, of faith and practice, with its note of freedom, democracy, spirituality and gospel, will find an answering chord in this new world.

The Church's Challenge to Industry

By Rev. John McDowell, D.D.

Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of National Missions

[Dr. McDowell is author of the social creed of the Presbyterian Church as adopted by the Presbyterian General Assembly. He himself started life as a poor breaker boy in the coal mines, where he lost an arm. He was then educated for the ministry, became pastor of the famous Brown Memorial Church in Baltimore, and was called to the secretaryship of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, now merged with the Board of National Missions. After each point in Dr. McDowell's statement of the Church's challenge to industry we have inserted a brief comment in fine print suggesting the relation of the challenge to present conditions. For this comment we are indebted to Rev. F. Ernest Johnson, of the Research Department of the Federal Council of Churches.]

NO one who believes the teachings of Christianity as recorded in the New Testament and who accepts the Christian Church as the divinely appointed agent to perpetuate these teachings will deny or question the Church's right to challenge industry.

That Christ constantly challenged the un-Christian ideas of his day is abundantly proved by the record of His life in the Gospels. His challenge was voiced in such unforgettable words as these: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God," "How much is a man better than a sheep," "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" "Is not the life more than meat and the body than raiment?" "It is not the will of your heavenly Father that one of these little ones should perish." These and many other passages make it clear that Jesus dared to challenge the idea that "might gives right, even if it does not make right"—the idea that satisfaction is best won in the game whose rules are "grab" and "get" and "keep." Insofar as the Church is true to the example and practice of Christ, it, too, must dare to challenge everything that is un-Christian in industry to-day.

The New Testament makes it perfectly clear also that Christ intended Christianity to be the dominant and regulative factor in all of man's relationships and obligations. In accordance with this inclusive conception of Christianity we find that Christ defines religion in terms of two commandments, namely: "Love the Lord thy God," and "Love thy neighbor" (Matt. 22:37-39). It is obvious that this definition of religion covers all man's life and obligations. Obedience to the first commandment saves the individual; obedience to the second commandment saves society. There can be no doubt that Christ meant the second commandment to govern men in all their relations with one another precisely as He meant the first commandment to govern all man's relations with God. That Christ intended Christianity to dominate and regulate all of man's life is further shown by the symbols which He used in describing what His disciples should be and what they should do in the world. He said: "Ye are the salt of the earth," "Ye are the light of the world" (Matt. 5:13), "Ye are the leaven of society" (Matt. 13:33). Such statements as these make it perfectly clear that Christ claimed the whole earth, the whole world, the whole of human society as the sphere in which His religion was to operate. These and many other teachings indicate that Christ expected Christianity to conquer all peoples, to sweeten all relationships, to sanctify all activities, to satisfy all the longings of the soul, to solve all the problems of human society. If Christ's expectation, therefore, is to be realized, the Church must establish the authority of Christ in all human relationships—domestic, civic, commercial, industrial, educational, political, national and international. Righteousness cannot be excluded from any department of our manifold life. Christianity teaches that Christ is Lord of all and all must be claimed in his name. The spiritual must penetrate and dominate the material and the commercial if God's Kingdom is to come in all its fulness to this world.

Much of our present industrial unrest is due to the failure of the Church to insist that if Christ is to be Master anywhere He must be Master everywhere. Had the Christian Church insisted from the beginning that Christians exclude their business, their politics, their industry, their national and international interests from Christ's sovereignty, the present industrial and international unrest would have been impossible. The present industrial unrest is a direct condemnation of the Church for not insisting that "His Kingdom ruleth over all"—over all railroads and coal mines, over all steel mills and cotton factories, over all stores and schools, over all congresses and churches, over all national and international life. The Christianity entrusted to the Church for the salvation of mankind is a law for the regulation of society as well as a way of salvation for the individual.

The Church will never win for her Master the allegiance of the strong men of this world until she shows them that Christ has the power and the purpose to rule the shop, the factory, the counting house, the labor unions and the manufacturers' associations as well as the church and the home. Charged with these inescapable divine and human obligations, the Church should be the first to see what justice demands, what honor requires, and what the Christian spirit dictates in the realm of industry. While the Church is not prepared to advocate the employment of any particular industrial system, it does affirm the Christian fundamental principles and challenges industry to embody them in all of its operations. The Church challenges industry to declare:

I. For the application of Christian principles to the conduct of industrial, agricultural and commercial organizations and relationships. Among these Christian principles are:

A. The sacredness of life and the supreme worth of personality, so that a man must always be treated as an end and never as a means.

1 (A). This cuts across the current idea that industry is to be measured solely by the production of goods. The introduction of the eight-hour shift in the steel industry is bringing many new applicants who would not work in the steel mills while the length of the working day was determined solely by the demands of the manufacturing process.

B. The brotherhood of man, demanding for every worker a democratic status in industry, and mutual understanding, good-will, co-operation and a common incentive among all engaged in it.

1 (B). It is still accepted doctrine in great industrial concerns that the handling of labor is a detail of management, like the placing of machinery or the routing of materials through the plant.

2. For the right and duty to work, since human society cannot endure unless each of its members has the opportunity and feels the obligation to serve the common good to the extent of his ability.

2. One of the main hindrances to efficient productive effort on the part of labor is the fear that if much is produced the job will give out. Moreover, the fact that many do not work because they do not have to militates against labor efficiency and contentment. "Six days shalt thou labor!"

3. For a worthy and just return to every man according to his contribution to the common welfare, and for a social order in which no man shall live on the fruits of another man's labor and no man shall be denied the fruits of his own labor. "The laborer is worthy of his hire." Worthiness of return for honest work is measured to-day, first of all, by the standard of "a living wage," by which is meant a wage adequate to maintain the worker and his family in health and honor, and to enable him to dispense with the subsidiary earnings of his children up to the age of sixteen.

3. After all the hard work that has been done on living standards and budgets by social workers and government officials, the United States Railroad Labor Board has given the signal for a general disregard of the whole subject by declaring that "the living wage" is a bit of "mellifluous phraseology."

4. For the protection of children from exploitation in industry, agriculture or trade and from work that is dwarfing, degrading or morally unwholesome.

4. The two Federal attempts at legislating child labor out of existence have failed before the Supreme Court. More attempts will be made, but perhaps the most effective weapon is the organized protest which can be made by the Christian conscience of America.

5. For such regulation of the conditions of occupation of women as shall secure an adequate living wage and at the same time safeguard their physical and moral health and that of the community and of future generations.

5. Even Christian employers of high standing in their churches are opposing minimum wage laws for women and insisting that wages must continue to be determined by the mechanical principle of "supply and demand."

6. For the safeguarding of working people from harmful conditions of labor, dangerous machinery and occupational disease, and for the education of the workers in avoiding hazards in connection with their employment.

6. Here we have made excellent progress through the operation of workmen's compensation laws. But in many industries the hazards remain great and the workers have no adequate compensation for them. Witness the mine disasters of the last year or two.

7. For the assumption by industry of the burdens entailed by industrial accidents, disease and death, and for the training of injured workers for continued production and self-support.

7. We built up during the war a technique for retraining war cripples. An effort is being made to adapt it to the needs of industrial cripples. The first requirement is that industry should develop a keener conscience and accept a greater measure of responsibility.

8. For the release of every worker for rest one day in seven, which, wherever possible, should be the Lord's Day.

8. How many street railway workers, apartment house employees, milk wagon drivers and so on are working seven days a week? Nobody knows. Too few seem to care. Yet people do care when they come face to face with the facts.

9. For the ordering of the hours of labor to secure at once sufficient production and sufficient leisure for the physical, mental and moral well-being of the workers.

9. Steinmetz, the electrical wizard, is attracting attention by the declaration that four hours of labor a day by each worker should be sufficient to do all the necessary work of the world. W. R. Bassett, a well-known engineer, says that if industry were properly organized and managed each worker might have the equivalent of a $10,000 yearly income. These are not proved facts, nor is the salvation of men to be found in either leisure or income, but there is no doubt that hours of labor could be reduced where they are too long for health or for home life without any loss of production. Arthur Nash, of Cincinnati, has just inaugurated a seven-hour day and a five-day week for the women in his clothing factory and expects to continue making good profits.

10. For the employment of the methods of investigation, conference, conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes.

10. The present situation in the coal industry is an example of the necessity that we face. The possibility of a sudden break in the public service must not continue. At the same time experience seems to prove that arbitrary action by the state is as injurious as arbitrary action by the parties themselves. Industry needs the ministry of religion.

11. For the inviolability of agreements, both in letter and in spirit, since good faith is the foundation of social and industrial stability and progress.

11. Contracts have been broken too freely by employers and by workers. The coal strike in 1922 was occasioned by violation of an agreement for which each side sought to put responsibility upon the other.

12. For the right of wage earners to organize and to deal, through their chosen representatives, with the management of the industries in which they work, because an adequate representation of all parties (labor, capital, management and the public) in industry is needed for production and to secure attention for the human factors involved.

12. A bitter controversy is in progress on one of our great railroads because of the refusal of the executives to recognize the unions in accord with the method prescribed by the Railroad Labor Board. Behind the "open-shop" war is a belligerent attitude on the part of employers who are unwilling to grant to labor the elemental right of collective bargaining through chosen representatives, and a belligerent attitude on the part of labor leaders who still depend on the principle of coercion—the "closed shop"—to build up the membership of their organizations. Both sides must yield in the interest of liberty, justice and public service. But the employer has the greater advantage. The leadership should be taken by him. A generous spirit brings a generous response.

So long as the Church is faithful to the teachings of Christ it must measure the industrial order in terms of the spirit and thought of Christ. The Church as the body of Christ must be the swiftest of all organizations to challenge whatever conditions cripple and dishonor life, whether those conditions be the grinding poverty at the bottom or the unnatural and corrupting profligacy of undue wealth at the top. If the management of industry in our day is so conducted that it ignores the value of human co-operation and confirms men in bitter antagonisms, the spirit of Christ in the Church must challenge these conditions, not chiefly because of the material waste and wreckage which they may entail, but because of their hurt to the divine possibilities of human souls. Men everywhere are coming to see that industrial questions and contentions are most perplexing, and that without religion they cannot be solved. In view of this fact it is the imperative duty of the Church to challenge industry to bring the interests of all the participating groups—labor, capital, management and the public—into right relation to the welfare of the whole community. Only by the way of fellowship can the industrial order be conquered by spiritual and social ideals. We heartily agree with ex-President Wilson when he says that, "Our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the Spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practises which spring out of that spirit." Let Christ say the last word in all human relations and peace will reign in the industrial world and in the international world.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—III.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

III. THE STRIKE.

AT the height of the railroad shopmen's strike last summer the writer undertook to interpret the seniority issue in a statement which came to the attention of many persons of very decided views on the labor question. Seniority means the preference in layoff and rehiring, pensions and other privileges that are accorded on the basis of length of service. The statement pointed out that this set of privileges is so important a factor in the worker's status that if it were surrendered by the striking shopmen not only would their strike be lost, but their union would be virtually destroyed. In other words, if men could not strike without losing all claim to their jobs and having to go back as individuals—if an employee of twenty years' service had to accept a status inferior to that of a strikebreaker who two months before was not even in the craft—then all that the union means in the shape of economic protection would be taken away.

This statement drew criticism. One university professor said that it was unsound from a moral point of view—it suggested that a man might quit his job and still lay claim to it; that he might retain his right to a job although refusing to work at it. On what ethical ground could such a position be maintained? At first sight the argument seems conclusive. Certainly there are, mathematically, no two ways about it: two workers cannot occupy the same job at the same time. Moreover, we are all inclined to apply to such a situation the moral of the "dog-in-the-manger" story. And besides, the suggestion that a man's job can be anything other than a matter of contractual relationship between him as an individual and his employer cuts across a very strong legal tradition. The earlier history of the labor movement abounds in examples of court decisions holding illegal any collective attempt to interfere with that relationship.

But this is precisely the point at issue with reference to the strike. The labor union is a modern social phenomenon, and the strike likewise. However we may be disposed to regard it, it is not plain that in the collective refusal of workmen to work save under certain conditions we have a new kind of situation, one not contemplated in our older legal canons and not quite accounted for in our accepted moral codes? At its best, leaving out cases of violation of law or contract, the strike is precisely the thing that the writer's critic pronounced morally impossible: quitting a job and still laying claim to it. It is the insistence that the workman has a moral claim to his job just as the employer has to his factory, and that he has the same right to refuse temporarily to work because of conditions which he believes to be wrong that the employer has to lock his factory temporarily if unwilling to accept the workers' terms. This is the heart of the matter, and it involves two questions: First, are we ready to recognize a job as the equivalent of property? The workers have no doubt on this point—they consider their jobs as their property and they have no difficulty in justifying the use of aggressive tactics in defending them. The second question is, Have conditions of modern life and work made necessary or desirable collective action and relationship which shall take the place of purely individual arrangement? Labor contends that this is indubitably true, and that the strike is therefore no more a hostile act against the community than a lockout: both rest on the same basis. The issue here is one of what lawyers call equity. Labor is strongly convinced that, as a justice of the Federal Supreme Court has suggested, freedom of contract presupposes some measure of equality in resources. Without the strike as a potential resort labor feels that it would be utterly inferior in bargaining power to the employing and financial interests which have undisputed physical control of the plant. These two instruments constitute the major tactics of industrial war. Like the armed encounters of nations they are the last resort in a contest between powers that are unwilling to abide by the results of negotiation. All that can be said against the strike and the lockout has been said against war, and vastly more. Yet war continues. No substitute for it has been found, or rather, no substitute has been accepted.

In the case of labor disputes an attempt has been made in Kansas to outlaw strikes, with a degree of success that remains a matter of dispute. But labor's attitude toward the industrial "court" is precisely that of the American government and the governments of Europe toward a World Court with compulsory jurisdiction. They have all been unwilling thus far to accept it. They want the right to some last resort which can be determined independently with reference to each nation's resources. So it is with labor. The establishment of courts of both industrial and international justice having compulsory jurisdiction may probably be regarded as an ultimate certainty, but such a consummation presupposes an impartial code of law such as does not exist to-day. Of course, the parallel between a labor strike and armed conflict between nations is far from complete. Quantitatively, the evils are not to be compared. Yet there are inherent in the strike all the terrors of a hunger blockade. In essence it is war. But labor prefers to accept the responsibility for reason and moderation in the exercise of this grave alternative rather than to submit to the decision of a public which in a crisis usually thinks first of its convenience and last about the justice of labor's claims. If the strike is a hard thing for the public to understand, the public's attitude toward a strike is an equally hard thing for labor to understand. Labor is told continually that the public's interest is primary and that the public's will must be done. But labor feels that the public interest is sometimes best served by temporarily disturbing the public's convenience. Labor reasons this way: The public is largely working people. If the workers' standards of life are lowered, must not the community at once suffer? And even on the ground of fair play alone, how can the public vindicate its demands if they are made without reference to the merits of the controversy?

One of the most regrettable facts in the industrial situation is labor's distrustful attitude toward the courts. Were that attitude different the "right to strike" would doubtless be less tightly grasped. Often it is based on a prejudice that one might call blind were it not so characteristically human. But there is a considerable ground for it which cannot be ignored. Take for example the recent decision of the Supreme Court on the Minimum Wage Commission Law in the District of Columbia. One need only turn to Mr. Chief Justice Taft's vigorous dissenting opinion to understand labor's grievance against the courts. Mr. Taft says, in effect, that the court departed from its proper function in arguing partisan economics instead of confining itself to the law and the constitution. Labor, from coast to coast, has read that statement and its distrust of the courts will be measurably increased by it.

It is in connection with the strike that the fundamental ideas of the labor movement are most clearly seen. It must be admitted that the violent acts of strikers make a cumulative indictment whose seriousness the responsible leaders of labor fully recognize. Probably the most bitter attacks of employers and even of those paid publicity representatives of employers' associations who have too little conscience about the tales which they disseminate have a rather definite basis in fact, however exaggerated they may be when considered quantitatively. Yet all such deeds are strictly comparable to what the average man does when his back is against the wall in the defense of the thing most precious to him. Probably a conviction could seldom be had in the case of a man who used violence upon another who entered in hostile fashion his place of business, regardless of what a truly Christian judgment of his act might be. What is the counterpart to this property right in the life of the workman? There is but one answer—his job. And the worker displays toward that job, which is his property, the same fierce jealousy that characterizes the property-owner's attitude toward his possessions. Who touches a man's job, touches his life.

Horrible and unjustifiable as was the Herrin massacre, its explanation is doubtless to be found in this fundamental attitude of workmen. They go mad and act like brutes over the right to a job. A union town imparts to its children a bitterness toward the non-union worker—the "scab," the Philistine—that is comparable to the hereditary bitterness toward Germany that Alsations have imbibed with their mother's milk. It is reported that in a West Virginia town the school children recently refused to attend the school because the school building was being heated with coal from a mine not being worked by union men, but by non-union men, or men who had dropped out of the union. The mine was being worked on the open shop basis, and the scholars went on strike. Mr. Royal Meeker, now head of the Pennsylvania Department of Labor, once said that it was folly to talk of the "workingman's psychology," because the workingman has precisely the same psychology as the employer, and that is what makes the trouble!

To be sure, labor's attitude commonly takes its temper from the economic force in the background, and hence from the idealistic point of view there is a fundamental fallacy in the prevailing labor philosophy. The writer once remarked to a labor leader that from the churches' point of view the ultimate question is always one of right. He replied with a smile, "From my point of view, it is a question of munitions"—that is to say, economic resources for a struggle. There is much of this force psychology in the labor movement.

In all fairness, however, one might ask, What body of people is to-day free from this force psychology? Force is still the main dependence of nations. Governments that do not count in terms of gunboats and battalions get relatively small consideration from powerful governments. "Article X is the heart of the Covenant." Employers very generally depend on secret service, private police, the control of the civic power and a financial surplus large enough to finance a fight. So labor, with its emphasis upon coercion, is but reflecting the prevailing philosophy of the day.

Perhaps it involves some stretch of the imagination on the part of a person who looks at labor troubles from a distance to find anything idealistic in a strike. But a careful observer will find in a great labor struggle a loyalty and sacrificial devotion that are akin to patriotism, or even to religious devotion. Again and again men have sacrificed their jobs, have suffered eviction from their homes and ostracism from their associates because of a conviction that an eternal principle was involved in their strike. Women and children have joined in the struggle as they would participate in a religious crusade. And in the fires thus kindled the leaders of labor are forged. If they are belligerent and non-cooperative, probably this background of struggle is responsible. The strike is a great evil, but labor regards the effort to suppress it by law as a forcible disarming of one combatant while the other is left in possession of his weapons. No one can deal with the labor strike who does not see in it a large measure of idealism and righteous purpose, however he may appraise it in a particular situation.

A Friend to Enemies

In the Near East the American Y. M. C. A. is serving as an intermediary between the Greek Red Cross and the Turkish Red Crescent societies for the exchange of letters, money and clothing between the families in Asia Minor and their prisoners in Greece, and between the families in Greece and their prisoners in Asia Minor.

Secretaries have been given full liberty by the Greek military authorities to visit and serve all Turkish prisoners. While permission has been more restricted on the Turkish side, one of the workers is now visiting prisoner camps in Asia Minor. A visit to prisoners in the vicinity of Smyrna resulted in the release of seven prominent Turks from Greece for which the Turks released fifteen Greeks. The names of these latter were sent from the Athens office of the Y. M. C. A. with a request that the names be published in America, where most of the men have relatives with whom they have had no communication since the Smyrna disaster. As a result the cables have carried news of reunited families.

Bible Reading in American Schools

By Larimore C. Denise

Assistant General Superintendent National Reform Association

AN increasing number of citizens of the United States believe that there should not only be a flag over every American school house, but also a Bible on every teacher's desk.

A questionnaire sent to the Superintendent of Public Instruction in every State by Dr. William S. Fleming, Chicago district manager of the National Reform Association, reveals that the laws of the various States permit or require the daily reading of the Bible in the schools of about eighty-three per cent. of the American people.

The same investigation reveals that the Bible has been excluded from the schools of the remaining seventeen per cent.—in the case of Illinois, California and Washington by Supreme Court decision; in Arizona and Missouri by action of the Attorney General; in Minnesota and Montana by the Superintendent of Public Instruction, and in Louisiana by the State regents—not to exceed thirty individuals in all.

On the other hand, the Bible is required to be read every school day in all of the public schools of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi and in such city schools as those of New York, Indianapolis, Ind., and Washington, D. C. Bills for mandatory Bible reading in the public schools, based on the Pennsylvania law, passed the House of the 1921 session of the legislatures of Ohio and Iowa, but did not come to a vote in the Senate before adjournment.

Bible reading has been compulsory in Massachusetts since 1855. The present law enacted in 1880 requires "the daily reading of some portion of the Bible without written note or oral comment in the public schools, but no scholar shall be required to read from any particular version or to take any personal part in the reading whose parent or guardian shall inform the teacher in writing that he has conscientious scruples against it."

The Pennsylvania law is regarded as the model law of the kind because of its simplicity and its uniform acceptance by Catholic, Jew, unbeliever and Protestant alike. The Pennsylvania law was enacted in 1913 and reads as follows:

"At least ten verses from the Holy Bible shall be read or caused to be read without comment, at the opening of each and every school, upon each and every school day, by the teacher in charge; provided, that where any teacher is under and subject to direction, then the teacher exercising the authority shall read the Holy Bible or cause it to be read as herein directed.

"If any school teacher, whose duty it shall be to read the Holy Bible or to cause it to be read, as directed in this act, shall fail or omit so to do, said teacher shall, upon charges preferred for such failure or omission and proof of the same before the governing board of the school district, be discharged."

The only criticism we have heard of this law since its adoption is of the expression "without note or comment." The suggestion has been made that the words of the South Dakota law "without sectarian comment" are preferable.

Tennessee followed Pennsylvania in 1915, the act being similar to the Pennsylvania law with a provision added, "That pupils may be excused from the Bible reading upon written request of the parents," and with the following interesting preamble:

"Whereas, the rules and regulations governing the reading of the Holy Bible in the public schools of this commonwealth are not uniform, and whereas, it is in the interest of good moral training, of a life of honorable thought and of good citizenship, that the public school children should have lessons of morality brought to their attention during their school days, therefore be it enacted," etc.

The New Jersey law of 1916 requires the reading of at least five verses from the Old Testament without comment, the law reading:

"In each public school classroom in the State and in the presence of the scholars therein assembled, at least five verses from that portion of the Holy Bible known as the Old Testament shall be read, or caused to be read, without comment, at the opening of each school upon each and every school day by the teacher in charge thereof; provided, that wherever there is a general assembly of school classes at the opening of such school day, then, instead of such class reading the principal or teacher in charge of such assembly shall read at least five verses from said portion of the Holy Bible, or cause same to be read, in the presence of the assembled scholars, as herein directed."

In Alabama the law of 1919 directs that there shall be daily Bible readings in all schools, and that "teachers in making monthly reports shall show on the same that they have complied with this act and superintendents of city schools in drawing public funds shall certify" to this fact, and further that schools cannot draw public funds unless this act is complied with, and "the State Superintendent of Education is charged with the enforcement of the provisions hereof."

Georgia and Mississippi followed with somewhat similar laws in 1921.

New York City school teachers have read the Bible daily since 1898, the by-laws of the Board of Education reading, "All the schools under the jurisdiction of the board shall be opened with reading a portion of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment."

Inquiries regarding the use of the Bible were also sent by Dr. Fleming to the county superintendents of schools in every county in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, to the city superintendent of schools in every large city in Massachusetts and to the School Board of New York City. These ninety-eight letters brought eighty-eight absolutely unanimous replies that the laws are well observed and that there is practically no objection to them.

Among the replies received a few may be quoted. One county superintendent wrote: "I am exceedingly liberal, but I am absolutely convinced that the daily reading of the Bible in the public schools should be made compulsory." Among the strongest endorsements is one from a Roman Catholic, who writes: "We could not do without it. There is no other way

The Golden Rule in Business*

Under this caption, each week, we shall direct attention to some striking book, such as no Minister or those interested in religious thought and action can afford to remain unacquainted with

NOTHING is more needed to-day than singleness, wholeness of heart. So many people are confused and doubtful. Therefore it is a blessing to read this fascinating account that Mr. Nash has written of his endeavors and his achievements in applying the Golden Rule to the conduct of business. Furthermore, Mr. Nash not only declares that this method of doing business is a necessity of the moral nature of man, but also that it works—i.e., it is practical, despite all the declarations of the “hard-hearted business men.”

The story is simply told, in spots rather naively, with that delightful kind of egotism which is never out of place in the man who is really doing things. Technically, the account is redundant and perhaps even distorted by quotations, one of which, the clipping about “Jesus as a business man,” seems to us rather inappropriate. But Mr. Nash writes wisely for his purpose, and no one can lay down this book without having the idea that the Golden Rule is both necessary to the happiness of man and, at least in the given instance, has worked successfully both in increasing production and providing prosperity all around. It must be frankly said that Mr. Nash at the very beginning disclaims any literary purpose and proposes simply to tell a plain unvarnished tale.

He begins by describing his boyhood days in Indiana and pays a beautiful tribute to his parents, especially his mother. He was reared in the stern, rigid, uncompromising faith of the Seventh Day Adventists; “and although,” he says, “I have long ago reached and passed the place where personal subscription to its claims and teachings are at all possible to me, yet I am quite persuaded that from much that was set before me in childhood I have never been able to wholly depart.” Again he says, “The chief thing which out of my early training I have been able to retain is this: The first essential of a man who deserves and makes a success of his religion is the moral straightforwardness that takes it seriously, that realizes that it is not a thing to be trifled into and played at—a hobby to be taken up because it happens to agree with one’s temperament, or is bound up with his family history—but a mode and a method of life, which is absolutely meaningless unless it is given a bearing on the whole of life, and a significance for its every part, something that has to be translated into every-day terms of conduct and behavior.”

The author describes the extraordinary tenets of the Seventh Day Adventists and their astonishing sincerity of life, and recounts his entering the ministry of this sect and the dramatic incident of his expulsion from the ministry because he denied that a certain noble lady, Madame D’Arcambol, full of good works and alms-giving, was doomed to hell according to his sect’s belief. There followed years of wandering in the Middle West and great despair and revolt out of which he was led by the woman he now married (his third angel, he calls her, his mother and Madame D’Arcambol being the first two). He found that he “had been watching men and ignoring Jesus.” Then came another venture—the ministry among the Disciples of Christ. This also failed because of liberality of views. And he “turned back to commercial life, but without any bitterness of heart” this time.

Now begins the fascinating story of the A. Nash Company. After several false starts in June, 1916, the company was organized with $60,000 capital. The low wage scale of workers was forcibly drawn to his attention in taking over the work of a subsidiary shop and he determined to close out for conscience sake and buy a farm. He called together his workers, told them his plan and declared to them his great personal discovery of the Golden Rule. (A chapter is devoted to a description of the incident of this discovery, owing to the invitation to preach for a minister friend of his and the news of one son’s wounding at the front and another son’s entrance into the army. Under pressure of these incidents he forgot his way out of doubt into faith.) Then he raised their wages on the principle of what he considered would be just were he in their various places and prepared to close out in a few months. To his astonishment business picked up immediately. Quite frankly he says: “This was because our soldier boys were being demobilized and a demand for civilian clothing accompanied the process.” But this was not the only cause. His bookkeeper reported, “We are actually producing merchandise at less cost than before you increased the wages of the help.” That was the beginning. The rest is simply a story of progress, and it is told three different times—once in a quoted article by Rev. F. Ernest Johnson, Secretary of the Commission of the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; a second time by Mrs. Ruth White Colton, who entered the factory as an unknown worker, and a third time by Mr. Nash himself in a stenographic report of his address before the Business School of Harvard University. Each of these accounts has something to add, though there is of course considerable repetition. Mr. Johnson points out three things: First, Mr. Nash’s “primary assumption was not that the industry must pay, but that his conscience must be satisfied.” The second arresting feature is the astonishing results in production which followed the change in policy. The third outstanding feature of this enterprise has to do with the attitude and mutual relations of the workers following the adoption of the Golden Rule. Mrs. Colton, besides giving a delightful picture of the prevailing spirit from a working woman’s point of view, illustrated by several lovely incidents, describes the shortening of hours to five working days of eight hours each with no overtime

Timothy, Good Minister of Christ Jesus

ACTS 16:1-3; PHILIPPIANS 2:19-22; 2 TIMOTHY 1:1-6; 3:14, 15.

"Be thou an ensample to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity."—1 Tim. 4:12.

IN all probability good ministers of Christ Jesus were as much needed in the day when Paul wrote his letters to Timothy as they are in this day. Most certainly they are needed now. Recently, one of the smaller churches in a suburb of Boston called as its minister a professor in one of our local colleges. The terms of the call were that he was to give his services on Sunday and one afternoon and evening during the week. The salary offered for this part-time service was $2,000. It might be supposed that it would have been possible for this church to have found a capable minister who for that salary would have given full-time service. But the church had found it so difficult to secure the right man that they were ready to make the best of the service which the college professor could give outside of his teaching.

The incident is only one of many which might be given. A resident of a pleasant country town in New Hampshire told me that the church in that village had been closed all through the winter and only open during the summer months when it was supplied by a student. The church had an attractive building, a pleasant and commodious parsonage and would have paid to the right man $1,200 a year. But the right man could not seem to be found.

The two incidents are indicative of a condition which is giving grave concern to every true lover of the Church. Our denominational leaders are taking up the problem of increasing the number of our ministers. It is a real problem when we consider that, in some denominations at least, the number graduating from the theological seminaries does not equal the number of those who leave the ranks of the ministry through death or disability. Commissions are being appointed to work out some solution. Special days are being observed in which the claims of Christian service and, in particular, the call to the ministry are presented.

What is the call to the ministry? To-day the answer is not the one which might have been given in former years, when there was some conception of a definite experience in which conviction laid hold of the conscience of a young man, whereby he felt himself especially set apart for the work of the ministry. We have come to see that God reveals himself here, as always, in terms of personal fitness, of opportunity, and of duty. Perhaps that is the way the call has always come. It seems that is the way in which it came to Timothy. Can we do better, then, in the discussion of this lesson, than to turn aside from the merely biographical details, and out of the apostle's letters to Timothy and the reference to him in the Book of Acts, put together a mosaic picture of how a minister is made?

We do not have to look far to find the elements in his preparation. Then, as now, the first preparation came in early training, in the atmosphere and teaching of a Christian home. Paul calls to remembrance in Timothy "the unfeigned faith . . . which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice." Out of that Christian home life also came his training in the knowledge of the Scripture: "From a babe thou has known the sacred writings which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." It is out of influences and training like that, where youth is equipped with the knowledge of the Bible and with Christian faith, that most of our ministers come to-day. The lack of such definite Christian influence in the home is one of the great elements in the shortage of Christian leadership to-day.

The church, as well as the home, has its influence. The imagination easily constructs a picture of the church at Lystra from the reference to Timothy in Acts 16:2, as "well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium." We can see the youth growing up in his home church, faithful to its services, taking an increasing part in its work, until he comes to share with his brethren the responsibilities of leadership, holding the confidence of all. It is out of such home churches, with the instruction of the Sunday-school, the training in expression and service which the young people's societies give, and the sharing of the responsibility of the work, that our ministers come.

We must have more such homes and more such churches—homes with a positive and definite Christian influence, homes with a real religious training, homes whose chief pride is to have go out from them those who are leaders in the work of Christ and the Church; churches also which are training in knowledge of the Scriptures, which are developing talents of leadership in their young people, which are taking a pride in sending out those who shall be truly ministers of Christ Jesus. But it cannot end there. Paul also had his influence in Timothy's entering the ministry. It is quite possible that he was converted during the apostle's first visit to Lystra. It was on a second visit that Paul definitely laid his hands upon the young man to be his associate in his work. Where Christian leaders and we in our churches are looking out for those who by native gifts and training have the elements of leadership, and present to them the definite claims of Christian service, we find that we have a new generation of Timothy's. We have our responsibility to press the call of personal fitness and of opportunity to those who would have their lives count for the most for Christ and the Church and their fellow-men. The home, the church, and personal influence—these are the elements which enter into the preparation and call of a minister. The story of Timothy also reveals those personal qualities which are a prime requisite of a good minister of Christ Jesus. Many references might be gathered together, but they all may be comprehended in two verses in the first chapter of Paul's second letter to his child in faith: "For which cause I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee through the laying on of my hands. For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness; but of power and love and discipline."

"Stir up the gift of God." The Greek of that is fine, "kindle into a flame." It suggests that quality of enthusiasm which is so essential to successful leadership, a quality so contagious, yet so easy to lose. It suggests the enthusiasm of Jesus himself, who came "to cast fire upon the earth." This enthusiasm was one of the great secrets of Jesus' power. Of it Dr. Jefferson writes: "Moses turned aside to see a burning bush, everybody turns aside to see a burning man. Glance across the centuries and you will note that every time the race has turned aside from the beaten path, it has been to see a man who was burning." And Jesus burned. "John, the Baptist, declared that he could baptize only with water, but that one was coming who would baptize with fire. From John's hands men came dripping; from Jesus' hands men came blazing." It is this same quality of enthusiasm which Paul charges Timothy to have in his ministry.

The next is that of conviction: "For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness; but of power." Back in the old Seminary days, along with Biblical dogmatics, propædæutics, hermeneutics, homiletics, and other such weighty subjects, which make the Seminary so scholastic to the layman, we studied apologetics also. It was a perfectly proper and necessary subject, the study of Christian evidences. But who likes the name? There is no place for apology in the attitude of the Christian minister. He has no need to be apologetic. He can and must speak out and strike out in the full confidence of his convictions and assurance, not only of the truth he professes, but of that truth as the greatest need of the world. "For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness, but of power."

This does not mean that the minister must be dogmatic, nor override the conscience and will of man with his "Thus saith the Lord." It does mean that there shall be that conviction of truth out of which a man speaks as a prophet, the note of certainty which not only shows but carries conviction.

Why should we not have it? For God has given a spirit of power, which is the true corrective of fearfulness. Out of such conviction of power Paul wrote: "I know him whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able." "For I am not ashamed of the gospel: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." A faith like that is not dogmatic, it is dynamic. For it rests upon the conviction that the salvation of the world, and its only salvation, lies in the truth revealed in Jesus Christ.

But power must be tempered by love. What a simple but adequate description of a good minister of Christ Jesus was that of Dr. Potter's, when in a recent address he described the home missionary as "a man with a book in his hand, a message on his lips, and love in his heart." Now and then a church seeking a new pastor asks the question, "Is he a good mixer?" He may or he may not be. What they really ought to know is whether he is a good lover. For a true minister is a friend of man. There is an expression, "passion for souls," which too often has been purely professional, and which, therefore, many sincere men have avoided as pious cant. But there is a "passion for souls" which is not professional, but vital and real. Such a passion Jesus had, and was caught by the evangelist when he described him as "looking upon the multitude with compassion, for they were as sheep without a shepherd." The same passion is wonderfully described in these lines:

"Oft when the Word is on me to deliver,
Lifts the illusion and the truth lies bare.
Desert or throng, the city or the river,
Melts in a lucid Paradise of air.
Only like souls I see the folk thereunder Bound who should conquer, slaves who should be kings;

Hearing their one hope with an empty wonder;

Sadly contented in a show of things.
Then with a rush the intolerable craving
Shivers throughout me like a trumpet call.

Oh, to save these, to perish for their saving,

Die for their life, be offered for them all."

One other quality is added to power and love: "discipline" the revised version has it. The King James' version says, "A sound mind." I like that reading because it seems to suggest that too uncommon quality which we call "common sense." More than one minister has failed because he had not possessed it. This power to face facts, to see things in their right proportion, to take another's point of view, is a saving quality, like the sense of humor. It is the power "to see ourselves as others see us," and, "will from many a blunder free us, an' foolish notion."

But I suspect the other reading is the better—"discipline." It suggests the self-control so necessary in a leader. "But flee youthful lusts, and follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace. . . . But foolish and ignorant questionings refuse." For the lack of such self-control as this, many a minister has made a wreck of his ministry. The true minister of Christ Jesus will have the spirit of discipline—self-controlled because Christ-controlled, as "the Lord's servant."

In addition to the minister's preparation and his qualities the story of Timothy gives some indication of his work. We find the apostle urging him first of all to live. For the power of a personal example is the first and greatest sermon to be preached. The good minister, as Paul says, must be "an example to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity."

Backed by a godly life, Timothy's great duty is to preach and teach the gospel. "Preach the word; be urgent in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all longsuffering and teaching." For here is a minister's first and greatest work. Many other things are demanded of him. He must be a pastor to his people, a leader and organizer of his church in all lines of Christian service. He has his part to play in the community also, where he must ally himself with every movement that is good. But these all are secondary to his first and greatest task as teacher and preacher. He is first of all a "minister of the gospel," whose business it is to teach and preach the word in season, and out of season.

So we put together this mosaic picture of the good minister of Christ Jesus. Many elements might be added from the story to complete the picture, but in these at least the outline is clear. Equipped by the training of home and church, he who possesses the truth of his gospel, tempered and empowered by love, and all under the discipline of self-control, will do the work of the good minister by his life, as well as by his teaching and preaching. But he must be ready to pay the price, ready with Timothy to "suffer hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus." For the call to the Christian ministry to-day is a call to the heroic, if it is anything. It is well that this is so. There is a vicarious element in strong young men which needs to be called out and exercised. In the words of Illingworth: "The pleasures of each generation evaporate in air. It is their pains that increase the spiritual momentum of the world." EDWARD DICKINSON GAYLORD.

THE AMERICAN SPIRITUAL FRONTIER

A few years ago Sherwood Eddy made an address to the students in China on "Temptation and How to Meet It." The address has since then been very widely translated. For instance, in Egypt it was used to help prepare the way for the great evangelistic campaign which Mr. Eddy carried through there in 1920. The first Arabic edition of six thousand copies was used up in reaching Moslem and Coptic boys and young men, especially in the government schools. Now a second edition has been issued in Cairo. The fact is that such men as John Mott, Sherwood Eddy, and Harry Emerson Fosdick are better known internationally than almost any American political leader. What they say is affecting the thinking of the leaders of to-morrow around the world.

work at all. "I am definitely convinced," she writes, "that certainly ninety per cent. of the entire personnel of the 'Golden Rule Factory' work and live with an understanding of and a sincere desire to live by this rule. The remaining ten per cent. work there because experience has taught them that they are in the long run paid better and work under happier and steadier, more hopeful conditions than they could possibly find elsewhere in the same industry."

The final chapters record Mr. Nash's philosophy and faith which underlie his plans. The most striking idea is that the problem of capital and labor cannot be "solved" by any system of organization; it must be "removed" by right human relations. In fact, Mr. Nash sees all our "problems" in these simple human terms and insists with tenaciousness that the cry of to-day is not for organization but for a social organism. "The knowledge we must now seek is not how to accomplish, but what to accomplish. The time has come, as the mind of the man of Galilee is being revealed afresh to the world, that industry must stop using men and women to make money and go to using money to make men and women." All this Mr. Nash admits has been said before. "But it is falling to-day, as never before, on listening ears." Religion and conduct must be one, otherwise worship is futile. "The laws of God governing human relationships are as fixed, as unalterable, as unshakeable, and as unbreakable as any of the laws of nature, as the law of gravity itself."

A fine story of personal achievement, the book closes with true homiletic power, appealing to business men to try this better way: "If you cannot do it otherwise, do it with all the doubt and disbelief you may have hanging about you, but do it, with this word ringing in your ears, that in the philosophy of Jesus and in His philosophy alone is centered the hope of the world."

Here is the secret of his power. Mr. Nash is a devout and determined disciple of Jesus of Nazareth.

BIBLE READING IN AMERICAN SCHOOLS

to begin a school day. Catholic children want it."

These unanimous testimonials should quiet the fears of any who believes that mandatory Bible reading will make trouble.

On the other hand, we find endless petty conflicts where Bible reading is not required. Whether or not the Bible shall be read becomes a political issue and arouses sectarian animosities. It enables one or two aggressive opponents of the Bible to make endless trouble. It leads at times to the loss of efficient school officials and to the exclusion of the Bible from the schools, to the injury of the children and the hurt of the State. It may shut the Bible out of the schools where it is needed most.

Shall we listen to the voices of anarchists, agnostics and skeptics, or shall we heed the words of the venerated Presidents of the United States, almost all of whom were students of the Holy Scriptures and advocates of Bible reading for the young?

George Washington wrote: "It is impossible to govern the world without the Bible." John Adams declared: "The Bible is the best book in the world." Thomas Jefferson called the Bible "the corner stone of liberty." John Quincy Adams made it a practice to read the Bible through each year, and asserted that "the Bible is the book of all others to be read at all ages and in all conditions of human life." Andrew Jackson called it "the rock on which our Republic rests," and Abraham Lincoln, who read it through three times before he was ten years of age, declared it to be "the best book which God has given to men."

And, skipping the Presidents between, we do well to remember the words of Woodrow Wilson: "A man has deprived himself of the best there is in the world who has deprived himself of a knowledge of the Bible. It is very difficult for a man or for a boy who knows the Scriptures ever to get away from it. It haunts him like an old song. It follows him like the memory of his mother. There are great problems before the American people. I would be afraid to go forward if I did not believe that there lay at the foundation of all our schooling and all our thought the incomparable and unimpeachable Word of God."

Mandatory Bible reading can be secured in other States as it has been in those where it is now the law by the definite action of God-fearing citizens under the leadership of those who are adepts in the discussion of the subject. The National Reform Association has a number of such among its secretaries who will be glad to aid in such campaigns to the best of their ability.

THE OPPORTUNITY IN THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

The Presbyterian Church has from its beginning prided itself on its interest in education. Where the Episcopal Church has stood for reverent worship and social dignity, and the Methodist Church for evangelism, the Presbyterian Church has aimed to stand pre-eminently for the training of its people in knowledge and right thinking. In keeping with its historic traditions it has created a great Board of Christian Education. We are informed that the church has not yet found a general secretary for the new board. The Rev. Edgar P. Hill, D.D., is to head the college division, the Rev. Harold McAfee Robinson, D.D., is to head the division of the home, the school and the church, and the Rev. John Bailey Kelly is to head the division of missionary education. But the Church is looking for a man of broad outlook, strong administrative grasp and statesmanlike attitude to head the whole board. The opportunity is one of the greatest in the Presbyterian Church. We believe that the secretary to be chosen should have the following characteristics:

First, he should be an administrator. The various agencies have not before been connected and must be led in a united policy. The work of the board is so diverse, covering both the training of children and the teaching of students in the denominational colleges and great State universities that no man could well follow closely the detail in each field. Specialists are, therefore, required in many fields. Second, he must be a man of broad vision. The Methodist Episcopal Church has made tremendous strides in the last two decades in religious education, and is probably the leading church in America in that field. The Presbyterian should not be allowed to fall behind. Religious education has seen a transformation in the last fifteen years, the method and aims of which must be put at the command of church workers all over the country. Missionary material must be used not only to create interest in missions, but also to build character. Third, he must be a man who will have the confidence of the whole Church. This is a time when a revolutionist would probably set back the cause of sane progress for many years to come. Whether the secretary to be chosen will be found among college presidents, in the board offices, or in the pastorate, he should be able to put at the disposal of Presbyterian people the right aims and the best modern methods in religious education.

JUDGE GARY ON PROHIBITION

Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation, declares that prohibition has been of incalculable benefit to the employees of the company. His statement is as follows:

"The sale of automobiles has been largely increased by the fact that a large majority of the workmen now prefer to take excursions with their families by automobile instead of spending their time at the saloons or other places and wasting their money in practises that are physically injurious instead of beneficial.

"At a meeting of steel men recently it was stated by one of those present that the families of the workmen in the steel mills would vote with practical unanimity in favor of total prohibition, although some of the husbands might, perhaps, be in favor of the sale of beer and light wines.

"All in all, however, there is no doubt that a large preponderance of the workmen of this country are in favor of the prohibition of the sale and the use of all intoxicants from the standpoint of good morals, good economics, and peaceful social relations.

"We should all remember constantly that if any one law is broken, and the offender is unpunished or protected, some other person may decide to take the same course with respect to another law. It is a simple but important fact that the only safety of this country is found in the adoption and enforcement of laws which are calculated to protect all the people and which discriminate against none."

A REMINDER OF THE LESSONS OF THE WAR

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN WORK:

We are much indebted to you for the good editorials and articles that you have given us lately about the League of Nations and the World Supreme Court, and especially for Dr. Lynch's editorial in your issue of August 4 on Senator Johnson's speech on July 25 and his "Observer's Letter" on the same speech.

It will be well to show plainly that what Senator Johnson advocates (and what too many unthinking or short-sighted people desire) is the same old policy that prevented us from seeing in time the dangerous drift toward war in Europe ten years ago and that led us to pursue the selfish policy of doing nothing effective to prevent war and remove its causes. Some have not yet learned the most important lessons of the war—one of which is that the United States cannot escape any widespread disaster that may overtake Europe. Another, especially, is that war is sure to involve many nations when once it begins—it spreads like a conflagration. The United States cannot expect to avoid participation in another war begun soon in Europe; and we should not again pursue a "penny wise, pound foolish" policy that by not acting promptly and effectively to prevent war is sure to involve us in enormous expenses and losses that wise action would avoid.

Senator Johnson is not logical, and his argument is refuted by "the logic of events." This should be plainly shown.

The World of To-day

THE ITALIAN ULTIMATUM TO GREECE

An international commission, including representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy and Greece, has been laying out the boundary between Albania and Greece. While the commission was traveling through the sparsely settled district along the border on August 27th shots from ambush killed the five men who made up the Italian delegation and its assistants. No other of the commission's cars was in sight at the time of the attack. The bodies of the murdered officers were left lying in the middle of the road without any attempt to rob or despoil them. That fact would indicate that the crime was a political one. Robbers would have pilfered them. Italy was immensely stirred by the assassination. The popular pressure was such that on Wednesday Prime Minister Mussolini sent a most overbearing ultimatum to Greece. Italy demanded (1) that the highest Greek military authority should make a most ample official apology to the Italian government through the Legation in Athens; (2) that solemn funeral services should be celebrated in honor of the massacred members; (3) that honors to the Italian flag should be rendered by the Greek fleet in the Piraeus waters; (4) that a full inquiry should be carried out on the scene of the massacre by the Greek authorities with the help of the Italian military attaché, the inquiry to be concluded within five days of the acceptance of the Italian conditions; (5) that all the perpetrators of the crime should receive capital punishment; (6) that Greece should hand over an indemnity of fifty million Italian lira, approximately two million five hundred dollars, within five days of the presentation of the Italian note, and (7) that military honors should be shown the bodies of the Italian officers when they are embarked on Italian warships. The ultimatum was to be answered in twenty-four hours. When Greece refused to accept all the demands of the ultimatum Italy took possession of Corfu, a small island off the coast of Greece. Mussolini, it is reported, will resent any attempt which the League of Nations may make to intervene in the dispute. So peremptory and extravagant an ultimatum reminds the world of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia in June nine years ago. One would think that Italy had learned no lesson from the World War. It is impossible to think that the Greek government should have anything to do with the murder of the Italian members of the boundary commission. Any man who had had experience would know that such a murder would never help the Greeks to secure any better boundary with Albania, and that it would only lead to unfortunate consequences. The murders occurred in Greek territory three miles from the boundary, but at this writing it is not known whether Albanians or Greeks were responsible. Many Al-banians feel fully as bitterly toward Italy as do any Greeks. The Greek government has accepted the first, second, third and seventh Italian demands with modifications, but has rejected the fourth, fifth and sixth on the ground that they infringe the sovereignty and honor of Greeks. Italy never would have sent such an insulting ultimatum if the murders had been committed on French, British or American soil. While it is no wonder that the Italians were stirred by the event, the more so since the head of the Italian delegation, General Tellini, was a man of very great eminence and of considerable popularity; but if we have learned anything from the Great War it ought to be that nations must deal reasonably with each other. It is only as one people has faith in another that we shall come to the reign of law and peace. May the Italians help bring the new era by reason and forbearance.

THE COAL SITUATION

Instead of wrestling himself with the coal situation President Coolidge has turned it over to Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. The Governor began his work by holding a three-hour session with the leaders of each of the contending parties, so learning their positions in detail. He followed these conferences by proposing the following compromise: A basic eight hour day for all employees, overtime to be paid for at the eight hour rate; a uniform increase of ten per cent. to all employees, taking effect September 1; recognition of the union by the operators without the check-off (that is, the deduction of union dues and so on from the men's wages before they are paid by the company), but the union to have the right to have a representative present when the men are paid; complete recognition of the principle of collective bargaining. The Governor further suggested that if in the future the Scale Committees of the miners and operators were unable to agree they should together select some outsider to take part in their discussion, but without a vote. If they are still unable to agree, he suggested that they should submit their differences to the Conciliation Board. He further urged that any agreement signed on the foregoing basis should continue not less than one year. Governor Pinchot estimated that in the expense for labor due to raising wages ten per cent. will amount to sixty cents a ton for domestic sizes of anthracite coal at the mine. Of this sixty cents, the Governor believes that the operators should pay ten cents. The remaining fifty cents, he believes, could be absorbed by the railroads and by the wholesalers and retailers. If such shall prove the case, the consumer may count himself lucky. Certainly, it seems that some of this cost might well be borne by the wholesaler. The United States Coal Commission last week issued figures showing that in times of stress, wholesalers have added as much as $4.75 to the cost of anthracite per ton. The wholesalers often performed no service whatever. In some cases the coal passed through the hands of three such jobbers, each one of whom took his profit. To return to the controversy between miners and operators, neither side has accepted all of Governor Pinchot's proposal. The operators, while objecting to the average ten per cent. wage increase, would accept it if there were a four year agreement, with periodic readjustment of wages. The miners urge that those of them who are paid by the amount of work done should receive the ten per cent. increase, but they argue that the day laborers should receive an advance of seventy cents a day or more. The Governor's proposal would mean an advance for these day laborers of from forty to fifty-seven cents only a day. Even as it is, the day laborers object to the fact that the piece workers among the miners receive so much more than themselves. The anthracite coal strike went into effect September 1. But the miners and operators should thresh out an agreement ere long. Such at least is the expectation at Washington. Whether Governor Pinchot's attempt at ending the dispute is successful or not, President Coolidge has shown a fine spirit in turning over the question to him. The President considers it his business to see that the desired end is accomplished. Whether he himself shall reap any glory from the accomplishment or not is a matter of no consideration. A smaller man in the Presidency would have feared that Governor Pinchot, if he was successful, would reap a prestige of which the President himself might be envious. Mr. Coolidge is far too big a man to hold such an attitude.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

In his presidential address to the American Bar Association at Minneapolis last week our former Ambassador to the Court of St. James, John W. Davis, took occasion to speak in behalf of certain amendments to the Federal Constitution which have been proposed in Congress. Altogether one hundred and nine bills and joint resolutions for that purpose were submitted in the last two years. They brought up the total number of such bills to 3,063. But the record of the last Congress went beyond that of any other except the Thirty-sixth, which assembled in 1859 just before the Civil War. The American Bar Association two years ago advocated a constitutional amendment to provide that the newly elected Congress should assemble on the first Monday in January, and that the new President and Vice President should be inaugurated on the third Monday of that month. An historical accident led to the assembling of the newly elected Congress in March, 1789. That accident was perpetuated. In no other democratic country is there a span of more than twelve months between the election of a Parliament and its regular assemblage. Mr. Davis also would like to see an amendment passed permitting the President to veto separate items in an appropriation bill. The present system has led to much waste in government expenditures. He would also make it possible for the Senate to approve a treaty by a majority vote instead of a two-thirds vote. There is little doubt historically that the two-thirds rule was the result of the prevailing jealousy of the executive power at the time our constitution was adopted. The rule has often paralyzed action. John Hay once remarked despairingly, "The Fathers in their wisdom ordained that for all time the kickers should rule." His experience with his arbitration treaties and the treaty with Great Britain in regard to the Panama Canal led him to remark, "A treaty entering the Senate is like a bull going into the arena: no one can tell just how or when the final blow will fall; but one thing is certain, it will never leave the arena alive." Mr. Davis is most earnestly opposed to amendments which would destroy or limit the power of the Supreme Court. Americans very generally misunderstand that power. The function of the court is to see that no injury is suffered by any citizen on account of laws infringing his rights as laid down in the constitution. To quote an opinion put out by the court itself last June, "It (the power of the Supreme Court) amounts to little more than the negative power to disregard any unconstitutional enactment which otherwise would stand in the way of the enforcement of a legal right." The recent proposition to require a greater number than a majority of the Supreme Court to make a decision effective is by no means a new one. Nearly ninety years ago a bill was reported to the Senate providing that no law of the States should be declared invalid without the concurrence of five of the seven judges. Mr. Davis thinks that the custom of giving out minority dissenting opinions is calculated to weaken confidence in the court and is not a wise custom. The former Ambassador's judgment ought to have great weight with Congress and with the people as a whole.

A BETTER NEW YORK

The Police, Health and Public Welfare departments of New York seem to be making no careful study of the effects of prohibition. And yet an examination of the statistics of various social indexes in New York City for corresponding periods under the old license system and under the present prohibition system is extremely illuminating. Harold A. Littledale has printed a comparison of conditions in New York in 1909 and 1922. Those two years were unusually similar in a business way. Each was a year of continued prosperity following two years after a period of business depression. We have become used to thinking of New York, like all America, as a place where crimes of violence are increasing by leaps and bounds. The fact is that in 1909 there were 647 homicides in New York compared to 266 in 1922. Of felonious assaults there were 3,811 in the earlier year 2,405 in the later. The arrests for intoxication fell from 25,382 in 1909 to 11,403 thirteen years later. Cases of juveniles brought up for delinquency were less than half the number in the later year than they were in the earlier. The exact figures are 10,877 in 1909; 4,518 in 1922. The number of arrests for vagrancy for 1909 was 5,109; in 1922, 2,876. The alcoholic cases at Bellevue decreased from 5,778 to 4,083. The number of alcoholic deaths fell almost fifty per cent., from 533 to 274. During the thirteen years savings banks' deposits increased almost one-third, and the average amount of the deposit rose from $662 to $787. The decreases are all the more striking when we consider that the population of the city increased more than thirty per cent. between the two years. That means that if the population of the city had remained stationary the number of homicides in 1922 would have fallen to 201 compared to the 647 in 1909. Cases of felonious assault would have numbered 822, arrests for intoxication would have fallen to 8,646, cases of juvenile delinquency would have numbered 2,423, the alcoholic cases at Bellevue would have amounted to 3,093, alcoholic deaths would have been 208, and arrests for vagrancy would have fallen to 2,179. For the last three "wet" years, 1916, 1917 and 1918, the arrests for drunkenness totaled 36,559. Half of 1919 was under the license régime, half under the prohibition régime, so that the figures for it are omitted. For the three "dry" years, 1920 to 1922, arrests for drunkenness numbered 27,375, a decrease of twenty-five per cent. in spite of the growing population. Social service workers of Bellevue Hospital report that the homes into which they enter show a marked improvement since national prohibition became effective. Dr. O'Hanlon, superintendent of the hospital, reports that the "hospital rounder" has gone since prohibition. There has been such a great decrease in alcoholic cases needing treatment that Bellevue has given up its alcoholic wards altogether. Patients who would have been formerly consigned to those wards are now placed in the psychopathic wards. The number of alcoholic cases in 1920, 1921 and 1922 was only two-fifths of what it was in the three years 1916 to 1918. Contrary to a very popular notion, Dr. O'Hanlon says there has been no marked increase in drug addicts since prohibition came into effect. The increase in figures is due to the fact that the police paid little attention to drug cases until recent years. Deaths from alcoholism in the three dry years number a little less than one-third of those in the last three "wet" years. The exact figures are 491 versus 1,499. If a great city in the "wet belt" shows such results from prohibition, it is a fair inference that the country over things are no worse.

LAW ENFORCEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

On the basis of the amount of crime, the United States is among the most savage people in the world. In a civilized country such as England and Wales, there were in 1921 only sixty-three murders. In the city of Chicago in that same year there were more than twice as many, and in New York more than four times as many. In 1922 in the great city of London the authorities reported seventeen murders. Only nine of them were such as would justify an indictment for murder in the first degree in America. The person or persons who committed every murder were found. But here we have murder mystery after murder mystery. Murderers go scot free because they are never discovered, and even some of those who are discovered are acquitted on technicalities. In France, with its supposedly impetuous Latin temperament, there were 585 murders in 1919. The same year in forty-eight American cities with a total population of some twenty-one million, not much more than half the population of France, there were 1,562. A special committee on law enforcement appointed by the American Bar Association reckons that in 1922 7,850 murders were committed in the United States, beside 6,790 unjustifiable homicides. In 1921 in England and Wales the courts tried 115 persons for burglary and convicted 105. In the same year 2,660 burglaries were reported in New York County alone, that is, Manhattan and Bronx. But only 565 persons were indicted for burglary in the county that year and only 349 were convicted. Part of our people are so lawless in their ideas that we have a great secret organization which attempts to take the law into its own hands and commits crimes right and left on the ground that thereby it may suppress crime. Even when men are shot to death by wholesale, as they were at Herrin, Illinois, our people are so savage that they will not convict the murderers. It is perfectly true that we need a greater intelligence in our police service. Raymond Fosdick tells of how the German police dealt with a murder when he was studying their methods before the war. The murder was committed at night. The police immediately isolated a considerable district around the spot where the body was found. They picked up every one in the neighborhood and held those whose reasons for being there were not obvious. They examined every inch of the ground, almost with a microscope. They used the best scientific brains to find their clues and then followed them up relentlessly. Here in America when a crime of violence is committed hundreds, even thousands of people may tramp over the spot before the police search the ground thoroughly, and the papers describe any clues or any suspicions held by the police. The whole attempt to find the criminal is in the majority of cases inefficient and often farcical. But behind the stupidity of our police is the popular lack of any comprehension of what real law enforcement signifies.

THE ANNUAL YOUNG FRIENDS (QUAKERS) CONFERENCE

The three hundred young Friends (or Quakers) who gathered at their annual Young Friends General Conference at Richmond, Indiana, were greatly moved by a realization of the physical suffering of the young people of Germany and Austria. In the desire to uphold their courage in the search for "that life which takes away occasion of all wars," they sent them the following message, asking all men to join with them in this expression of comradeship in the common task:

To the Youth of Germany and Austria:

In the splendid fellowship of the Fourteenth Annual Conference of Young Friends of America our hearts have been drawn to you. As we have met day after day with representatives of the youth of England and Germany and with those of widely differing thought among our own people we have come to an overwhelming consciousness of the underlying unity of the human race.

The clouds which darkened our minds during the war period are breaking away and we see how impossible it is to judge men in groups. We are convinced that every nation has sinned grievously and our pride in America is humbled when we think of our share in the misunderstanding and suspicion. At the same time there are those in every group who are seeking untiringly to build a world of love and truth.

We have heard from one of your number of your dauntless faith in spite of hunger, loneliness and disillusionment. Our problems are not your problems, but we join you in seeking through mutual fellowship the path of love. We believe with you that only in the earnest expression of love in the life of each individual, that love supremely manifested in the life of Jesus, can a new world of right and brotherhood be born.

Signed on behalf of the Fourteenth Annual Young Friends (Quakers) General Conference, Richmond, Indiana, July 27 to August 6, 1923.

CHESTER L. REAGAN, Chairman.

If such messages were sent from the young people of the nations to each other whenever there were special strain and stress, truly we should be creating a bond of fellowship too strong to be broken by age-long prejudice and by sudden passion.

KABOTCHNIK VS. CABOT

Does Mr. Kabotchnik have the right to change his name to Cabot? The background of the question is fairly familiar to us all. Henry Kabotchnik, of Philadelphia, asked the court not long ago to allow him to become Henry Cabot. Before the court had put in its answer the Cabot family of Boston heard of the request and protested. They claim a historic right to the name of Cabot. Do they have such an exclusive right? On the whole, the newspaper press has been inclined to make fun of their claim. But is it an advantage that distinguished family names should lose their particular quality? Keen-minded people object to slang because it tends to blur language. When Henry Kabotchnik becomes Henry Cabot, is not there a historico-social blurring? The old name Kabotchnik very really stands for something. It marks men and women who hold it as of the newer immigration, probably Polish Jews. The name has not been in this country long, but there is no reason why in the course of time it should not become a distinguished name on its own account, just as Straus has already become a name of very great distinction. The name Cabot has stood for something wholly different from that of Kabotchnik. Some of us may be a little put out because we think that the Cabots or their ilk felt themselves a little superior to the Smiths, let us say. But after all the Cabots, like a great many other families, have contributed useful and strong citizens to the common life. It is undeniable that we have a right to protect our names. Certainly America of the future will be more interesting if in our names we maintain a picture of the variety of its racial derivation. In regard to this particular case of Cabot vs. Kabotchnik, to be sure, some of the historically informed smile at the Cabot objections to their new namesake because something over four hundred years ago the Cabots themselves were Gabottos. That, at least, was the name of the remarkable adventurer who with his three sons embarked at Bristol in May, 1497, on a certain voyage of discovery that has never been forgotten. Even so, when the Cabots became Englishmen they had a name different from any former English name, one that marked their ancestry. If Mr. Kabotchnik will become Mr. Kabot it will not be quite so bad.

OF THE FUNERAL SERVICE

What should be the great thought in the solemn service when we put away the empty bodily garment of one whom we have loved? For answer we think of the beautiful service at the funeral of a Westchester minister this past week. The deacons—it was a Congregational Church—and a few intimate friends gathered at the parsonage as honorary pallbearers before the services and came into the church along with the family. Their sharing this in the family helped make the whole community feel one kin. A neighbor minister, a man of fine gentleness and of genuine taste, conducted the service. He gave it the dignity of the Episcopal service, but at the same time endowed it with a directness and quiet personal touch which cannot come when one is wholly restricted to forms. He read the Scriptures very simply with no attempt to make an effect. They were statements of fact and of faith, just as they were meant by the saints and seers of old. Many of the passages were ones familiar at our funerals. But among them was the Thirteenth Chapter of First Corinthians. We do not remember ever hearing that chapter read before at such a service. It was a beautiful touch. The chapter expresses the truly divine idea for human living. There was no singing of hymns. Usually we want some hymns of quietness or triumph at such a service. But the minister read, "Oh love that wilt not let me go." There is no better hymn for the time and place. Then came the prayer. It was a prayer in dignified phrases. Parts of it could not have been offered at every funeral. It fitted the memory of the particular man who had gone. At the same time, it had some of the fine qualities of universality that characterize the prayers in our books of common worships. Nothing in the whole service tried to bring tears. It was all quiet and restful. It all struck true. It all took for granted the assured realities of God and life. Ought not the funeral service to be such a help to us to rest back in the sense that this is all God's universe, and that forever, both in the known and in the unknown, underneath are the Everlasting Arms?

There is no finer contribution the young man can make to the State than to fit himself to earn a living. In this way he becomes a helper of society rather than a burden upon it.

The capacity to do some one thing well and to secure an independent living, is one of the chief sources of character. Character and independence are almost synonymous terms. There is hardly anything braces a man up, gives him firm and buoyant tread, more than the sense of mastery and the possession of a trade or profession that is convertible into service which society demands and which makes him master of his own life and ways. The one element lacking in the great Negro element in the South is character; that is, self-reliance, force, stability, self-respect. Principal Booker T. Washington set himself to work to give them character. He took the true way. He did not get the Negro youth together and lecture them. He began to teach them to earn a living. He gave them trades and professions. It is among the great throngs of our city youth who have no trade or capacity to earn a good living that our criminals originate. Do not ever underestimate the ethical significance of an education to earn a living. We should like to see such a system of technical and professional education in our country that every boy could fit himself to do some one thing that would insure him a respectable wage. Nothing would contribute more to the character of our people. It is proverbial that skilled workmen are of a higher grade of character than those who have no training. And the capacity to earn enough to save something so that one may have property of some kind, even a little, is a source of satisfaction and strength.

Again, there is a great source of satisfaction for all true men, as well as a sense of fulfilling manhood, in being able to produce something. Society may be roughly divided into two classes—those who produce something and those who do not. The former class have always been the manly, happy, self-respecting, invaluable men—the men who have built up states, contributed to progress, made the worlds. It is a great joy to be of this class. There is no satisfaction like a piece of work well done. There are few more comforting thoughts at the end of life than to feel one has added some good thing to the world. There is a great joy in supporting a family and being able to educate one's children to add something good in their day as we have done in ours. This capacity to add something to the world is a chief trait of manhood. It lifts one toward divinity, for is not one of the great attributes of God this, that He creates things, that He works forever. Let us never disparage that education that trains us to earn a living and to add something to the unfinished world. To fit oneself for a vocation becomes thus a religious act.

But we have got to train men for life as well as for a living. We have got to educate for vacation as well as vocation. It was interesting to see that a large group of college graduates recently recognized this and wrote a remarkably suggestive appeal to their college not to become simply a vocational school. It called upon it to stand out as one college which believed that education was for culture and the power to live largely and enjoy all the hours greatly, as well as for trade and profession and the capacity to do some one thing well. If we were writing to a group of college boys we would say: Fit yourself well to earn a livelihood, to do some perfect work, to be a producer for the State, a creator of distinctive values; but at the same time educate yourself for living, for full enjoyment and use of those equal leisure

Education for the Whole of Life

THERE is no doubt but that in the present constitution of the economic and social order the first and immediate end of all education must be to fit every man to earn an independent living. There are some who underestimate this function of education as much as others overestimate it. They think it a necessary aim of our schools and colleges, but not a high or lofty one. Here they make a great mistake. For the ambition to earn a respectable and independent livelihood has an ethical and social significance that may lift it to a very high and lofty plane. For the whole structure of our present civilization rests upon the assumption that every man is able to support himself, his family, and those who are incapacitated by disease and misfortune. The more men who can do this the higher is our society, the more secure is the State. The State rests on wealth, or better, on the men who can produce wealth. If few have the capacity to produce it, the State totters. If all could produce it, the State would grow strong and firm. Every man who does not earn a living becomes a burden on the State. Some cannot because of disease or incapacity or misfortune or orphaned youth. These the State gladly carries, but it has to carry them. Some will not work, and the State has to carry them, too. The better and finer the work a man can do, the more wealth he can produce, the greater the uplift to the State, the more secure the social order.

hours. Make yourself acquainted with the great literatures of Israel, Greece and Rome. No man can be called truly educated who is ignorant of them, for they have produced the very civilization of which he is a part. Make excursions into the great poets of Italy, Germany, France and Britain. For here are the great visions of the ages as well as the highest beauty, thought and language ever reached. Become so at home among these great books that no leisure time will ever hang heavily on your hand. American college students on the whole are densely ignorant of the great arts and of music. In Europe these are part of the daily life, and even the butcher would be ashamed not to know the Fifth Symphony. But in America even our college men know nothing of these things and have little capacity to enjoy them. Even now in New York, with thousands of college men, it is the women who make up the audiences at any really fine thing. The colleges are, of course, much to blame for this. But the students might take things into their own hands here, just as much of their acquaintance with literature must be made by themselves. If any college boy is reading these words we would plead with him, for his own enjoyment in future years, to make or get someone to make a list of the great books of all ages and read them in order through his four years' course. And we would plead with him to take during his college course as many studies purely cultural, like philosophy, literature, art, music and history, as he takes for vocational purposes. For, remember, those eight hours a day and Sundays must be provided for as well as the eight hours at your desk. We should want our boy to practise his law or medicine, to teach his subject or preach his sermon, to build his machine or bridge well; but we equally want him to be able to enjoy Hamlet, Faust, the Odyssey, the Divine Comedy, the great symphonies, the Meistersingers, the Sistine Madonna and the Holy Family, and have opinions on them as well.

The Great War and the Great Hope

WHEN the Armistice was signed November 11, 1918, the entire world was thrilled with joy. The hopes of hundreds of millions of men and women ran high for a peace that would be permanent, bringing justice and fair opportunity for all.

Few realized, however, the difficulty of making such a peace, nor how fierce the nationalistic passions had become, and how diametrically opposed were the policies and desires of the many nations and peoples, new and old, great and small.

Five weary years have passed since the Armistice. It has become clear to most that the final establishment of permanent peace between the nations will not come at a bound. Come it will, but only through long and patient processes of national and international education, through willingness of nations to make concessions one to another, through desire for helpful international co-operation, and through the creating by constructive statesmanship of the instruments and agencies of a World Peace System.

During these five years at least two important steps have been taken towards this goal, one in which the United States has participated—the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament—the other the Permanent Court of International Justice.

At the Washington Conference agreements were reached by the principal powers to limit for a period of years their respective naval building programs. Already many hundreds of millions of dollars have been saved to the people of the nations and have been diverted to useful and constructive purposes. But of more importance than the money saved is the removal of misunderstandings, the quieting of fears, and the development of a spirit of mutual confidence between the powers bordering on the Pacific.

By the establishment of the Permanent Court of International Justice (January, 1922), many nations have taken a significant step forward toward the substitution of justice through law for injustice through the violence of war. For the full success, however, of this World Court it is imperative that all the principal nations should be its active supporters. America's presence as a member of the Court is particularly important, if not indeed essential. "The Court will not abolish war," said President Harding at Salt Lake City, "but it is the longest and most practicable step in that direction taken thus far in the history of the world." Membership in the World Court does not commit any nation participating in its decisions to the slightest foreign entanglement or to any possible future wars.

In the movement for the establishment of a world court of justice American constructive statesmanship took the lead through several decades and American citizens played a distinguished part in the creation of the World Court recently established and now functioning at The Hague. Nevertheless, America is not yet a member of the Court. It is, however, increasingly apparent that the full success of the Court depends upon its cordial support by the United States, and its success is most important, for the hope for permanent peace throughout the world is vitally connected with the effective working of this Court.

On February 24, 1923, the late President Harding and Secretary Hughes recommended to Congress a carefully prepared plan whereby American membership in the Court might be effected without in the least compromising the position of this country in its international relations. That plan at once received the enthusiastic approval of large numbers of national leaders of all parties. And in his final address released to the press the day before his sudden death on August 2 the President said: "The big thing is the firm establishment of the Court and our cordial adherence thereto. All else is mere detail."

At the coming session of Congress the Senate will have to decide whether or not the United States shall accept that proposition and become one of the supporting member nations of the Court. On that decision will depend to a large degree the future relations of the United States to the other nations of the world. Shall the United States stand for a world-order in which international justice shall be based on law and reason? Or for a world-order in which, as hitherto, each sovereign nation shall be largely a law unto itself. The question of American membership in the Court is in no sense a partisan issue.

The Churches of America stand unequivocally for a World Peace System and for the settlement of all international difficulties by processes of law, conciliation and mutual consideration. Christians abhor war methods of settling disputes and the entire war system. The spirit of war is in direct conflict with the spirit and the principles of Jesus.

The Commission of the Federal Council believes that the Churches heartily approve of American membership in the World Court and earnestly desire the Senate to accept without mutilation or substantial modification the proposals of the late President as formulated in his message to the Senate February 24, 1923.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., at its recent meeting, endorsed "the recommendation of the President of the United States that we enter the World Court."

Other ecclesiastical bodies meeting the past spring and summer have taken similar action.

It has become evident, however, that if this result is to be secured many millions of citizens should give this question careful consideration and then should let their Senators know, in some adequate way, their judgment and desire in the matter.

The Commission of the Federal Council, therefore, with the Church Peace Union and the American Branch of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches offers to the churches and to all organizations sympathizing with these views the following suggestions and proposals for co-operation in a prompt and effective program of national education in regard to the World Court:

1. Let the week (November 5-10) preceding Armistice Day be designated "World Court Week" and the day itself (November 11) "World Court Sunday."

2. Let all Christian organizations that hold regular meetings during that week, such as church prayer meetings, home and foreign mission study groups, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and Student Volunteer Movement classes, Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and other young people's groups, make the question of American membership in the World Court a principal topic for study, securing if possible special speakers.

3. Let chambers of commerce, labor organizations, Granges, Rotary, Kiwanis and other similar clubs, women's clubs, the League of Women Voters and all distinctively women's organizations, the American Legion and all peace societies provide for discussions on the World Court in their regular meetings and publications during the week.

4. Let city church federations and councils arrange with business, labor and other organizations for union mass meetings on the World Court and American membership therein.

5. Let all Sunday-school superintendents arrange for a ten-minute service on the World Court; and also for rallies of all the Sunday-schools in each town or city on the afternoon of World Court Sunday. A pageant and a united procession would make the day memorable for the children and young people.

6. Let the religious press feature the Permanent Court of International Justice in their issue for World Court Week, including articles on America's responsibilities and opportunities in international relations.

7. Let the daily press recognize the World Court Week in one or more of their editorials during the week and have a broadside on the general subject in their issue for Sunday, November 11.

8. Let presidents of colleges and universities urge upon the various groups in their respective institutions the importance of recognizing World Court Week. And let the National Education Association and the School Citizenship League suggest a similar recognition in all public schools, both high schools and grammar grades, on some suitable day during the week.

9. Let all clergymen on World Court Sunday preach on some phase of America's international responsibility and opportunity, and on the significance of the World Court as an important step in substituting law for war in the settlement of international difficulties.

10. Let all the various agencies named above invite and urge all citizens of voting age to write during the week or on World Court Sunday to both of their Senators, addressing them at their home towns. These letters should express the writer's judgment and desire regarding President Harding's proposal for American membership in the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Philip Moxom, Prophet of Peace

ALTHOUGH the last twenty-five years of Philip Moxom's life were passed in Springfield, where he was pastor of the South Congregational Church and honored as the foremost man in the Springfield pulpit, yet Boston never ceased to regard him fondly and proudly as one of her own; and indeed, we think he always looked back to the years of his ministry in our first Baptist church there as the most interesting and influential period of his life. From the time when he first came thither from Cleveland, he at once took place among the leaders in the Boston pulpit and his religious influence in that city was great. Dr. Hale always spoke of him in his later years here as the ablest preacher in Boston; and multitudes of all churches eagerly listened to his sermons. He was a marked liberalizing force among the younger Baptist ministers of greater Boston.

A group of these with sympathizers from ministers of other churches were in the habit of meeting with him month by month to discuss the critical theological questions of the hour in what they liked to call among themselves, "The Moxom Club." Denominational ties rested lightly upon him and at the time when after leaving the First Baptist Church in Boston, he was called to the South Congregational Church in Springfield there was a strong desire among many in the King's Chapel congregation that he should be called to that historic pulpit.

It was not simply Boston's religious life that he touched. He was president of the Browning Society, the Appalachian Club and active in many features of her philanthropic and social life. Of the four books which he published, three were upon distinctly religious themes, but these give slight idea of his rich and varied intellectual life. None of them touches his remarkable international service, which we here desire to emphasize and which belongs almost entirely to the period after he left Boston. It is with this aspect of his life that I was especially conversant. I was with him at a dozen Mohonk arbitration conferences, where his inspiring voice was always listened to with delight; and I was with him at the memorable International Church Peace Conference at Constance, which took place in those fateful days in August, in 1914, just as the World War was bursting with such awful suddenness upon Europe. He was the tallest and most striking figure at that conference and in the little company of eighty English and American delegates that was rushed away from Constance on the Monday morning under special safeguard on the train down the Rhine to Cologne and during the long night through Holland for the boat from Flushing to England the next morning; for the conference had adjourned to meet in London. The next day, Tuesday, was August 4. All the talk on that voyage over the channel was as to what course England would take and Dr. Moxom was especially exercised over it. There were twenty-five British delegates in our company, including two prominent members of Parliament, well known to Americans, Allen Baker and Wilmoughby Dickinson, and all of them believed that England would remain neutral, for none knew of the invasion of Belgium or of Sir Edward Gray's speech the day before. Moxom took active part in the two days' conference which followed in London and then came home to do his part in America in the years which followed.

He knew well what war was. He was in the Union Army throughout the Civil War, entering the service when a mere boy of fifteen; and he knew—and always vindicated—the noble and heroic elements in war and in the soldier's devotion, as well as he knew the horrors of war, which he fought so unremittingly during all his later years to banish and supplant by the rule of law and the peaceful organization of the world.

Dr. Moxom knew the world. He was at home among the peoples of Europe. He visited Europe seventeen times. He was especially at home in London, where he was always warmly welcomed by large circles of friends. This wide experience freed him from all provincialism and narrow patriotism and made him the friend of all men. Were this experience universal, there would have been no World War. It was not true of even half the diplomats who conducted the feverish correspondence in the fateful summer of 1914. Very few of them knew the men whom they addressed or really knew their countries. Walter Page even in his impressive letters from London dwells with feeling upon the tragical results from the fact that the members of our own State Department had no personal acquaintance with men of the English foreign office and that the subordinates in the department were treated like clerks. What the world needs is international friendship among statesmen, among scholars and among citizens. Nothing human was foreign to Dr. Moxom, to him humanity was above all nations.

He was a delegate to many international conferences and I especially remember his presence at the London Congress of 1908. His spirit was always one of hopefulness and faith that international reason would gradually overcome all political limitations and folly. He was especially insistent upon our own nation taking a position of courageous leadership and during the trying years that followed the World War, he never ceased to emphasize this duty. He believed profoundly in the League of Nations and in our joining the World Court. He deplored the failure of America to take the generous and decisive part in the reconstruction of Europe for which her supreme strength and freedom called and for which the tragical emergency pleaded. The final lesson of Dr. Moxom's life is the commanding lesson for this hour, the lesson of world love and trust as overcoming jealousy and hate, the lesson that nations, like men, should settle their disputes in court and not in battle and that all nations should league themselves together for that friendly co-operation which alone can save our civilization. [EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE]

Glimpses of South America

EN ROUTE MONTEVIDEO TO RIO DE JANEIRO

MY ten days in Buenos Aires and Montevideo were among the most interesting that I have ever spent in those cities. I found the atmosphere in Buenos Aires very different from that of Santiago. In the latter city the diplomatic attitude naturally prevailed during the Pan-American Conference. Even the newspapers were very careful not to show any of the prejudice against the United States which has been so prominent formerly in that city. The delegates to the Conference were all exceedingly careful in their attitude toward the United States. In Argentina all was different. In fact, in going across the Andes on the special train, furnished by Argentina and Chile for the delegates to the Conference, I began to feel, as I talked to the Argentine delegates, that the atmosphere at Santiago was not representative of the general attitude in South America toward the United States. The Argentines feel especially the naval mission to Brazil, and believe that this mission signifies the United States' desire for these countries to build up their armies and navies in order that they may be good customers of our munition factories. A naval officer said to me: "Of course, the United States desires the South American countries to arm or she would not have sent the naval mission to Brazil. The naval mission will certainly recommend new expenditures in Brazil in order to better her navy. But, of course, the United States knows that if Brazil begins to arm, other countries will do the same. One of the things, no doubt, that this naval mission will do is to plan with the Brazilian general staff the best way of attacking a potential foe, which is Argentina. Some of our people even believe that there is a secret alliance between Brazil and the United States. While the best informed do not take this position, yet we must believe that since the United States has sent, not two or three minor officers, but seventeen of the highest men in the United States Navy, including an admiral, that there are large plans for the development of the navy with the support of the United States."

This is only one phase of Argentina's attitude. The one that was most prominently brought to me was the continuous preaching of commercialism by the North American advocates of Pan-Americanism. Every time a diplomat makes an address or a visitor speaks in Argentina he emphasizes the need of closer commercial relations. There is no one to talk of the spiritual and intellectual side of these relations. In the Santiago Conference this same emphasis was given by the North American delegates, and in the addresses and interviews they gave in Buenos Aires the same emphasis was made. It is no wonder then that the Argentine people believe that Pan-Americanism is a movement fostered by the United States for improving its commercial advantages with Latin America.

We could do an exceedingly large service not only for Argentina, but for the betterment of our own relations with these countries, by fostering a real program of intellectual exchange between the two countries. Italy, Spain and France are sending mission after mission to South America these days. These are not commercial missions, but are composed of the most representative authors, university professors and scientists, who are received with tremendous enthusiasm as they lecture on the literature, art and educational life of their countries. It has been many years since the United States sent anyone to the Argentine to represent its intellectual life. We should have three to six of our best university men in Buenos Aires continuously, acting in various capacities, as exchange professors, as technical advisers and public lecturers. In this connection it is well to note that in the Sunday editions of the big dailies of Buenos Aires the very best writers of Spain, France, Italy and Great Britain contribute continually. Yet there is scarcely anything from the United States, except correspondents dealing with commercial and political questions.

Argentina has always been very closely related to Europe. She will decide in the next few years, as she is now rapidly developing, what will be her permanent leanings. If we have anything in the United States which we believe would help Argentina in her intellectual and spiritual life it is time that we would make this known. This may sound as though one does not count the work done by North American missionary societies. Far from this being the case, one must recognize the great good done by these organizations. Yet we must frankly admit that they have scarcely touched the hem of the garment which enfolds the great national life of Argentina. Indeed, the difficulties which these missionary organizations from the United States confront is explained in a large way by the general belief in Argentina that anything that comes from North America has a commercial design. The secretary of the Y. M. C. A. reports that a close personal friend of his on being solicited for a subscription for the Association came to the building and examined the work very closely, but his final conclusion was: "Admirable, a wonderful work, but you need not tell me that these wise North Americans who always calculate how to make things pay are not getting financial benefit directly or indirectly from this work."

In Buenos Aires I had the privilege of being the guest of Colegio Americano. The school is progressing admirably. It has the opportunity of becoming one of the great mission schools of the world. It is now incorporated as a part of the secondary school system of Argentina. Students who pass their secondary course are admitted without further examination into the university. It also has a complete primary and high school course in English, as well as a three-year commercial course. The school needs new quarters. There are no playgrounds, and the problem of handling the boys is a very large one. The new Board of Trustees, just organized in the United States, should face up the question of securing a large plot of ground on one of the suburban electrified roads. Proper grounds would probably cost $100,000 to $150,000; an administration building about as much more. The other buildings could be erected gradually. The local board of management has begun to discuss the problem of enlargement, one of the courses, and a new constitution. There is dissatisfaction with the constitution because it eliminates their faculty representation on the Board of Control, and gives the latter the power to control the internal workings of the school. It was voted to suggest the naming of two faculty members on the Board of Control.

We had a good meeting of the Committee on Co-operation. The atmosphere was splendid. Those organizations which opposed co-operation have dropped out of the committee. This means that the committee is able to go ahead as other regional committees do in considering an active program. We discussed the Montevideo Conference fully. The committee feels that it is absolutely necessary for them to have some one to give his time to the management of the co-operative work, especially from now to the Montevideo Conference. They voted to ask us to arrange for such a person.

I visited and spoke at a large number of our missionary institutions, including the new woman's training school in Buenos Aires, the Union Theological School, the Methodist Printing House, the American Church, the Y. M. C. A., the Disciples Church in Belgrano, and so on. In Montevideo I enjoyed greatly seeing the new Methodist Girls' School, one of the finest buildings in South America, operating at full capacity, doing a wonderful work which is appreciated by the whole city. The new training school of the Y. M. C. A. in Montevideo, is a part of the system developed by the Continental Committee for training leaders in Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina, where there are local schools. Mr. Conard, as head of this new educational work, has reason to be proud of the progress already made, and I believe that these schools will help not only the Y. M. C. A., but will contribute to all of the evangelical work in South America. The Y. W. C. A. has changed its South American headquarters to Buenos Aires recently. Their newer association in Montevideo, as well as the older one in Buenos Aires, are developing most satisfactorily. Their physical work especially is beyond their power to handle. In Buenos Aires they are greatly needing a new building. They are also quite short of secretaries. At least six new women should be sent to South America, this year even, to take care of the present work.

SAMUEL G. INMAN.

If we think of nature, it is well for us to take all the knowledge concerning it that science can give us. To oppose this is folly, and self-inflicted impoverishment. But a greater impoverishment still would be to allow the knowledge to deprive us of the spiritual significance of nature. We are sure judging from his article, that Dr. Haldane would agree with Russell Lowell's sonnet:

"I grieve not that right Knowledge takes away
The charm that Nature to my childhood wore
For with that insight, cometh, day by day,
A greater bliss than wonder was before;
The real doth not clip the poet's wings—
To win the secret of a weed's plain heart
Reveals some clue to spiritual things,
And stumbling guess becomes firm-footed art;
Flowers are not flowers unto the poet's eyes,
Their beauty thrills him by an inward sense;
He knows that outward seemings are but lies;
Or, at the most, but earthly shadows, whence
The soul that looks within for truth may guess
The presence of some wondrous loveliness."

Poet and botanist may be combined in one person; when they are not the poet gets the deeper truth of nature. The world, as represented in the language of physical science can only be, as Dr. Haldane shows, a world of unreal abstractions. The man who takes it for reality is following a shadow.

William C. Durant, head of the Durant Motors, proposes to open a bank in New York which shall be owned by "the people." Three hundred thousand "partners" will share in it, he says, none of them to own more than one shore. Perhaps we can reach the time when our village and town banks will be owned by everybody in the village or town. Indeed, may we not reach public ownership, not by any government ownership, but by direct shareholding by everybody? Might not such a development leave its field to private initiative and at the same time make all of us share in the general prosperity?

Kate Douglas Wiggin: Kindergartener and Author

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

AMERICA lost one of her most charming writers and the children one of their dearest friends when Kate Douglas Wiggin passed away last week in London. Her name was a household word in thousands of American homes, and "The Bird's Christmas Carol" and "Mother Carey's Chickens" won the delight of thousands of children through the last two generations. I do not know whether it is generally known or not that Mrs. Riggs (for that was her real name) was, with her siser, Nora Archibald Smith, a pioneer in kindergarten methods. After attending Abbott Academy in Andover she went to California at the age of nineteen to engage in kindergarten work. This was in 1876, and child education was in the experimental stage. She became a teacher in Santa Barbara, but after a year left this school and opened a free kindergarten. This was the first free kindergarten west of the Rocky Mountains—the Silver Street Kindergarten, San Francisco. Her work soon attracted attention and before long the whole community became interested. One woman, the noted educator, Mrs. Sarah Cooper, became so interested that she helped Mrs. Riggs establish the California Kindergarten Training School, a sort of normal school for kindergarten teachers. When Mrs. Riggs left California for the east there were sixty free kindergartens in the State, the outgrowth of this school. Mrs. Riggs had to make most of her own methods and provide most of her own stories, music and entertainment for the children. The outgrowth of all this was that such stories as "The Bird's Christmas Carol" and "Mother Carey's Chickens" and "The Story of Patsy" were written. She and her sister wrote many songs for the children, both words and music, and these in book form came into universal use. Then came books on the education of children which were widely read. There were years of struggle and hard work, but full of great happiness, for Mrs. Riggs both loved and understood children, and it was a life of great achievement.

Mrs. Riggs came to New York to live in 1888, and from that time on hardly a year passed that did not find some notable book coming from her pen. The first book to find its way to the public at large was "Timothy's Quest." Everybody realized when that appeared that here was a genius among us, and that a new note had been struck in American literature. Its humor was delicious and irresistible. It was a perfect picture of a phase of New England life. Who can ever forget the chapter where the visiting village dressmaker retails the news? Were there ever more delicious tidbits than that of the man who, when he was told by the undertaker that he would have to ride in the same carriage with his mother-in-law at his wife's funeral, said he supposed he could if it was necessary, but it would spoil the whole blamed thing for him; or the dressmaker's summing up of the deacon's stinginess with the remark, "It's a good thing salvation's free or Deacon Pennell wouldn't have got none of it?"

"Rebecca of Sunny Brook Farm" was a great success. Again it was New England, and not only was the New England atmosphere perfectly achieved, but Rebecca and her aunt were real characters, and was there ever a more charming character than Rebecca? Mrs. Riggs knew New England thoroughly. Her attractive summer home was at Hollis, Maine, to which she retired summer after summer, and where most of her writing was done. It is a lovely spot and the house reflected the writer's personality in every nook and corner. The chief ornament of a real New England home is books, and of course Mrs. Riggs knew this. The background of "Rebecca" was of course this New England Mrs. Riggs knew so well. "Rebecca" was not only universally read, being out of the most popular books, but it achieved great success as a play. After a long run on the stage it was filmed and thus percolated down into the small towns and villages—but all its charm was gone. Half the charm of personality as well as of literature is speech, and all this is gone in the movies. All movie characters are only "half-people." No personality is complete without speech. Nature is, but man is not. The man or woman who is not speaking while in action is manifesting only half of his or her nature. One felt this immediately upon seeing the silent Rebecca. Only half of her was there. Also half of Mrs. Riggs' charm as a writer was in the sparkling, revealing, delicious conversation. Her other New England stories, "Rose of the River" and "Later Chronicles of Rebecca" were interesting and successful, but not quite so spontaneous as "Rebecca" and "Timothy's Quest." This was natural, since they came as answer to the public's cry for "more."

Shortly after her coming to New York she began to make visits to England and henceforth visited England every two or three years. She became widely known in England and made many friends there. It was, I think, at a dinner given to her by the British authors where she told the story which found its way to every corner of the British Empire. I wonder if any readers remember it? It is one of the best there is and it nearly sent the audience to which she told it into hysterics. There was a colored man who had been on the plantation for many years. There was a colored cook, Martha, who had also been there many years, and Moses and Martha had been great friends. One day as the Master was starting to drive into the county seat Moses approached him shyly and told him he had about concluded to get married and would he get him a license while he was in town. "Certainly I will, Moses," he said, "and I am glad you're going to get married at last." That night the Master turned the license over to Moses, telling him it cost one dollar. Moses took it and went off. In about half an hour he sought the Master out and said, "Thar's been a mistake here, Mr. Jackson. The license is made out with Martha's name. It ain't Martha I'se goin' to marry, but Sally, the new maid." The Master was quite thunderstruck. "I naturally thought it was Martha," he said; "you and she have been such friends for years. Well, I can get a new one with Sally's name when I go in to-morrow morning, but it will cost you another dollar." Moses went away, but the next morning he approached his Master just as he was getting ready to go into town and said, "If it don't make no difference, Mr. Jackson, I guess I'll let that marriage license stand just as it is and marry Martha. To tell the honest truth, Mr. Jackson, thar ain't a dollar's worth of difference between them two ladies."

Mrs. Riggs' frequent visits to England resulted in a series of the most charming travel books that have been written in America—"A Cathedral Courtship," "Penelope's English Experiences," "Penelope's Progress" and several more. They are the story of the journeys of a small group of Americans, of which she of course was one, through the loveliest parts of England. They linger in the beautiful cathedral towns and frequent not the big hotels beloved of tourists, but the quaint old inns. They visit too in old, fascinating English houses. I doubt if one can find better pictures of the real England and the real English life than in these books. There also runs through them the most charming love story—just enough story to keep one wondering what will happen in the next town.

Mrs. Riggs was the most charming hostess and her beautiful New York home came about as near to a salon as any place in New York. One was always sure to find interesting people there—or if one did not, it did not matter, since she was there—brilliant, vivacious, kindly, beloved of everybody. Everybody will be interested to know that fortunately she had just finished an autobiography called "My Garden of Memories." It will be delightful reading.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

Psychology and Religion

By Rev. F. W. Barnes, Sc.D., F.R.S.

Canon of Westminster

[The following sermon was preached before the Seventh International Congress of Psychology, in Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford.]

"Great is truth and stronger than all things."—1 Esdras 4:35.

IT seems to me a significant and welcome fact that those who have organized the Seventh International Congress of Psychology, now being held in Oxford, should have included in their program a sermon in this cathedral. I doubt whether such a sign of friendliness would have been possible a generation ago. The belief then persisted that, presumably because of some obscure flaw in the scheme of the universe, religion and science were bound to quarrel. Divines regarded men of science, if not with hostility, at any rate with wary suspicion. Many acted as though undue familiarity might tarnish the pure lustre of orthodoxy. On the other hand, men of science, conscious that they were giving their lives to the pursuit of truth, resented the timid and grudging recognition accorded to their work. In this city, just over sixty years ago, Bishop Wilberforce attacked with foolish unfairness the "Origin of Species." In 1877 the Pope described Darwinism as "a system which is repugnant at once to history, to the traditions of all peoples, to exact science, to observed facts, and even to Reason herself." "Pride goes so far," he continued, "as to degrade man himself to the level of the unreasoning brutes." Naturally leaders of science were sensitive to ignorant presumption, and sometimes bitter in their rejoinder. They saw that religion divorced from truth is religion divorced from reality. If ecclesiastics demanded the closed mind, the Church ceased to be the home of spiritual freedom. So men, like Huxley, profoundly religious in temper, sought in relative isolation to solve the riddle of human life. Forced into a position of antagonism, he was cut off from that inheritance of religious experience which is preserved by worship and gives life to dogma.

Fortunately, this absurd and unnecessary strife has at length, in this country, been widely abandoned, if we may judge, as is fair, by the general attitude of representative Anglican and Free Church divines. Diversity of opinion continues to exist as to the inferences which may legitimately be drawn from scientific theory and discovery. But insofar as men of science, astronomers, geologists, biologists or psychologists have reached substantial agreement their conclusions are accepted by religious leaders. "The right starting-point," says the Dean of St. Paul's, "is to examine the conception of the world as known to science." It is a sound position, but you here will not dispute his further contention that "such a conception is abstract because it ignores for its own purposes all esthetic and moral judgments." He protests rightly that it does but give us a world of facts without values. The picture of the universe which we construct appeals to us because of the truth-value which we believe it to possess. Into the vast time-process which evolution describes we import the idea of progress. In fact, by the human mind we make not only quantitative measurements, but also qualitative judgments. Both must be used in our search for reality.

You here will admit, at any rate in theory, that the search for ultimate reality is not your business. You seek to discover how the mind works. For you it is a machine which receives and utilizes certain types of raw material, sensations or "suggestions." Your business is to study how the machine works. By comparison with similar machines you determine whether its working is normal or not. But how far the sensations give knowledge of external reality does not lie within your province. Mental states are set up both by phenomena and by the mental states of other individuals: you analyze their consequences for thought, will and feeling. You construct criteria of normality. There your task ends.

But, of course, no one is satisfied with such an ending. The normal, we instinctively protest, must be the perfect, or at least a stage in the evolution of the perfect. It must be a key to ultimate reality. This instinctive belief, of course, accounts for the popular religious interest in psychology. It is the science which shows us how worship works, and therefore—you cannot eradicate this "therefore" from popular belief—"that religion is true." So arises the absurd conviction that a dogma like transsubstantiation can be "proved by psychology." The same pathetic faith has led to innumerable volumes which profess to base religion on the new psychology. One is reminded of some very wise words of Sir Clifford Allbutt, who has endeared himself alike by his wisdom and his personal qualities to many generations of Cambridge men. He has said, "It is one of the misfortunes of science, as it is of social adventure, that every new point of view, as soon as revealed in part, is mobbed by a crowd of half-educated thinkers, among whom fanatics and imposters find many dupes." You must not judge too severely the many mistaken attempts to exploit your science in the interest of particular religious opinions. Regard them rather as evidence of a strong and by no means discreditable desire to find spiritual certainty.

I may incur your censure if I enter the border country, ravaged by contending armies, which separates your province from that of theology. Yet there are certain considerations which I venture to put before you. First of all, I would remind you that, because you study the mind as a machine, you may naturally conclude that all its reactions are mechanically determined. But this conclusion is not legitimate; it is an assumption in the convenient working hypothesis with which you start. It may be granted that no argument in favor of free will is absolutely conclusive. But just as men of science accept the belief that we can know facts which exist independently of our mental states, so we claim that men are not automata. Each claim is a postulate of reasonable faith. The determinist position accepted by many psychologists is not demonstrably true. The facts which incline men to accept it prove, inter alia, that human personality can be injured by unwholesome surroundings, and so should stimulate us to be eager for social reform. But such eagerness, if fruitful, is a free will offering of ourselves for our fellows. Determinism does not, of course, destroy belief in the existence of the spiritual values, goodness, beauty and truth. But, because it denies our freedom to mould personality by these values, it is a form of pessimism which, as I think, even our imperfect civilization forces us to repudiate.

In the second place, I would urge that we cannot escape the view that human personality has come into existence by a process which cannot be adequately described in terms of mechanism. Work in the border-land between physiology and psychology brilliantly exemplified in the researches of Dr. Head, suggests that we are gaining a more complete understanding of the process by which the human mind has evolved from the apparently automatic reactions of primitive organisms. That physiological memory can exist in the absence of consciousness; that, at merely physiological levels, there should be the appearance of purpose in response to stimuli—these facts suggest that no definite line can be drawn between conscious and unconscious behavior. We may infer perhaps that even man's capacity to frame and use abstract concepts is the product of a continuous development from elementary physiological reaction. Yet I would urge that, although in this way we may describe the sequences which have led to man's ethical self-consciousness, we must not jump to the conclusion that the whole process is a mere unpacking of what was already latent. It may be, as Dr. Haldane has said, "that the time is not far distant when we shall be able to transform the present appearance of the inorganic world by tracing life in it." But we cannot surely accept the view that man's highest faculties exist latent in inorganic matter. Nor, as it seems to me, can we argue that they are the result of some blind mechanism. Let us grant that certain inorganic aggregates at suitable pressure and temperature condition began to exhibit the phenomena of life; that living organisms reacting to environment developed increasingly complex types of behavior; that awareness was gradually associated with purposive action, and that finally human self-consciousness resulted. Is mechanistic interpretation of the phenomena satisfactory? I should say, rather, that the working hypotheses which seem to suffice as "laws" in physico-chemical investigations are inadequate. We must admit that new qualities, powers, values, have come into existence. The process is not a mere rearrangement; there is in it an element of free creative activity directed to a definite end. We must find indications of that end in the highest faculties of man, in the spiritual values on which he is slowly building civilization. And thus behind phenomena we must put the creative activity of spirit.

The more we study the evolutionary process, the more important and I may add, perplexing appears to be the factor of variability, of change which has led to progress. In one of your papers of which I have been privileged to see a proof there is a most interesting discussion of instinct, which the author defines as "a reaction pattern determining the behavior of an organism in certain definite environmental situations." Instincts can become admirably protective and of great social value, as the life of the hive and the life of man alike show. But let the reaction pattern become rigid, as it appears to be among the bees, and progress is at an end. It is the factor of variability, showing itself in man as freedom of choice, which permits movement, if sometimes downward, yet also upward. This leads me to see in the human will the central element of human personality and to find in that will not merely the product of, but a means of response to, creative spirit.

Whether we be determinists or not, whether we allow or refuse to allow that the will exerts real freedom of choice, we do not deny the existence within personality of controlling forces and instinctive tendencies. The conflict between the two is most interesting of psychological investigations; it is also of profound importance in the religious life. So, though psychology has only an indirect bearing on theology, it is intimately concerned with practical religion. The religious man accepts goodness and truth as revelations of the Divine nature, and tries to set his will to do God's will. Thence comes conflict—the eternal "What I would I cannot: what I would not, that I do." Out of the conflict comes the strength and the energy which cause religion to be so potent, and sometimes so dangerous, a factor in human life. It is dangerous when in the conflict ethical values are imperfectly perceived; when, to use an obvious example, unchastity, but not intolerance, is regarded as a sin. But when the conflict is severe and successful we normally see a marked increase of volitional energy. St. Paul, Augustine, Wesley, General Booth, are familiar instances in Christian history. To-morrow you will be discussing the conception of mental and nervous energy. You will be asked to distinguish between "sustained purposive activity" and its physical manifestation, the latter being the energy which can be expressed in terms of the space-time-mass notions of physics. Naturally the question arises as to whether some unknown factor, some non-physical (imponderable) is present; and, if so, what is its relation to the Creative Spirit which some of us believe to lie behind phenomena. The physiologist may reply that his science forbids him to postulate unknowns. Yet I cannot think it absurd to hold that volitional energy, when it appears in religious leaders as a consequence of "sublimation," is legitimately termed spiritual. "Seek to do God's will and power from on high shall be given you," is familiar Christian teaching. Some of us believe in the absolute existence of spiritual values; that their realm is the Kingdom of God. We believe that man was created to enter that realm; on any other hypothesis the universe seems to us meaningless. Conflicts within the self we view as a necessary element in "soul-making." According to our success in these conflicts we fulfil our destiny. And we believe that the God who created us helps us as we try to serve Him; that, as we seek to enter the Kingdom, the Spirit which was in Christ Jesus aids us in our quest.

So far as I have studied your subject I find in it no unchallengeable conclusions which would negative such beliefs. I find much which promises to be of great use to religious teachers and leaders. You will, I hope, throw light on many obscure and sometimes morbid religious manifestations that perplex and trouble us. But I do not think that the inflexible pursuit of truth will ever cause you to deny the power and beauty alike of will and aspiration which the religious life of man, at its best, brings into the world. You will rather agree with Rivers, whose too early death we all mourn. Was he not right when he said, speaking of the energy derived from spiritual conflict, that "we do not know how high the goal that it may reach"?

The Debt Eternal

By John H. Finley, LL.D.

Formerly Commissioner of Education and President of the College of the City of New York

[NOTE: This article is the opening pages of one of the most valuable books on education published for many years, "The Debt Eternal." Its beauty as well as its value is apparent from these opening pages. The Council of Women for Home Missions and the Missionary Education Movement have rendered a valuable service by combining to publish it. Its chapters are The Child at Home, Child Health, Play and Recreation, Child Labor, Children and Schools, Children in Need of Special Care, The Child and the Church. Every parent and teacher should read it.—EDITORS.]

DURING the Great War, in its very blackest period, I crossed the ocean on my way to Palestine. The battle of Kemmael Hill occurred when I was on shipboard. Marshal Haig, on the other side of the Channel, was saying to his men that they were standing with their backs to the wall. Conditions were desperate. And yet it was at that very time that the head of the Education Department of England was introducing a parliamentary measure which came to be known as the "Children's Charter," and that he was rising in the House of Commons in its behalf, crying even above the sound of the guns and of Marshal Haig's appeal, "Education is the eternal debt which maturity owes to children and youth."

So in the midst of discussions of reparations and debts which fill the papers and books with statistics of what peoples owe one another, and incidentally fill their heads with suspicion, distrust and hate, we have need to remember that the supreme debt under which we have been placed by our past, by our hope for the future of the race, by our faith in a Divine Being and by our belief in the Christ in whom He has been revealed to men, is to teach our children that which has been committed to us through centuries and to enable them, so far as that is humanly possible, to realize that which we have struggled toward in our best moments and in our highest aspirations and our most unselfish deeds.

So I have called this book "The Debt Eternal." It is to help us to feel that responsibility to those who came immediately and even remotely after us, and then to suggest ways in which that responsibility can be met through the home, the school, the church and other institutions and agencies of our Christian civilization.

And think how the responsibility crowds upon us. The world has been thousands of millions of years in the making and man has been upon it for tens, perhaps hundreds of thousands of years. The mouths of the billions who have gone before are stopped with dust. It is only through us, the living, and such of their thoughts and memories of their deeds as are kept in books and in music and in pictures, that all that racial experience of these hundreds of thousands of years is transmitted, and it is only as we make child character and child intelligence and child bodies capable of carrying on toward the ideals set before mankind in the teachings of Christ that we confidently hope for the "saving of America" and of the world.

First of all, let us think of what our heritage is, the heritage of faith which has come down to us through many centuries. We usually begin the record with the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, which is a recital of the phenomena of the faith of the patriarchs and prophets and warriors, among the first of whom was Abraham—whom I heard Dr. Gunsaulus once speak of as “the first American” because he “went out (westward) not knowing whither he went.” That immortal list of men and women included the names and the particular evidences of the faith of Jacob and Moses and Joshua; the names of some of whose deeds time failed the writer of the letter to speak; Gideon and Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David and Samuel; and the evidences of the faith of unnumbered martyrs whose names are not given. It is a chapter of disappointments, for though they all obtained a “good report,” they received not the promise, that is, they did not reach their ideal state. It was only through those coming after them that they were to be “made perfect.”

That list was written nearly two thousand years ago. It was but suggestive even for that time. It did not include, for example, the names of the first disciples and the apostles. But the writer was conscious that he and they to whom he was writing were compassed about by a greater cloud of witnesses than those he mentioned. It is that company, multiplied by hundreds of thousands, that now look down upon us to see what we are going to do to realize the ideal set before us by one who is the “Author and Finisher of our faith.” I once heard Dr. Fosdick say in a sermon that we had to count our direct ancestors back through but thirty generations to find that we had each a billion. They converge upon us, they reside within us, they remind us of the land for which they set out but never reached. What else is this urge within us but a Divinity impelling us toward a goal that is beyond our sight, a goal that science has not seen with its microscope or its telescope, a goal that we can see only by a faith and reach as a nation and as a race only by keeping that faith burning in the hearts of those who carry on when our living here is ended?

If I were adding new examples of faith and new names to the memorable list in the letter to the Hebrews I should have to give up the whole of the book to our heritage. But space fails me, as time failed the author of that ancient epistle of faith, to speak of those who have gone before us in later generations, confessed “strangers and pilgrims on the earth” who, though they also obtained a good report, received not the promise.

I cite my own personal experience and debt, which is, I am sure, suggestive and illustrative of the great generic debt under which those sojourners from one eternity to another across this earth here in America, to go no farther back, have placed us.

When I was emerging from the indistinctness of the past eternity into what I am accustomed to call my “life” (and it seems as if it were contemporaneous with the Homeric days of the race), I can see a Scotch-Irish Presbyterian, who was accustomed to start the hymns of a Sunday in the prairie church, sitting at night, with closed eyes, in a small, lighted room, the only one in a square mile of darkness out on the prairie, and I can still hear him singing a quaint song, which has now disappeared, I think, from our hymnology:

I'm a pilgrim, and I'm a stranger;
I can tarry, I can tarry but a night.
Do not detain me, for I am going
To where the fountains are ever flowing.
I'm a pilgrim, and I'm a stranger;
I can tarry, I can tarry but a night.

He had come as a young man from a little church on the western slopes of the Alleghenies, a church established by his grandfather, who was my great-great-grandfather, in a Presbyterian reaching from the ridges of the “Laurel Hills to the setting sun”. and he went on, singing in the dawn, toward the west—one of the society of frontier Scotch-Irish migrants, who as President Roosevelt has said, were as the spray of the immigration that broke over the Alleghenies, precursors, pilgrims, whose companions in that wandering exile were the clouds, the migratory birds, the swarming bees, the frogs, the devouring grasshoppers, the seventeen-year locusts and those lean large-familied brothers of the pioneer, whose covered wagons like white-sailed schooners were ever moving across the level stretches of plain.

I can even now hear (accompanying the tune of that pioneer's confident faith in a celestial destination or predestination) the cry of the cranes in their honking migration northward, the lonesome croak of the frogs (as Aristophanes heard them in the ponds of Greece), and the shrill cry of the bloodless grasshoppers, to whom Homer likened Old Priam's chiefs upon the walls of Troy. I can even hear the invisible choir of bees which one day came singing in the sky over my field and were persuaded down to temporary industry on the earth by the clods I, as a ploughboy, threw up into the air.

For the whole creation seemed to give accompaniment to the song of the faith of those who “confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth,” and that they desired “a better country, that is, an heavenly.”

There was a sense of the “illimitable destiny,” of the “challenge of eternity,” even among those pioneer, God-fearing farmers and farmers' wives who lived austere and busily, yet calmly, and as in the presence of immortal forces. Outwardly, the life seemed a hard life, a gray life, a narrow life. No one actually traveled far, except to go back to one's native place or to search for new fields beyond. But there was a consciousness of the splashing fountains beyond time and space.

These migrants (for they were not vagrants, they were destined travelers) built their houses of wood, from sheer necessity; but these ephemeral structures, even, seemed to express their sense of the transitoriness of their terrestrial life. And the acre of virgin land which they set apart for the church was as the threshing-floor of Ornan, the Jebusite, or the plot of Obed-Edom, in whose house the ark rested on its journey—as a Bethel, a very gate of heaven, on a stoneless, treeless plain.

I should think that I was imagining and imputing too much of other-worldliness to those whose seemingly cheerless lives sat often at such gates of heaven if I had not the testimony of others to add to my own experience. I read some time ago a notable article in “The Atlantic” entitled “Whither?” which reveals in letters gathered from a generation or two ago (though in another part of the United States, as I assume) what I believe was true in my less cultured community—reveals “a far deeper life, a profounder hope and faith, a recognition of wider horizons than most of the contemporary world knows” with all its greater geographical horizons.

And I found recently in a diary this entry concerning a sermon which belonged to that period, a sermon preached about the Atlantic cable:

“The two hemispheres are now successfully united by means of the electric wire, but what is it, after all, compared with the instantaneous communication between the Throne of Divine Grace and the heart of man? Offer up your silent petition. It is transmitted through realms of unmeasured space more rapidly than the lightning's flash, and the answer reaches the soul ere the prayer has died away on the sinner's lips. Yet this telegraph, performing its saving functions ever since Christ died for men on Calvary, fills not the world with exultation and shouts of gladness, with illuminations and bonfires and the booming of cannon. The reason is, one is the telegraph of this world and may produce revolutions on earth [as it has]; the other is the sweet communication between Christ and the Christian soul and will secure a glorious immortality in heaven."

The poet Arthur O'Shaughnessy, in his poem on St. John the Baptist, says:

I think he had not heard of the far towns,
Nor of the deeds of men nor of kings' crowns
Before the thought of God took hold of him.

I have often wondered if in this age in which the telegraph now reaches around the globe, in which the telephone has made it possible for the President to speak to thousands in New York and San Francisco at the same moment, as he did on the day of the burial of the Unknown Soldier, in which a voice in speech or song may be heard by a million or more by radio, when the noises of the far towns and the deeds of men in remote parts of the earth are heard even in the midst of solitudes, whether we shall be able to keep the thought that took hold of John in the Wilderness, or even give it a chance to take hold of us. Our victories over the afar will be of little value to mankind if they shut us away from this communication with the Infinite.

It was at that very time of this Homeric Presbyterian singing out on the prairies by one whose kinsman had invented the telegraph that there was sung here in the Atlantic seaboard States that crude song, very like a topical melody of more recent days, which ran, as nearly as I can remember:

Far out upon the prairies
How many children dwell
Who never read the Bible
Nor hear the Sabbath bell!
And when the holy morning
Wakes us to sing and pray,
They spend the blessed moments
In idleness and play.

And we prairie children, using an eastern book, I suppose, sang it, too, never realizing that we were of those whom the song writer had pityingly in mind.

Fortunately, out on those prairies, though, there were a few Sabbath bells, the children who dwelt there did read the Bible and knew the chief end of man, and if there was ought of Sabbath "idleness or play," it was of a most pious and sober sort. At any rate, it was so if I may generalize from the habits of the little community which had that country church which I knew best at its center.

A metropolitan reporter who had an interview with me a little time ago said that when President Wilson many years since made the famous threat of hanging certain people "higher than Haman," he and his fellow reporters had no notion as to who Haman was. But I venture to say that there were few if any of teachable mind and literate age in the pioneer Christian families who were not as familiar with the characters of the Bible, Haman included, as these reporters were with the men in the street where President Wilson proposed to erect the gallows.

I do not know that it is more culpable, culturally, not to be familiar with the proud Biblical characters whom Dante found in Purgatory (Nimrod, Saul on dewless and rainless Gilboa, Rehoboam and the sons of Sennacherib) than with the alternate classical representatives of Pride whom he found there, Pellas, Mars and others, but I am certain that no human life can well orient itself with respect to these two mysterious eternities between which we journey across this earth unless it have some guidance of the theocratic experience of those whom Nimrod and Saul and Rehoboam represented in Dante's "Divine Comedy" and whom Moses, David and the "cloud of witnesses" illustrated in the immortal chapter on faith, beginning with the definition, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." If I were adding to this chapter later specific illustrations of faith, I think I should also add the later definition of faith given by one who saw men giving their lives beside him in the trenches of France, though it has an unbiblical flavor. It is Donald Hankey's definition, "Faith is betting your life that there is a God."

The fate that will overtake the individual or the country that has not this reach of human sympathy and this faith has been powerfully presented in an ode by one of our recent American poets containing these lines:

The world stands out on either side
No wider than the heart is wide;
Above the world is stretched the sky,
No higher than the soul is high.
The heart can push the sea and land
Farther away on either hand;
The soul can split the sky in two,
And let the face of God shine through.
But East and West will pinch the heart
That cannot keep them pushed apart;
And he whose soul is flat—the sky
Will cave in on him by and by.

If for no other reason than to prevent the pinching of our own hearts, our sympathies should go out daily, east and west, till they encircle the earth; if for no other reason than to prevent the sky caving in on us, we must keep it "split in two" that the face of God may shine through.

So much for an heritage. It has put upon us an obligation, whether we will or not, placing us in debt to those coming after us. It is through the children from generation to generation that we are to come nearer and nearer the goal in this race that is set before us. When I was out in Palestine during the war I passed one day a squalid village where, according to tradition, the prophet Jonah was buried. It was one of the cities mentioned in Joshua's division of Canaan. It is only a few miles from Bethlehem and if it had been awake the night that the star came and stood over where the young child was it might also have seen the glory that shone round about and heard the angelic voices that were listened to by the shepherds. But it has no place in history such as the little town of Bethlehem not more than ten miles away.

When I saw the few children scurrying away as I approached this village I remembered the disappointing experience of the old prophet. He did not want to go and do what the Lord had directed him to do. And when, finally, he did go and preach against the great and wicked city of Nineveh he was impatient and bitter in complaint because the doom that he had prophesied did not come upon the city. Then it was that the Lord asked: whether He ought not to save the city in which there were so many scores of thousands who could not tell their right hand from their left hand, that is, innocent children? So the children and the cattle saved the city for the time being.

As we look upon the world to-day we are sometimes disposed to feel as did Jonah about Nineveh. But at the worst or best it is the children through whom, above all others, we are to make it a better world, that is, save it.

And I believe that the children of America are above all others the hope of the world. This is said in no boastful mood. It is said with a sense of the responsibility that is upon those who have had the good fortune to come to this land "trailing clouds of glory" from another world or have come as immigrants by way of some other land. During and since the war I have seen the faces and forms of children all the way back to the traditional Garden of Eden; I have seen their very countenances asking why they were brought into this broken earth where they were compelled to live in misery and pain and hunger, pierced by the winds and snows in Asia Minor, burned on the sands of the Syrian Desert, refugees on the shores of Greece and on the islands of the Ægean, homeless, shelterless, by tens and hundreds of thousands.

It is the very road by which we have come out of captivity, and we have an obligation to those who are yet back in the old homestead of the race. But the first obligation is to prepare our own children that they will themselves, not only become the best possible men and women, capable of being the salvation of the America that was committed to us, but also help America to bless this sphere whose people around it share the light of the day with us every twenty-four hours. If we as a people—as fathers and mothers, as teachers, as pastors—do not see in the childhood and youth of America, not only the greatest, most precious asset, but also the means of our saving America and of blessing the world, we shall be as blind and unhappy as Jonah.

The particular field of this study is the home field—America. The first obligation is to teach the child, whether trailing clouds of glory “from God who is our home” directly to a home in America, or coming as an immigrant child by way of some other land, to know the beauty, the grandeur, the miraculous productivity of this land; how the Almighty has prepared its wealth through hundreds if not thousands of millions of years; how the winds keep it swept clean; how the waters drain it; how these same winds bring the clouds to nourish it; and how the seasons in their ceaseless round bring seed-time and harvest. Before the newcomer child of native or immigrant comes to know the history which has given this land its soul he should come to know and love its wondrous beauty. I think that our physical geographies should not confine themselves to the facts of size and products, of winds and currents and the like, but should add and put first the beauty of America—of mountain, river, inland sea, prairie and plain. It would be a geography in which picture and verse would have place with statistical fact.

I once glanced through a collection of “Poems of Places,” edited by Longfellow, and I found suggestion of material for a physical geography of this sort. Maine, for example, is girded, not as prosaically as the bald definition of its boundaries intimates, but by “bays resplendent as the heaven, starred and gemmed by a thousand isles.” Vermont is not merely a State of so many square miles, contiguous to certain other States; it is a “glorious mother” clothed in a “robe of forest green . . . its brodered hem of wild flowers with feathery fern-fronds, light as air, fringing its borders.” Massachusetts is described by geographer John G. Whittier as “rough, bleak and hard, scant of soil, with yellow sands that are sands alone, her only mines those of ice and stone, yet on her rock and on her sand and wintry hills the schoolhouse stands and what her rugged soil denies the harvest of the mind supplies.” Connecticut has not only the things usually mentioned, but according to Fitz-Greene Halleck, “glorious splendors of sunset, cloud, rainbowed beauty of forest leaves”—with “health in her gales,” in autumn time “earth has no purer and no lovelier clime.” And a fragment of a sentence from Henry James gives a description of towering natural structures, far “above the Bronx” (at West Point), which add more than the towering skyscrapers to the eternally satisfying assets of the State of New York: “a cluster of promontories, of the lost classic elegance, overhanging vast receding reaches of river, mountain-guarded and dim, which took their place in the geography of the ideal, in the long perspective of the poetry of association, rather than in that of the State of New York.” But it is the geography of the real. It does belong to the State of New York even if this exile had carried it into the landscape of an ideal country. Indeed, the geography of our country is to let us see and possess these glories of promontory, of cañon, and of undrained marsh even. I have a memory of Sidney Lanier’s wide sea marshes of the far south with “their braided dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine”; “beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noonday fire.” And the geographers are the painters and poets and natural scientists, who often see beauties in the places obscure to other eyes or detect the odor of the incense that a flower burns in the wilderness behind the mountains, as the burning bush did for Moses, or now and then musicians who find a “mild September glow and even the clear October blaze” things “to play on the chords of memory with an art of their own.” Often I have thought of this transmutation of waves of sight into waves of sound, making a mighty national song, to be heard above Plato’s music of the spheres.

One might travel across the continent finding new wealth of beauty at every step, through the South with Timrod, Lanier, Haynes, and even on the unbroken levels of the prairies of the Middle West and the plains with their silences, as one’s geography would show when enriched by a few sentences from Bryant, Platt or John Hay or Hamlin Garland or Mark Twain or James Whitcomb Riley or Eugene Field or Meredith Nicholson or David Grayson or James Lane Allen (whose description of a Kentucky hemp field is worth far more than the year’s crop) or Mrs. Catherwood or Tarkington or Ade, or from any one of scores of those who know the heart of America between the two great mountain ranges.

Then, one following the “Oregon Trail” up and on through the mountains, that should be on every horizon, takes on such geographers as Albert Pike, Henry van Dyke, Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller, E. R. Sill, Bayard Taylor, John Muir; sees the “bright sierras lie a swaying line of snowy white, a fringe of heaven hung in sight against the blue base of the sky”; and finds at last the “glorious dwelling place” of Tamalpais, and the “gilded portal for sailing towards the Island of the Blest.”

It is such a land that every home child and every immigrant child should have in its sight, and not alone that rectangle crossed by lines of longitude and latitude (which we later in life find are “imaginary” after all) and dissected into vari-colored blocks of States, whose boundaries seem so hard and conspicuous that we are disappointed in after days that we cross them without a jolt of consciousness. Such a land and alone the enlargement of his little patch of it into a macrocosm of the same features, such a land that the home child and immigrant child will have it not only in his sight, but in his love, a land “precious in every stone,” so dear, as George Woodberry has written, that there’s “no little inch of all its broad domain but he would stoop to kiss and end his pain, feeling [its] lips make merry with his own,” a land that is indeed, as Katherine Lee Bates has written, “America the Beautiful.”

Nearly fifty years ago the Women’s Christian Temperance Union adopted a brief industrial creed, a creed that sounds as if it had been adopted within a decade. It runs: “We believe in a living wage, in an eight-hour day, in courts of conciliation and arbitration, in justice as opposed to greed of gain, in ‘peace on earth and good-will to men,’ and finally, we pledge ourselves to labor and to pray that all these principles, founded upon the Gospel of Christ, may be worked out in the customs of society and the laws of the land.”

What Are Our Young People Seeking?

By Rev. Samuel S. Drury, D.D.

Rector of St. Paul's School, Concord, New Hampshire

[NOTE: This article is from the collection of papers read at the Church Congress of 1922 which was published by the Macmillan Company and reviewed in THE CHRISTIAN WORK at the time. The book is called "The Influence of the Church on Modern Problems," and deals with Creedal Requirements, Christianity, The Second Coming of Christ, Psychoanalysis, Labor and the Church, Young Men and the Ministry, and Prayer.—EDITORS.]

DR. STEPHEN PAGET, in his latest volume of essays, delightfully describes an eminent Victorian named Mrs. Grundy. He regrets that the encyclopedia has called Mrs. Grundy a fictitious person, for he says that he knew her well in the later years of her life. You must understand that Mrs. Grundy is no longer living! "Within the limits of due formality," he says, "she was acceptable to children because of her dignity and her grave courtesy, but more because she never played down to them nor gushed over them. . . . She believed in original sin—and in grace, and her mind thus balanced was able to commend itself to children. She took children seriously, and I have to add that she found nothing amiss with corporal punishment. Once when a hare-brained young lady offered, in all seriousness, to read her hand, she exclaimed, 'My dear girl, what a gross and childish idea you must have of God.'" "It was pleasant," Dr. Paget adds, "to see this eminent Victorian. Always she seemed to be trying to think out the course of the future. What are we coming to? It is a fool's question when on a fool's lips; but it was not that on hers."

Let not the question, published for discussion this evening, "What are our young people seeking?" be a fool's question in this assembly. Simply to answer it, however accurately, will not lead us far. Should we not rather, in this study of manners and morals, ask, Why have we come to the present pass, and what is the way out again. The Christian moralist is rightly impatient of any mere anatomy lesson of things as they are, especially when they are bad. My only contribution to this theme can be: (a) to assess the actual wrong; (b) to locate the cause; (c) to suggest a regimen of remedy.

When the President of Princeton, in June, 1920, addressed his graduating class, he uttered these brave words:

"In our social relations we are weakly allowing ourselves to be ruled by the Goddess of Folly, slaves in her domain to the fashion of the hour. The modern dress, the modern dance and the modern music and modern manners of to-day are symptoms that indicate that somehow in this age we have lost our bearings and that the old values of life, once so highly prized, have been forgotten. There is the danger of a lessening, if not a loss, of the old-time reverence for womanhood. There is no longer an aura of mystery about the young woman of to-day, a mystery at once her defense and her glory; and whenever in the history of the race this divine prerogative of womanhood is lightly regarded or recklessly scorned, it has always proved a symptom of decadence far-reaching and disastrous. Every age of moral and spiritual progress in the history of any people has always been an age of chivalry, in which womanhood has been not only respected, but revered. To-day our illusions seem to be gone; everything is obvious; no word is left unsaid and no veil drawn."

The sigh of assent from all quarters following Dr. Hibben's declaration indicated a pent-up conviction that the manners of young people are known to be bad. Time would fail me to review the mass of responses to Dr. Hibben's words. They range all the way from the belligerent young man who cried, "We have been forced to live in the atmosphere of 'to-morrow we die' and so naturally we drank and were merry," to the bewildered parent who confesses in the "Morning Post" that he cannot guess what an avalanche of immorality may be upon us, when a toddling girl in the nursery addresses her father (said to be a very learned man, by the way) as "Old Bean." Surely here is a broad field for discussion, beginning with the shocking nursery salutation and ending with jazz, pocket flasks and a general disregard of the proprieties. What the members of the Church Congress are asked to consider are our young people seeking in their apparent revolt from the moral standards of that eminent Victorian who earnestly queried, "What are we coming to?" and in the wanderings of her last illness was heard to murmur, "I do wish that they wouldn't."

By our young people we mean people between the ages of sixteen and twenty-six. We must also mean all the people between those ages. This at once brings consolation, for both in manners and morals, we can count on the good-will of the majority. In discussing bad manners and possibly bad morals we are talking about the behavior of a minority. Never forget that! I am inclined to think the evil confined to a small minority. It were better, one would think, to spend our time in encouraging and feeding the steady-going, benevolent majority, as we neglect to do, rather than to share in any shocks over the doings of an outlandish few. When in an assemblage of the Episcopal Church we speak of "our young people," we must include all the young people who come, or should come, under our spiritual and social authority. Let no one think that by our young people we churchmen smugly mean the children of inherited or profiteering capital. We mean all the young people—those who toil in factories, those who purposefully go to early communion, those who work their way through college, those who labor on the land, those who pour into our cities before many of us are awake. The great majority of the whole decade from sixteen to twenty-six need not be called before our ethical judgment seat for any censure here. Indeed, let us censure nobody. That is so easy and so useless! Let us work for the new day, with no malice towards the young, with charity even for ourselves, the frivolous middle-aged.

Agreeing that some of our young people have drifted away (a very different thing from revolting, which means an organized and conscious denial) from the standards of a previous day, let us locate the cause. In passing we should note that there is no obligation for one age to conform to the code of a previous age. It may be that such standards are worn out and have lost their appeal. One good custom, or set of customs, may corrupt the world. The fact that the Puritan standards were once useful does not enshrine them as practicable for all time. Manners are bound to vary with the valuations set upon human accomplishment. The young women of Miss Austen's novels embroidered, discussed the merits of gentlemen and walked in the shrubbery (whatever that may be). The young women of to-day work hard at school (harder than their brothers), generally do some social work, and call a spade a spade. This comparison lies in the narrow compass of the leisure class—for the trouble we are discussing lies largely there, or originates there, at any rate. The two centuries produced different behavior, but who shall say that the modern girl is less really dependable and noble than the girl of an earlier day?

Two reasons for the alleged shocking behavior of the young people of our leisure or well-to-do class can be traced to the middle-aged people of the same class. There is nothing so provocative of misdemeanor as what we may call the shockability of older people. All common-sense leaders of youth realize the futility of being shocked. It simply adds fuel to the flame. A kindly woman of the world was entertaining a group of silly young people who tried their best, or their worst, to shock her. In desperation one ventured, "I suppose we shock you awfully." "Not at all," she replied, "but I think your technique is very bad." If oftener we denominated the fool a fool, instead of dignifying him by calling him a knave, we should sooner see him reform or at least subside. The best cure for folly is wholesome companionship. Much indecorum is a reaction from lonesomeness or the dread of being unpopular. Another cause of abandonment of previous standards is the fear of youth on the part of parents or middle-aged friends who truckle to the youngsters by removing those barrier customs which youth is surprised to have removed. What more pathetic figure in modern life than the ambitious mother or easy-going father who, fearful that the children will not be "successes," pander to the worst elements of a standardless set? While we can rely on the idealism of youth at twenty, we frequently fail to find idealism in the parents of youth at twenty. It is not so much that children revolt against their parents as it is that shilly-shally elders surrender to the Goddess of Folly and sacrifice their children on her altar.

Deeper still, we undoubtedly are suffering now from the after-effects of war. This is trite, but true. Sensible grown men, after they had done their bit, noticeably relaxed, either from nervous strain or from the deep laid instinct to offset gravity with levity. During the war it was generally agreed that the world owed the soldier a good time, almost on his own terms. No doubt this sentiment was lowering to morals, and in any case it justified the doctrine of a short life and a merry one. The strain and sacrifice of war justified personal selfishness. This theory has now been appropriated by young people who, having had no responsibilities in the war, claim its immunities. The minority we are discussing behave as though they were on short leave from first-line trenches, or from dressing stations under fire. They claim the privileges of high tension combatants. Their motto seems to be, "My pleasures, right or wrong."

And what of the remedy? Surely no one expects a quick and easy road to moral victory. Straight and narrow, in every age, is the way that leads to life. Perhaps it is manners only that are wrong; the apparent revolt may be only against transitory standards. We must guard against the deeper evil because manners are the protecting armor of morals, and when manners are abandoned the nature is rudely exposed. Serviceable manners every age must have, but even if manners alone were suffering, we shall not help our young people by merely treating symptoms. People who care, such people as are here to-night, must begin at the beginning and realize that when children in the second decade are neglected by the home, the school and the church, the result in the third decade will be a harvest of weeds. There is, of course, no conscious neglect of the young children on the part of parents, schools and pastors. Our fault lies in mistaking youthful docility and pleasant decorum for any real grasp on that stressful business of living which lies just ahead. Too often the children of privilege, in family, education and parish, suffer the experience of Topsy. The parent, the teacher and the pastor have no program. The children, like hungry sheep, look up and are not fed. We pass on to them rosy, vague ideals, but fail to provide them with things to do, little real lessons in domestic forbearance, little enterprises in burdenbearing. Our unpracticed counsels are like toy balloons—they lift nothing and soon explode. Hence we are ourselves responsible for the vanity and the aimlessness of the younger generation.

They are not seeking anything, this pathetic minority about whom we speak. They are neither revolting nor seeking. They are just drifting and greedily grasping whatever immediate pleasure presents itself. The vacuity of modern life, the amazing emptiness of the modern head, the undernourished state of the modern soul, these account for the gradual abandonment of the proprieties and principles. If you would drive out a devil, and keep it out, you must install an angel. To crush vulgarity, crush it with a masterful altruism. If we nourish the earlier years, when life expands and freedom comes, the temptations which ever skulk about the alluring prize of untainted youth will encounter a host of competing interests. This is a large matter and can only be hinted at here. Is it not true that we need, not so much leadership, that vague, flamboyant thing; but nourishment, that deep personal instruction which, as it grows, necessitates nobility and a keen charity? Given a boy or a girl, ingrained with a love of God; a hatred of sin, by reason of its personal and social sorrows; a vital dependence on sacramental grace; an intelligent vision of the needs of mankind; and have you not a nature so active that it will develop its own immunity to moral disease?

Manners are not our prime concern. The nourishment of deep conviction and consideration for others is. Moral principle buckles on its appropriate armor of protective manners. The unfed life is the drifting life. Malnutrition always produces abnormality. Feed the young who still look up, expecting nourishment. Give them definitely the deep things, definitely the real things, and they will develop a new and noble decorum for their new day. Well said the saint of old, "Love God and do as you please."

Every spring the Metropolitan Opera Company gives a series of performances in Atlanta, Georgia. In such decadent regions as Europe and the northern United States opera is regarded as a form of art. But apparently the lower house of the Georgia Legislature takes another view. It has passed a bill imposing a tax of $2,500 on each six performances of opera in cities of Georgia with more than one hundred thousand population and a tax of $1,000 for each six performances in smaller places. Does the Georgia House really think that music should be limited to pianos and victrolas?

The Four Chief Aims of the School

By Henry T. Hodgkin

[NOTE: This article is an extract from the recent striking book, "The Christian Revolution," by Henry T. Hodgkin, of London. (The George H. Doran Company.) Mr. Hodgkin is the secretary of the Friends Foreign Mission Society and author of "Lay Religion." "The Christian Revolution" will be reviewed at length in a future issue of this paper.—EDITORS.]

FOUR aims seem to me to stand out as the dominant ones in our general aim of making the school a powerful factor in the creation of a new world.

1. The school should help to develop the scholar along the lines of his own personality; it should help him to express himself, to direct his intuitions, to restrain what tends to destroy his best life, to co-ordinate his powers so that he may do well that creative work to which his nature calls him.

2. The school should help in passing on to the scholar the heritage of the past; it should make him alive to the meaning of the past for to-day, watchful to profit by the experience of others as well as by his own, a conscious partner in the processes through which men are moving on to some great goal, reverent towards the figures and achievements of the past without being fettered as he faces the future.

3. The school should help to equip the scholar to take his right place in the life of the community; it should show him how to use his freedom without encroaching on that of others, how to take his share in the production of the necessities of life or ministering to the community in useful ways; above all, it should help in giving him the spirit of service and co-operation so that he may want to work for and live at peace with his fellow-men.

4. The school should help to give the scholar true standards for judgment; it should aim to send him out not an uncritical absorber of all that he can pick up with the new powers he has acquired at school, but rather one who will choose the good and reject the evil and who will contribute not merely to the world's work, but to the creation of a public conscience.

For the fulfilment of all these aims the student should learn the art of relating his life, his thoughts, his hopes and ambitions to God his Father. Religion is not, in my view, a separate aim; the whole aim is religious, and, unless religion is the atmosphere of the school, "religious teaching" will be vain or even harmful.

The religious aim includes as its largest ingredient the deepening in the child of the instinct of love and service, the control of the instinct of acquisitiveness and domination. It is in the school that the child should begin to apply the principle of love to a wider society and one where, perhaps for the first time, he discovers that there are unfriendly persons in the world. By the use of co-operative methods, in the place of competitive ones, by checking the tendency to retaliate whenever an insult is offered and showing the child how, rather, to conquer by love, by forms of community service, above all by the example of patience and love, the teacher has an immense power in developing and directing the loving spirit in the child. Why do we encourage our boys to stand up and even to fight for their rights, when Jesus bids us turn the other cheek? Why, when war is so horrible a thing, do we teach our children to play at soldiers? Why does the school give military drill and teach history as a long series of bloody conflicts? To train men and women to live in love with all the world—this should be the dominating purpose of the school—for to live in love is to live with God who is love—and the one great need of our troubled humanity is more love, which means more loving persons.

How may the school fulfil these aims? To answer this question fully would be to write a whole treatise on education. A few thoughts may be thrown out in passing before we try to show the essential difference between the school for the Christian revolution and certain other types of schools with which we are familiar to-day.

The school where the first of our aims is followed will be one in which great care is taken not to overload the curriculum with set subjects, where time is given to study the individual, where there is a very large measure of freedom, where external punishment is used very sparingly if at all. "One must not be timid about the according of a full measure of freedom," writes a teacher of some experience in this matter. "On one occasion, back before the war, when my third form was flooded with new boys, I told them in the most deliberate tone that there was 'no possible hope of getting a punishment,' and I never knew the sternest of actual punishments produce a more healthy or a more lasting effect. This is the form in which in two terms there was not a single boy who did not work with real enthusiasm for nine-tenths of his time. There is something challenging in a strong and vigorous declaration of this perfect immunity from external pressure, but the same words could not have the same effect on a class doomed to sit silent while the master talked."

I am free to admit that this experience is not one to be always expected when a like course is taken, and very much depends on the personality of the teacher. At the same time I should maintain that there has been much greater danger of erring in the opposite direction and thinking that the cure for all forms of schoolboy disorder is punishment "to fit the crime." The great aim should surely be to have such a spirit in the school that the supposed need for punishment is eliminated. As the spirit of the school gets hold of the child he can be appealed to far more effectively in other ways. And this means that his own personality is being called out and that he is taking on the responsibility of making the school worthy of its reputation, which involves making himself a worthy member of it. In such a school each pupil is the special care of the teacher and is studied as a person with a view to his own proper development. It is a delight to talk over with a teacher at such a school the progress of the child one loves, for one finds how his strength and weakness are alike appreciated and how the treatment of him is not that of a case, but that of a person.

There will be ample room in such a school for initiative on the part of the scholars. The part of the teacher will often be to advise and watch sympathetically rather than to instruct. There will be a large amount of actual creative work, carpentry, handwork of various kinds, drawing, essay writing, calculated both to give the child scope to develop his bent and to reveal to the teacher the possibilities of his personality. The child will be encouraged to think things out for himself, and to learn the art of reflection instead of simply memorizing what others have discovered. Very much of what I am here saying has, of course, been said much more adequately in progressive educational writing. All I can hope to do is to insist on this tendency as of prime importance if the school is to prepare for the Christian revolution.

In regard to the second aim, it seems to me of great importance that history should be taught in the right way. I welcome, for example, the work of Mr. H. G. Wells, both as emphasizing the universal element, the contribution of every race and age to the making of society and also as emphasizing the deeper currents that have been affecting our common life rather than the surface episodes, wars especially, that get a quite disproportionate amount of attention in ordinary schools. History must be made the basis of thinking for the future, and here I should like again to quote from Mr. MacMunn's illuminating little volume: "If children are to be taught to look back to the past of the race, they should also be taught to exercise their imaginations on looking forward. If this were habitually done in all schools it is quite possible that it would have a definite effect in producing a more open-minded and progressive type of human being. . . . The eyes of a great boy look to the future of himself and his fellows, to a world in which beauty appears in the terms of wonderful change and progress, and not in the mumbling of old watchwords. He sometimes despises inordinately the past as he sees it now, because its claims are exaggerated in his hearing, but give him the chance to look into the vistas of the future, and the past will become to him a primitively beautiful thing, giving him fresh food for his dreams and inspiring his plans."

The cramming of historical facts, dates, details of battles, and so forth, especially for examination purposes, seems to have no relation to this aim. Even a young child can be given the "feel" of belonging to a great whole, though well directed study of the things about him, through a visit to a cathedral or a museum, for example. Life comes to have an immense significance; freedom is seen to have a relation to the development of a great purpose of unity, and not merely to an isolated aim. Such education helps a child to place himself, and so saves him from the pure individualism which a too exclusive attention to the first aim might produce. It need hardly be pointed out that the teaching of universal history should not be from a nationalistic point of view, as is so often the case. To this point we must return later. While these studies should help a child to relate himself to the past, they must not overawe him so that he accepts the past as his standard for the future. The attitude of mind in the teaching of history should ever be, "The best is yet to be."

The third aim may be very narrowly construed as a purely vocational training, making the child an efficient machine in the great world of industry. Of course, he should be trained to do his share of the world's work, but far more important is the spirit in which he does it. The school itself should be related to the community in such a way as to make each child feel, while already in school, that he is a useful member of society, and that it is a joy to rise to what is expected of him. The idea of co-operation within the school needs to be far more emphasized, children being encouraged to help one another in study and in constructive work. The development of the school as a community center (so ably carried out in such institutions as Hampton, Tuskegee, Oundle, Srinagar and many others) is a most important way of fulfilling this aim. Such experiments have by this time amply proved their value on general education principles, not only for specialized classes in the community. From our point of view, their unique service is that the school is thus related to the actual problem of creating a new world, and that the child's enthusiasm is early turned in this direction. He cannot be in such a school without gaining some conception of his life-work as a contribution to a great social end. There is, of course, very much in the actual teaching of the school that may serve the same purpose, but there is no doubt in my own mind that the actual relation of the school to the community is far more important than the kind of teaching given in the classroom. How to carry this out, especially in big cities, is a problem by no means fully solved, and awaiting the further experiment of such groups as I have described. Mr. Vallentine's school in Indianapolis, described in "Schools of To-morrow," seems to me to come nearer than any other of which I have knowledge towards solving it. It is a matter of special interest to me that a number of these schools, besides making a big contribution to general social welfare, are helping materially toward the solution of the "race problem." Of the school just referred to the authors say: "A visitor when leaving this school cannot fail to wish that such ventures might be started in all our great cities, indeed in any community where people need to be aroused to a sense of their needs, including the fact that if they are to contribute to the best interests of the community they must be taught how to earn a living, and how to use their resources for themselves and their neighbors, both in leisure time and in working hours."

The fourth of the aims stated above is the one which, in my view, is most easily lost sight of to-day. We must begin with the conviction that every child has an inward standard of values to which we can make our appeal with confidence, and it may well be that in some particulars that standard is more trustworthy than our own. Here, then, especially, do we need a real reverence for the child, a willingness to learn, a tender care lest we do injury to a deep inward sense of truth and rightness, which is nothing less than the divine witness in the child's heart. With this attitude we approach the task of seeking to strengthen the good impulses and to lead the child himself to question and reject the evil ones. It is certainly a fact that many children reach the school after having already learned to reject some of their own instincts of good. Perhaps the natural friendliness toward children of different class or color has been interfered with; perhaps the readiness to share his good things with others has been checked and he has been started along the pathway of thrift and even greed; perhaps his standard of truth has been violated by what he has heard at home. The task of the teacher will then be to bring him back to the inward sense of right—no easy one if other influences are constantly working in another direction.

Much of our education seems to me to be like opening windows without helping the child to know when it may be wise to shut them against a disease-laden miasma. We multiply his points of contact with the world, but we give him so little help in knowing which to cultivate. He can read the daily newspaper, but he cannot tell truth from falsehood, the catch-words of a party from the principles of a true social order; he can go to the "movies" and understand what he sees, but he has no sense of the difference between sensational melodrama and real tragedy; he is more than ever at the mercy of the quack and the wire-puller, for he can understand their jargon without being able to detect its hollowness. It is because there is a public educated enough to be exploitable that the schemer of the press or of the public platform is able to exploit his enthusiasm and idealism so mercilessly. In the same way clever statesmen, using the laws of mob psychology, can rush the Church or the general public into a war, not because they have not good instincts, but because they have not been trained to see the real implications of what they believe, and to test the specious arguments by them. The school that prepares for the Christian revolution seeks to develop in each scholar the real power of independent judgment. The essay, the free debate, natural contact between teacher and pupil, the discussion of public events, are some of the more obvious ways in which this can be done.

Religious Education in the Secondary Schools

IN anticipation of this Educational Number, the editors of THE CHRISTIAN WORK addressed the following questions to the principals of a few secondary schools.

How much time should be given to religious training and the development of Christian character in our schools?

What are you doing along these lines for the pupils in your school?

The answers speak for themselves.

It seems to me that in any school worth mentioning, religious training and development of Christian character should go on all the time—not through set hours and exercises, but through living example in the faculty and their dealings with their pupils, and through the standards of thought and conduct constantly promoted in the school life. We try to live our religion at Briarcliff in the gracious, courteous, sincere approach to whatever task or problem each hour presents.

In addition to this, all students meet in classes for Bible study once a week, they attend church services on Sundays, and a daily prayer service in the school. The principal gives a talk on Sunday evenings on ethical and religious themes. But the great thing is the daily practise of religion without which the mere teaching loses vitality.

It seems to me that the development of Christian character in all our schools ought to be the important part of the work of education.

Here at Mount Hermon every student is required to take courses in Bible study as long as he remains in the school. Regular required chapel services are held four days in the week and twice on Sunday. There are voluntary meetings conducted by the students themselves and voluntary classes on Sunday, at which the attendance has been always good. Following the direction of the founder of the school, Dwight L. Moody, the object in our Bible classes is to teach students the Bible rather than about the Bible, and all this in the development of Christian character.

H. F. CUTLER, Principal.

Mount Hermon School, Mount Hermon, Massachusetts.

Religious training and the development of Christian character is a constant, or should be a constant, concern in the daily life of a church boarding school. The problem is not reducible to number of recitation periods per week devoted to Bible classes or "Sacred Studies." In a school where there is a daily chapel exercise, which all attend, and where house prayers are conducted in the evening, there is a constant attempt to make religion a normal ingredient of a man's life. In a boarding school, therefore, the attention given to religious training and the development of Christian character (to repeat your own phrase) cannot be measured by the amount of time definitely apportioned in the curriculum to studying about religion or the Bible.

Such studies, however, should have the status of secular lessons. They should be marked, and the marks should count on the report. If, however, scholars recite in Latin four times per week and in Bible studies once, it is not fair to allow the weekly mark in Bible studies to count as much as the mark in Latin. That would mean overemphasis and a false valuation. It is necessary to note this seeming technicality, in cases where religious instruction receives a mark which effects a general average.

Every emphasis should be placed on Christian character and its development—not as a thing by itself, but as the basis for other phases of education. The pupil is not now a student, now an athlete, and now a Christian. The problem is to develop so vital a religious life that our pupils will be Christians in the school room and Christians on the field.

What Constitutes News?

Mr. Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press Association, and an experienced authority on this debatable question, is quoted by Mr. Bruce Barton in the July number of "The American Magazine" as saying that the biggest piece of news for each of us is seeing our own name in print. Next, we like to read about people we know, events we have witnessed, and dynamic personalities. Since the "we" in this instance no doubt refers to that rather ambiguous personality generally referred to as "average reader," it is interesting to discover through the eyes of a newspaper editor just what he looks like.

The Recent Revolution in Bulgaria—An Explanation

By Rev. D. N. Furnajieff

Pastor of the Evangelical Church, Sofia, Bulgaria

THE Agrarian Party, of which Mr. Alex. Stambolisky was the leader, came to power in October, 1919. No other party could receive the confidence of the voters that year, and none other could come to power so fittingly after the political situation created by the war. The bourgeois parties had tried their fortune in war and failed, every one of them. The war gods have been decidedly averse to giving Bulgaria any favors, even when, by common consent, she was right. The only policy left to Bulgaria was obedience to the dictates of the conquerors in the war. Hers was not to reason why; hers was but to obey or die.

Naturally, the peaceful population called up a new party to rule them. That was the Agrarian Party, which did not have any share in the responsibilities of the war. It was Mr. Stambolisky who dared to warn King Ferdinand bluntly against entering the war and that particularly on the side of the Central Powers. He spoke as the representative of the Agrarian population. As such he warned the King that going into the war might cost him his throne, and may be his head. Turning to him with pomp and pride like a Louis the Fourteenth, Ferdinand said: "Mr. Stambolisky, if I should lose my head, I am an old man, but you look out for your head, for you are a young man."

The annals of Bulgarian history will certainly put to the credit of the government of Mr. Stambolisky measures and policies that have greatly profited the country. Bulgaria was readily accepted in the League of Nations; her diplomatic relations with the Great Powers and with her immediate neighbors were improved and confidence remarkably restored; the reparations debt, fixed by the Treaty of Neuilly, Paris, was reduced nearly five times, which goes to show that in the framing of the Treaty greed ran away with cool judgment and due justice. Also there are internal measures for which the government deserves honor. It is a well known fact that of the defeated countries in the last war, Bulgaria is the only one that has faithfully and punctually fulfilled her Treaty obligations. These facts have significance and reflect credit on the Agrarian government.

And yet, the government had to fall and that suddenly and with a crash. Mr. Stambolisky anticipated the revolt and had provided himself with a bodyguard and the government with a volunteer army ready for every eventuality and able to put down any revolt. Something was wrong, or rather, things went wrong, and the change had to come.

Imagination has furnished the press with reasons and explanations, and that quite naturally. Knowing that Macedonia is Bulgarian in the vast majority of its population, some imagine that the reason for the fall of the government is the disappointment of the people that Bulgaria, at the Lausanne Conference did not reacquire the lost territory of Macedonia. Others conjecture that the uprising is due to the failure of the Powers to guarantee to Bulgaria a free outlet to the Aegean Sea, which they call a failure of the government. On the contrary, Bulgaria has now a case against the Powers of Europe, for they have laid upon her many obligations by the Treaty, and are not willing to fulfil the only favor to her specified in the same Treaty.

Still others see in this revolution "a temporary victory for the militarists" and an attempt to thrust aside the Peace Treaty with its burdens. That is also imaginary. Bulgaria is both disarmed and demilitarized. Such an act on her part would be suicidal, and all the people realize it fully.

The fall of Mr. Stambolisky's government is a purely internal matter. To begin with, he himself was a strong personality, of absolute self-confidence, of very short experience or no experience as a statesman, strenuous, independent, ambitious, but erratic. The ascent to a high position is commonly, step by step, while Mr. Stambolisky came to the highest position in government all of a sudden. He started well, but ended disastrously. He rose up suddenly, but went down also suddenly.

Some of the concrete reasons for the fall of the Agrarian government are:

First, Mr. Stambolisky carried on an incessant and unscrupulous war against all the intelligentsia of the land; professors, teachers, judges, lawyers and even students were mere idlers in his view. All of that class, therefore, were against him. He set to work on some very much needed reforms of the National State Church and the lordly monasteries and monks, but his clumsy and rough handling of the Church grouped almost the whole clerical body against him and his government.

Secondly, Mr. Stambolisky was too autocratic a premier in democratic Bulgaria. In his own cabinet he could not tolerate any member of independent views and policy. Such ministers he either forced to resign or expelled by a vote of his party. Recently he appointed as the minister of war a young man who was his former private secretary, because he would obey orders. This shows how poor a psychologist Mr. Stambolisky was. The effect upon the leaders in the army was to group them together in a united endeavor to free themselves from such indignity and humiliation.

Thirdly, he would not and did not tolerate opposition to his administration and legislation. But opposition was to be expected. He was determined to rule without opposition; and here he was indiscreet again, and committed "an error of judgment." In order to keep the rustics dominating over the city population, he conceived that he must keep up quarrels, violent disputes and hatred between them. To create the feeling and practise of charity and consideration between people is a stupendous task, but to make them hate and fight one another is an easy matter. So Mr. Stambolisky was eminently successful in that ignoble ambition of his.

Lastly, the former premier was not fair toward King Boris and never appreciated his nobleness of character and devotion to his people. What a marvelous patience King Boris showed toward his prime minister! Stambolisky regarded the King as an insignificant factor, and himself as all-significant. He was the tyrant in the country.

Surely these are not a "thin excuse" for the Bulgarian revolution.

The new ministers have undertaken a stupendous responsibility at this juncture of the nation's history. Not a member of the new cabinet has been a prominent factor in party politics before. They are all new in their responsible positions. But they are all good and conscientious men, and the Anglo-Saxon diplomats in Sofia seem to cherish good hopes for the future of Bulgaria.

Is revolution possible without bloodshed? Relatively speaking, yes. Reports from Athens, Belgrade and Bucharest intimate that there was fighting and bloodshed on the street of Sofia, that counter-revolutionists were marching upon Sofia, that there was civil war, martial law, strict censorship, and so on, and so on, but London reports said, "Confirmation of these reports cannot be obtained," and London ought to know. The American Minister in Sofia, Mr. Charles Wilson, reports to Washington that things in Sofia are quiet, that all administrative offices continue to function in a normal way, and that excellent discipline exists everywhere. Moreover, the experienced and prudent Sofia correspondent of the Associated Press reported both the city and country tranquil. These witnesses are sufficient.

Bulgaria of to-day asks for charity and opportunity to work out its own salvation. A nation of earnest and hard workers, loyal to its country and faithful to its obligations, deserves confidence and fair play; while its present rulers, pre-eminently King Boris, will duly justify every confidence placed upon them.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—IV.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

IV. COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND THE UNION SHOP

It is usually a crisis, often a strike, that gives rise to a local labor organization and to the demand for "collective bargaining." A strike is frequently the means employed by organizers to bring about "recognition" and the negotiation of a work contract. Because it is a stock demand of labor unions, collective bargaining has been commonly identified in the public mind with the strike itself. This is quite erroneous. Broadly speaking, collective bargaining is labor's substitute for the strike. It is true that an industry in which collective bargaining is well established often has a serious strike. Yet the substitution of conference and agreement for strife and recurrent interruptions of work which has been brought about through trade union agreements is one of the most significant things in industrial history. Look at the coal industry, for example. Most people have been more mindful, not unnaturally, of the recent crisis in the anthracite coal industry than of the twenty years of comparative peace that preceded it, due to the orderly workings of conference and contract. The Hart, Schaffner and Marx firm in Chicago, whose future was threatened by a disastrous strike a dozen years ago, have found their salvation in a trade agreement with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers which has been as great a boon to the company as to the workers themselves.

It must be recognized frankly, of course, that collective bargaining may exist without labor unions. Wherever an individual or a committee negotiates with an employer or group of employers in the name of a group of employees with reference to their working contract collective bargaining exists. Indeed, many employers admit the justice of some method of conference and agreement who nevertheless reject the trade union form. They object to dealing with the "walking delegate," as the business representative of the union is often called. They insist on dealing only with their own employees and independently of an organization of "outsiders." The whole scheme of "employee representation" has been worked out from this point of view. There is much to be said for it, so much, in fact, that it is important to look carefully into labor's objections. As a modification of straight trade union bargaining, calculated to make it more elastic and to bring workers and management in the individual plant into closer relationship, without interfering with union prerogatives, labor leaders can find little plausible objection to such a plan. The need for some local machinery of conference which can be used by management and workers in the individual plant is recognized by wise labor leaders. The plan of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers just referred to makes full provision for conference and arbitration within the establishment. But the much talked-of "shop committees," when devised by employers as a substitute for trade union bargaining (and labor leaders always suspect that that is what they mean in the long run), labor regards with determined hostility. The reasons for this hostility are very definite.

In the first place—leaving out purely selfish reasons based on personal prerogatives and ambitions and vested organization interests, which are found in all bodies, even ecclesiastical—labor objects to employee representation without union recognition because it precludes labor solidarity; in fact, it means the end of the labor movement. Many employers appear honestly to believe that the labor movement serves no good end. It is hard for them to see any virtue in a loyalty that conflicts with a worker's feeling of responsibility to his employer. To the labor mind the matter appears quite otherwise. There are higher loyalties and lower loyalties. A man's first loyalty, to labor's way of thinking, is to his fellows—the group with whom he shares his life and with whom his destiny is bound up. To suffer a disruption of that relationship labor considers fatal to its permanent interests. The maintenance of a labor press and of legislative representatives, the development of labor research and other indispensable features of labor activities to-day are clearly impossible without compact and coherent organization. Labor is frankly, proudly class-conscious, not in the crude sense of disregarding the interests of the general public, though the workers sometimes do that, but in the sense that labor, as such, has interests which it considers compatible and even identical with those of society as a whole.

A characteristic feature of the program of the British Labor Party, published in the memorable document of 1917, was its insistence that the Labor Party is a national party, a party with an inclusive social program. It was even insisted that labor, in political power, would safeguard the cultural interests of the nation as the older parties had failed to do. The accuracy of the prediction is not our present concern; the point is that it was an important element in labor's consciousness.

In the second place, labor leaders are hostile to non-union forms of collective bargaining because the interests of the local working group are not sufficiently guaranteed by it. Leadership is an important factor, and just as the employer may engage as his attorney the ablest representative he can find, or combine with his fellows to maintain publicity experts and lobbyists, so labor wants freedom to seek and maintain on a large scale the ablest representatives and leaders that the craft or industry affords. And if all effort at skilful bargaining fails, the union has the resources of a great national organization to back up its claims, while a local group standing by itself has but slender resources at best. And thus limited, it faces an utterly unequal contest with powerful corporations which commonly maintain a surplus large enough to weather a labor struggle, which have at their command the resources in leadership and prestige of strong employers' organizations, and not infrequently the backing of powerful financial interests as well.

It is probably quite safe to say, however, that labor will offer no permanent opposition to democratic management devices within the individual plant if the interests of the labor movement as a whole are not jeopardized by it. At least, there is increasing recognition on the part of labor that non-co-operation and the methods of combat can never permanently further the interests of any group.

But what about the union shop, or as employers commonly call it, the closed shop? In the first place, it may be said that labor quite frankly defends it. It is not an invariable feature of labor demands, and there are organizations that seem to have little interest in it. But broadly speaking, the union shop is a part of the labor philosophy of our time. It is a hard matter to understand labor's position on this point. The closed shop, maintained by the threat of a walkout whenever a non-union worker walks in, is so obviously despotic that very few people outside the labor movement have any sympathy with it. Why does labor cling to the closed shop principle?

Well, first of all, and primarily, because labor has been so thoroughly disillusioned with what is called the "open shop." Employers in general insist on this principle, but they seldom define it clearly enough to indicate anything as to labor policy. It ordinarily means that while a person may belong to a union and hold his job, he may not promote union organization without incurring the management's displeasure as an "agitator." When the employer says, "We ask no questions as to a man's affiliations—political, religious or otherwise"—labor takes him to mean that so long as a workman takes his union membership no more seriously or significantly than many a man to-day seems to be taking his church membership, all will be well. In other words, the employer is quite willing that the men should belong to a union, provided they don't make any use of it. Labor feels that the "open shop" implies just this attitude. Therefore, labor has found that where the open shop obtains the influence of the union is likely to disappear. Impatient with the whole régime, labor leaders fall back on a straight union shop as the only protection against disintegrating influences.

Secondly, and quite frankly again, labor experiences a great deal of difficulty in maintaining organization discipline. The mere collection of dues is a task that often proves too great, especially where the membership is heterogeneous. To organize workers of many nationalities and different tongues and keep them up to their financial obligations is no small undertaking. The closed shop is a device by which the employer aids the union in its hardest task. The "check-off" in the contract of the United Mine Workers by which the operators deduct the worker's union dues from his pay envelope and turns it over to the union treasurer solves what is perhaps the greatest single problem of the organization. If membership in the union is a condition of employment, the union is spared a task of disciplining and "evangelizing" within the shop that taxes the resources of the strongest organization.

These considerations are made the basis of some of the bitterest attacks by employers upon labor unions. They insist that if the union cannot maintain itself on its own merits it has no right to demand the employer's aid in raising funds. This argument is plausible and not without force, yet if applied to all enterprises, religious and social, which depend upon a subsidy because the people they are undertaking to serve do not adequately support them, this reasoning would probably doom many such enterprises, not excepting some of our most approved "down-town" churches. Right or wrong, labor has its own sense of performing a social mission. In America the movement is only partially established and is all but overwhelmed by an incoming tide of "cheap" labor, alien in tongue and alien in ideals and living standards. Perhaps, granted a sincerity of aim and purpose on the part of organized labor, the analogy of the "down-town" church is not far from accurate.

But labor advances another argument for the closed shop which runs like this: The union carries the worker's interests and fights his battles. It protects him from overwork and secures for him a better compensation. In order to do this the union must maintain an ample treasury. Bargaining takes time, requires paid leaders and involves travel, publicity, and sometimes litigation. Obviously, if some of the workers in a shop are held responsible for their share of this expense in the form of dues and others are allowed to escape the obligation a serious demoralization will result. Labor leaders say that the union shop is a means of equalizing responsibility and of insuring that if any man will not pay his debt, neither shall he work—at least, not there! There is no doubt that this position is held in the greatest seriousness by labor unionists, and is justified in their minds on ethical grounds.

It ought to be added that a compromise position has been worked out and found mutually acceptable in some industrial situations, namely, the preferential shop. By this plan the employer agrees to employ only union members so long as the union can supply them, but beyond that point he is not bound. Where this plan obtains it is probably always taken for granted that the newcomers who are non-members will be enrolled by the union within a reasonable time. The preferential shop is maintained by the Hart, Schaffner and Marx agreement.

From every point of view the consequences of the struggle over collective bargaining are serious in the extreme. In principle it has been accepted by eminent employers, by great civic and ecclesiastical bodies, by the Government, particularly in war time, and notably by the Second National Industrial Conference held during the Wilson administration. But in practice, American industry as a whole is still without adequate provision for conference and negotiation between management and workers. In consequence, multitudes of employers are still depending upon underground methods to learn the aims and purposes of their employees, while labor counters with similar tactics. The net result is constant suspicion and bitterness. In fact, the industrial situation is virtually one of intermittent warfare. One cannot say that collective bargaining has been a success wherever it has been tried, but it is probably safe to say that where it has been undertaken sincerely and with mutual goodwill it has immeasurably improved industrial relations.

Distinguished American Christians in Hungary

A FEW days ago a meeting was held in Budapest which, I think, will be a memorable one in the history of the Hungarian Reformed Church. There were not more than twenty Hungarian Christians present, but these Hungarians were more or less representative men. The Hungarians had the privilege of welcoming two distinguished Americans—Dr. Beach and Dr. Good, representing American Calvinistic Christianity and especially the Presbyterian ideals of which the Hungarian Reformed Church is the most easterly exponent.

The important question, How the American Christians could and should help the bleeding and torn Hungarian Reformed Church, was discussed. The American guests took part in the discussion, made important declarations in behalf of their respective churches, and gave advice on this and on that question. Their advice has been very much appreciated and the resolutions which have been passed show that at last the first things have been put in the first place.

It was unanimously voted that the Hungarian Christians should combine their forces to start an evangelistic campaign, and the American brethren promised to assist us in our efforts by prayer and by raising money for the necessary assistance for traveling expenses and for the salary of two or three permanent secretaries. I am very glad that such a resolution has been passed and I will tell the readers of THE CHRISTIAN WORK why. Because I saw such a movement forty years ago and as the evangelistic movement which was started then became stronger enlightened Christians more and more saw that our Church is in need of being evangelized, and that it was worth while to strain every nerve to revive her. The Hungarian Reformed is a great church, the great majority of Protestants in our country belonging to it. This great church fell into decay in the eighteenth century, but has yet about two million souls under her sway. We thought that it was our duty not to found a new church, but to renew and vitalize the old one. Now we are glad that so many Americans helped us, not by money, but by prayers, by personal work and by loving sympathy. Such men were Dr. Good, Mr. Mott, Dr. Clark, and I call attention to the fact that a noble-minded American lady, Miss Reynolds, helped us, and many others assisted us in pre-war times.

Then the war came, and after the war many other questions became prominent. I do not say that these questions, the humanitarian questions, the professor and minorities question, the question with regard to the Hungarians living in America, the question of fraternization among the churches, are not important. On the contrary, I agree with those who say that these questions are very important.

Take the humanitarian question. Before the war I always maintained that the work in Hungary must be self-supporting. Now, I say that we must have also material help for a few years. But I say even now that we must try by and by to become self-supporting again. The gospel of and the life through Jesus Christ is the chief thing. This is the paramount question, and if after renewed evangelistic efforts the life of hundreds of thousands will be richer in heavenly treasures, then the time will come, and must come, when we shall be self-supporting again. So every other question must be subordinated to the paramount question. Take the Protestant minorities question, which is akin to the question of friendship among the nations in southeastern Europe. Real friendship blossoms only on the tree of the Gospel of Christ.

Now, I will not make this report unduly long. Therefore, I only touch the other important resolutions passed at the above mentioned meeting. It was resolved that the men who were present and who are all progressive men, appreciating positive Christianity, but hating dead formalism, should try by love and friendly overtures to win also their more conservative brethren for the great idea of the evangelistic campaign. I also mention briefly that besides Dr. Beach and Dr. Good there have been in Hungary other American friends, too, namely, Dr. Brown in 1920, and Mr. Milner, Mr. Laky, Dr. Schaeffer, Dr. Clark and Dr. Gillespie this year, with whom we have had invaluable conferences. The work of all these dear and distinguished brethren prepared the way for the meeting in which the idea of winning Hungary for Jesus Christ took definite form. May the Lord bless all these brethren and also those who sent them.

Budapest.

DR. ALADAR SZABO.

One hundred of the business men of St. Paul have agreed that they will give any National Guardsman in their employ fifteen days' leave of absence each year with pay, for the purpose of attending camp, and will not cut the guardsman's vacation on account of his camp attendance. They have agreed also that they will make up the difference between their employees' regular wages and what they receive in National Guard pay when the guardsmen are called into active service, and, other things being equal, will favor guardsmen in employment. Such a policy certainly should help the National Guard. Why should we not have a Church Guard, men who would go off for a week or two of earnest study in order to be able to do better work in connection with the Church and who might receive such a leave of absence as the St. Paul employers propose to give to the National Guardsmen?

Two Outstanding Books Dealing With Education*

JUST as this educational number of THE CHRISTIAN WORK goes to press two remarkable books come to our desk, President Seelye's History of Smith College and A Mother's Letters to a Schoolmaster.

Dr. Seelye was president of Smith College from its beginning in 1875 until 1910 and has been in close association with it ever since. No one has ever been the college itself more than President Seelye was for those thirty-five years to 1910. The history stops with the end of his term at 1910, but he might well have told the story to the present day. At the beginning Dr. Seelye was about all there was to the college. Had anyone asked in those early days, what is Smith College, he might well have answered, "Dr. Seelye and College Hall." Dr. Seelye was the old type of college president. He knew all the students intimately, was interested in their personality and their ambitions, was intimate friend and counselor of all, and believed that the president was pastor, teacher and companion as well as administrator and executive. And yet he was very successful in the office of head of a great institution. He was modern, too, in the truest sense, leading in educational development and doing much to influence the course of education in all the women's colleges. Under his presidency Smith grew to be one of the foremost colleges for women in the world, ranking with any college both in scholarship and educational scope. Dr. Seelye is very modest in his history when it comes to his own efforts, and it is because of this that we say these things. He was Smith in its beginning and he was its guiding spirit and controlling hand to the end.

This detailed history will have great interest to many outside of the Smith fellowship, for incidentally it is the history of higher education in America. The beginning of higher education for women was not without its difficulties. Dr. Seelye quotes from "The Nation" of February 17, 1876, a most stinging rebuke of the founders of Smith and which intimates that the young ladies would be much better off in some hall "attached to the older universities and obtaining a share in their instruction and the use of their standards without resorting to the device called 'coeducation'." Money came slowly at first, but what was most important students came in large numbers and President Seelye took care of them somehow. We imagine he did most of the teaching himself at first, although he soon drew such great teachers as Professors Henry M. Tyler and M. Stuart Phelps about him. (It is interesting to know that the first commencement address was given by President Eliot and the commencement poem was read by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.) Soon afterwards such well-known scholars as Professors John B. Clark, Charles D. Hazen and Irving Wood were added to the faculty. Later women teachers were added, but Smith College has always had a large number of strong men upon the faculty. In three years Smith had two hundred students, and its enrolment has rapidly grown with every year until now it is over two thousand. The expansion of the curriculum has kept pace with those in the leading universities for men and the entrance requirements have always been the same as those at Yale, Harvard or Princeton. President Seelye also dwells upon the faithful service the trustees rendered through those early years, some of them giving much of their time to the upbuilding of the college. It is interesting to learn that Sophia Smith in her first will directed that the college should be located at Hatfield. She was persuaded to write a second will locating it at Northampton. It is also interesting to note that the will contains the following words: "Sensible of what the Christian religion has done for my sex, and believing that all education should be for the glory of God and the good of man, I direct that the Holy Scriptures be daily and systematically read and studied in said college, and without giving preference to any sect or denomination, all the education and all the discipline shall be pervaded by the spirit of evangelical Christian religion." President Seelye was always true to this request.

"A Mother's Letters to a Schoolmaster" make decidedly lively reading. Revolutionary is a mild term for them. The boy Peter does not like school and the mother tells the principal why—tells him in very plain language. She then develops her own idea of education at some length and in considerable detail, illustrating it with some charts and diagrams. It is all Peter's education, although we fear Peter is an imaginary boy and we are quite sure "Mother" is one who has gone deeply into the whole theory of education and her pleading often sounds like that of the professional educator. The book is, of course, a plea for education of children along the lines of their experience rather than by scholastic drill. Peter is interested in a thousand things, but hates his studies so that he plays truant. Of course, the old question will assert itself, and with some show of reason we believe as to whether or not the sending of Peter right straight back to school and setting him right down to his distasteful arithmetic or Latin, and setting him down fairly hard, would not have been the best education possible. We are still wondering even after reading this remarkably challenging book if education does not consist in training the mind to do whatever is put before it, whether one likes it or not. That is life—and is not education for life? And will educating a child simply through the channels he loves to travel and by the experiences he delights in be the best training for a life where he has got to do many hard and uninteresting things? Most men have to spend half their time at hard, difficult, uninteresting tasks. Hard discipline has been their greatest friend. We have read this book with profoundest interest. Every parent should read it. It contains many

Abraham, a Blessing to the Whole World

GEN. 12:1-4; 18:17, 18; 22:15-18.

"In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."—
Gen. 12:3.

TWELVE out of the fifty chapters of Genesis, nearly a quarter of the book, are occupied with the life of Abraham. Fortunately, it is not necessary to have the entire narrative in mind in order to get Abraham's message to our time. For the story in all its parts is not easy to handle. Continually we have to remind ourselves that we are back in primitive times, where sense and circumstance are quite barbaric; an age, for example, familiar with human sacrifice; to which the story of Abraham's attempted offering of Isaac fits in like a key to a lock.

However, we do not have to authenticate or explain each incident in order to discover a noble and heroic figure. Abraham towers above his time and place like a great rock above desert sand. At the misty dawn of historic times he stands out, separate, inspiring, symbolic. He is the great progenitor, not only of a chosen people, but of all who, like him, go forth carrying blessing to the world. When first we come upon him, as he emerges from the list of names that crowd the eleventh chapter of Genesis, an independent, self-determining and forth-putting man, Abraham reveals three striking characteristics which are developed in his biography thereafter; these taken together give him his unique distinction and constitute his unfading example.

First of all, he believed in God; not in gods, but in God. Moving out from a pagan background, from all the traditions and customs that belonged to its civilization, he stands free of their corruption and their folly, revealing the beauty of manhood whose faith is in a righteous, true and merciful God. We are not, of course, to suppose that he had a full conception of God such as has come to us through the Christian revelation, or even through the vision of the great prophets of Israel. The influence of his pagan antecedents and of the religious formulas with which he had been familiar beyond doubt clung to him as he went forward. Indeed, the narrative makes clear that such was the case. His prayers to God; the outcropping here and there of superstition; the reasoning by which he persuades himself as to what God may think or do, all make clear that Abraham's religious life began under primitive and pagan influences. He shows the marks of the religion of his early time, but he shows even then his revolt from it; the motive power of a higher vision, the clarifying of religion to him until it had become a new religion. His faith in God is not a formal or conventional thing; not a matter of maintaining familiar rites and ceremonies, of doing what he had seen others do or had been brought up to do. Going into a far and new country, he does not fancy, like the men of his time, that he shall find a new god, the god of the land; one of those little, localized deities with which his age swarmed, till each hill and valley had its own tutelary spirit. That idea seems gone from Abraham, who, wherever he went and with whomsoever he came in contact, held himself unhesitatingly as the servant of the God who had called him into his new life.

At each stage of the journey he builds an altar and worships this God whom he is following; at Bethel, at Mamre, at Moriah. Sprinkled over this foreign and pagan land of Canaan, wherever you find the trail of Abraham's steps, as he moved up and down in his nomad wanderings, you find altars to the God whom he felt was everywhere to be found, worshiped and followed. If we note that some of Abraham's behaviors hardly square with the worship of a true and righteous God, if he seems on occasion to stoop to duplicity or to rely on superstition, we can only remind ourselves how little way he had come from the barbaric past that was his heritage.

We may perhaps allay any doubts as to the genuineness of his religion or the glory of his undertaking if we admit that some elements of superstition or of inconsistency, some baser alloy often mars the full purity of our Christian faith even to-day. Despite the lapses, we have to bow before the strength and motive power of a worthy religion as it shaped Abraham's life. In all his shifts of place and of fortune, before every new problem, in the midst of every emergency, he takes himself to God; he seeks for guidance; he offers himself to serve the divine will as it shall be revealed to him. Through all Abraham rests upon the promises, even in the midst of their seeming impossibility and growing apprehensions of their failure holds superbly to his confidence that God will fulfil His word.

However repugnant to us is the story of his attempted sacrifice of the son on whom hung, humanly speaking, every hope of the promised fatherhood and the pledged family of many nations; however hard it may be for us to conceive that Abraham should have thought God would be pleased with such a sacrifice, or that he could serve a merciful God by slaying his only child, at least we cannot help feeling a thrill of admiration for a man who could so surrender his whole life and fortune to the will of God in calm belief that he could trust Him to do what was right and best. To the end of time there can be no stronger exhibition of a simple, absolute and determining faith than Abraham exhibited in holding fast through his long and shifting life to Him who had called him forth.

A second characteristic of Abraham's life was that he went forth not knowing whither he went. That is of course to a degree what every emigrant does. On any day you will find them in this country; at New York, those who have come from the cities of Europe, and at San Francisco, those from the cities of the Far East; men who are bringing their families and their possessions to find a new dwelling-place in this land of opportunity and hope. They are risking their all in the venture. They show courage, purpose, devotion that mark them out from their fellows in the home land. On the whole the emigrant is usually an exceptional man, superior in qualities that make for success.

In a sense, too, every one thus sets out upon the day's round of life, going forth not knowing whither he goes. We cannot see the end from the beginning even of a day. We do not know what is before us; in the store, in the school, or in the shop. We cannot determine ahead just what we are to accomplish or what is to befall. Every man's life and every day of his life are to a large extent a venture of faith. But all those goings forth into the unknown are small and commonplace as compared with Abraham's setting forth from Haran to find his life in Canaan. A land of unknown people, strange conditions! What should he find; what places would be open to him; how could he relate himself in language, life and religion to the different and possibly hostile races among which he should come? All this was a closed book to him. It is one thing for a man from Italy to-day to come to these shores where his countrymen have been coming for generations, whence reports have been going back that make fairly clear the nature of the venture; or, again, one thing for you or me to set out upon a day uncertain what it will bring, but with the assurances of yesterday and the experiences of the past all giving us a sense of homelikeness and continuity to life; and it is quite another matter to make such a mighty wrench as Abraham undertook when he went out not knowing whither he went.

These words, which describe literally and physically the quest upon which he entered, describe also figuratively all that was involved in it; not only his ignorance as to the places and people, the manners and customs which he was to find, but as to just what he would do in the midst of these new conditions; what attitude he should take; what influence he should exert; what reactions he should get from the men whom he met and the life in which he should have a share. How little he foresaw what he should find in Egypt; even that he should go down into Egypt at all; and what would be his influence on those he found there and what the effect upon his own life and purpose.

We review the record of his life course and all the way along we are compelled to marvel at how wondrously life opened out to him beyond any plan he had devised, when he went through the gates of Haran and faced westward. It was quite beyond his ken; and so it is beyond the ken of all those who like Abraham set out not knowing to what they go.

There is the same marvel concerning every missionary. Here is a young man coming out of the lumber camps of the Northwest, pushing his way through the small college on the frontier, offering himself as a student volunteer, at length getting his appointment to missionary service in India, China or Africa and setting forth thereto. How little does he know what is before him; not merely what strange and unfamiliar sights and experiences, but what his life and work are to be. He goes forth to serve his Lord under the impulse of such faith as we have seen drove Abraham on; but what that is to involve for him, and whither it is to lead him are hidden. He knows indeed that he is sent to be a messenger of the gospel of good tidings; but how he is to make his contacts, how he is to meet his problems and interpret his message and express it in his life—this he must wait to find. It may be that he will be called to stand before kings; or to face a mob; or to endure a famine; or to be deported from his field. He goes forth, not knowing whither or to what he goes. And the surprise and glory of it are again and again that those who go forth so simply under the call of their faith into these new and untried conditions find life opening up to them far beyond their expectations, and powers developing far beyond their measures. In this particular also Abraham stands as a forerunner of the long line of those whose pilgrimage in the service of God carries them to a life of surpassing effectiveness and opportunity.

A third characteristic of this man Abraham as he goes forth from Haran is that he goes to be a blessing. The record is that he became a very rich man; he had much cattle, silver and gold, men servants and maid servants. A small and modest caravan it may have been that set out from Haran's gates; it was a huge and impressive multitude that at length traversed the routes of southern Palestine and spread the power and fame of Abraham on every hand. This was quite in accord with the promise which led him forth. But it was not all that impelled him. The summons was, "Get thee out of thy country unto a land that I will show thee . . . and I will bless thee, and make thy name great . . . and be thou a blessing." That was the crowning purpose of the uprooting and transfer of his life; that was his great objective, for which he entered Canaan and won his place there. There is a problem which Bible students have discussed, how he ever could have led his caravan into that country without fighting his way. Yet the records speak of no warfare, save that once in the midst of his career he did make a sudden foray into the northern regions of Dan to the release of his wretched nephew, Lot.

The significant fact about this long and detailed story of Abraham is that it moves along a path of peaceful relationships. He seeks ever to get on with people, without quarreling or fighting. He will not take a chance of conflict between himself and his kinsman or between their servants. He prefers to yield the advantage rather than to permit hostilities. He carries himself so that he becomes well regarded wherever he goes, a figure of truly patriarchal size and character, a "prince of God among us," as said the children of Heth when he came to them seeking to purchase a parcel of land for the burying of his wife, Sarah. It was not so much what he did, as what he was. That is always the way with those who are true followers of Abraham, who go out like him by faith in God, not knowing where or to what they are going, but purposing wherever they are to be a blessing. It is certainly true of the great missionaries, that the contribution of their personal character and life was their outstanding gift; not greater to be sure than their message, but the embodiment of that message, which could not be overlooked or forgotten.

When a middle-aged man was leaving a Western city to enter upon a new business relation in the East one of the young men of his town said, "It would pay this city to furnish him a salary just to live here and walk up and down the streets every day. His presence in the city is too great a blessing to be lost." The crowning glory and the full blessing of a life come when that life itself is made a blessing. The call to Abraham and to all his followers is to go forth to a serviceable life.

Some of the students of Abraham's story find so many difficulties in its details and what they count as inconsistencies in its record, that they incline to sweep Abraham into a region of legend and folk-lore and to interpret Abraham's call and the promises under which he went forth as but the forecasting that there was to come a servant nation, such as Israel later proved to be. Without accepting any such interpretation of the story as strips it of all historic value and suffers Abraham to change from a flesh and blood figure into a mere legendary hero, we may remark the fact that the call that came to Abraham is the call that comes to peoples and nations as truly as to individuals.

Such a call we reverently believe comes to America to-day, to this giant nation has come forth after long centuries of civilization's advance. The providential appearance on the world's stage of this mighty republic of the West indicates that its path forward is meant to be a path in which it shall make itself still more a blessing to the world. A Christian nation, in that its roots run down into the soil of Christian life and purpose among its founders; a land delivered from old tradition and restraints and free to build its life on new foundations; surely it has won its way to a place of prestige and power not simply for its own glory. The call to this nation was never louder, its proper destiny never more evident than to-day as it stands facing its chance to help other nations, great and small, and to give itself to the deliverance of the world.

The World's Sunday School Association has awarded to James Kelly, a Scotchman, its twenty-five dollar prize for the design for the convention to be held in Glasgow next June. The design consists of an open Bible encircled by the words "Ninth ideas which we feel have truth in them. Yet we are going to send our little Peters where they will get good, stiff training in Latin, Greek and mathematics. There is a wonderful, circular chart or diagram in the book, radiating from a center showing the thousand things Peter ought to learn by doing them, reading about them, living the experiences. They are very suggestive, and Peter certainly ought to know about them; but they are the things he will inevitably learn out of school as he goes along in life—the things he can learn from his reading. They do not necessarily discipline the mind or train the faculties to do the hard, big things. But of course it will be easier to compare the different ideas of right education two generations hence when we can see whether all these new methods produce stronger, more intellectually vigorous, more masterful men than were the great men trained at Oxford, Cambridge, Yale and Harvard under the old methods.

THE ANTI-LYNCHING CRUSADE

The crusade against lynching gains in force and urgency. Educational leaders in the South are increasingly insistent on the suppression of mob violence, the observance of law and the practices of civilized life which shall be in harmony with real American ideals. Recently eighty-three leading educators in Southern states joined in the following resolution:

"We, the undersigned, engaged in the work of education, earnestly appeal to all citizens to exert their influence constantly and actively in condemnation of the crime of lynching.

We furthermore urge upon our State Legislators and Executives to enact, if necessary, and persistently to enforce, such laws as will tend to put a stop to this species of lawlessness."

A group of Christian white women of Louisiana, meeting in New Orleans, recently expressed their convictions as follows:

"We register herewith our protest against the barbaric custom of lynching, which arouses violent and unchristian passions, brings law in disrepute, is inhuman and brutal, and unknown outside of our own land of America. We hold that no circumstances can ever justify such violent disregard for law and that in no instance is it an exhibition of chivalric consideration and honor of womanhood."

Shall Latin America have the Open Bible?

The West Indies, Mexico, Central America, The Republics of the Andes, Brazil, the Argentine —all Latin American countries are, or have been, the lands of the closed Book. For years the American Bible Society has labored patiently in these countries. Today it is rewarded with an eager interest in the Bible. The problem now is one of funds with which to place in the hands of the people the open Book.

In a single year the American Bible Society circulated 284,184 volumes in Latin America, where every book circulated means a book read.

$150,000 CLUB TO AID FILM-STRUCK GIRLS

Will H. Hays has raised $120,000 from the leading motion picture producers to help the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association multiply five times over the housing accommodations at Hollywood for film-smitten girls who are marching on the movie metropolis this summer in unprecedented numbers.

Girls without professional experience have almost no chance of getting into a studio to-day, but they are reported to be quitting work and school by the hundreds and starting for Hollywood seeking fame and a million a year. Some have their fares home. Some are stranded.

The Young Women's Christian Association is interested in the Hollywood Studio Club, which is something between an employment agency and a roundhouse. It turns many girls around and starts them back to the places from which they came. It helps to find the occasional place in the films that is open for young women with the proper equipment. It places others in positions of various kinds.

The Young Women's Christian Association's Hollywood quarters at present care for twenty girls at a time, and the surplus are sent to different boarding houses co-operating with the Hollywood Studio Club. New accommodations will make it possible to care for one hundred at one time. The girls are usually housed for two weeks, so that the new accommodations of the Young Women's Christian Association will have a capacity of, roughly, eighteen thousand film-struck girls a year.

Not a few of the girls who have been guests at the Hollywood Studio Club have been put into the films, and many have found positions in the business organizations of producing companies, but the legion of candidates to-day is rather overwhelming.

Many noted film stars belong to the local organization of the club. Mary Pickford, Mrs. Cecil B. de Mille, Mrs. William C. de Mille and Mrs. Jesse Lasky are members of the directing committee. Daniel Frohman, Mrs. Charles Ray, Mrs. Sessue Hayakawa, Ethel Clayton and Mme. Nazimova are actively interested in it. Louise Huff was the first president of the club, and Marjory Daw, Lois Lee and Vianna Knowlton were once movie-struck girls who were sheltered at the club while trying to break in.

A vivid picture of the march on Hollywood and the effort to shelter and safeguard the many who are disappointed and stranded is told as follows by Mrs. Edward M. Townsend, of the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association:

"In a comfortable looking white Colonial mansion set among green palm trees and bathed in the dazzling sunshine of Hollywood, a wholesome, jolly young woman is opening a stack of morning mail. 'Please reserve a room for me,' she reads. 'Every one says that I would make a wonderful movie actress.' A shadow crosses the face

THE JAPANESE DISASTER

For the last ten months there has been an unusual number of serious earthquakes and volcanic disturbances. Last November a great earthquake seriously damaged Antofagasta, Copiapo and La Serena in Chile. In February shocks disturbed a belt of island and ocean from the Society Islands through the Hawaiian group up to the Aleutian Islands. In April there was an earthquake in San Luis Potosi, Mexico. On June 9th Vesuvius broke out in violent eruption. Eight days later Mount Etna in Sicily began to pour out rocks and lava. On Saturday, September 1st, came the worst earthquake of all and the most serious disaster due to nature recorded by history. A series of earthquakes shook the great cities of Yokohama and Tokyo and neighboring towns. The disturbance broke the gas mains. Fire followed. Not only were the little flimsy Japanese houses swept away, but the buildings in European style were destroyed. The exact death toll may never be known. Early reports ran to three hundred thousand. Since then it has appeared that the number is much less. But in Tokyo alone over thirty-two thousand inquests over dead bodies have been held. The Japanese government proclaimed a moratorium of thirty days in the stricken area. Japan happened to be just in the process of changing governments. The new premier, Count Gombei Yamamoto, has taken hold of the situation vigorously and poured in the reliable Japanese troops to prevent looting, to help feed the hungry, and to keep out interlopers. The sympathy of the world has been aroused, of course. The American Red Cross is raising five million dollars and already American supplies and workers have reached Tokyo. Not a few distinguished Japanese lost their lives, but Europeans in general have escaped remarkably. Practically no missionaries were killed. That is in large part because during the summer most of the missionaries are away from Tokyo, many of them in the summer resort of Karuizawa. The Japanese disaster gives an opportunity to all the world to draw near in brotherly kindness.

THE ITALO-GREEK CRISIS

Italy last week followed up its seizure of Corfu by occupying four small islands, two to the north and two to the south of Corfu. Reports from the Near East Relief workers in Corfu only make clearer that the occupation was carried out with shocking brutality. Twenty boys and girls were killed by the Italian shells. However, the decisive events of last week took place in Geneva and Paris. In reply to the Greek appeal of the case to the League of Nations, Premier

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

Mussolini made a statement early last week threatening that Italy would withdraw from the League in case the Council took up the question. Signor Salandra, as Italy's spokesman at the Council meeting at Geneva, declared that the League of Nations has only the right to intervene in questions relating to the execution of treaties at the request of the interested parties. Nicholas Politis, the Greek delegate, answered the Italian statement convincingly. But Lord Robert Cecil's request for the reading of Articles X, XII and XV of the Treaty of Versailles was sufficient answer. These are the articles of corresponding number in the Covenant of the League of Nations. They provide clearly that the members of the League agree to submit to arbitration or inquiry by the Council any dispute between them which is likely to lead to a rupture. Any party to the dispute may bring about its submission to the League by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary General. All the nations represented in the League Council except France agreed with Greece that the Council is perfectly competent to intervene. The French delegate tried more or less successfully to sit on the fence. However, since the Italians assassinated were part of an international commission, working under the Council of Ambassadors, the latter body also was competent to intervene. It suggested to Greece that the Greek authorities apologize for the assassinations, which occurred on Greek soil, that members of the Greek government should attend the funeral service for the victims in the Athens Cathedral, and that military honors should be paid to the bodies of the victims when they are embarked. The Athens government will deposit fifty million lire in a foreign bank as a guarantee for whatever payments the conference of ambassadors may finally assess upon Greece. An inquiry into the responsibility for the assassination will be made by Allied officers under the chairmanship of the Japanese delegate. The demands made by the Council of Ambassadors correspond almost exactly to what Greece accepted of the original Italian demands. Mussolini has given way somewhat. Would that the League of Nations were strong enough to order some sort of punishment for Italy for its brutal crime on Corfu. With the League of Nations in existence, what business had a "civilized" nation to seize the property of another people instead of appealing to the organization which the nations themselves have set up to deal with just such questions?

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE COAL STRIKE

Thanks to the persistence of Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania, the anthracite operators and miners came to an agreement last week. When the agreement is ratified by the miners' convention the men will go to work again and the coal strike of 1923 will be at an end. Indications are that the men will be in the mines by the twentieth of this month. The agreement follows out closely the terms suggested by Governor Pinchot. The miners receive an increase of ten per cent. in their wages with a basic eight hour day. The Governor still hopes that the consumer may not have to pay the increased cost of mining. In a letter to the President he has suggested that the freight rates on anthracite might be reduced. He himself will take up the question with the Pennsylvania Public Service Commission in order to consider the reasonableness of anthracite freight rates within Pennsylvania itself. He also plans to call a conference of the Governors of the anthracite using States to consider the possibility of keeping down the cost of coal. He believes that the cost of wholesale and retail distribution can be reduced. The whole country will breathe easier now that the anthracite strike is ended, but few of us share Governor Pinchot's optimism. Most of us expect to see the price of coal rise with the increase of wages. How long the public can bear such settlements in labor controversies is a question. On Monday of this week the United States Coal Commission gave out a statement of the principles which they believe should be observed in order to secure industrial peace. They would assure the right of free contract, but when a contract is entered into they would have it mutually binding. Every man should have the right to work where, for whom, under what conditions and at what wages he chooses. Men have the right to combine themselves for the purpose of collective bargaining. They have not the right to force others into the ranks of their organization, nor has any organization of employers the right to break up a de facto organization of labor in other ways than by argument and advice. Every able-bodied, competent, honest worker should have a living wage, but "no organization or group has the right to hamper the initiative of the individual preventing him from making all the money he can." The Coal Commission suggests that sixty days before a contract is to be renewed between operators and miners the President should appoint some disinterested person to report upon the facts and principles involved, "so that the public may know whether the operator is receiving a reasonable return on his investment, the wage earner a living commensurate with American standards, and if not, who is to blame." When contracts once have been entered into there should be some Board of Arbitration which should speedily dispose of any controversies.

RECOGNITION OF MEXICO

After almost a decade of uncertainty and confusion in the relations between our Government and its southern neighbor our State Department has come to an agreement with the Obregon Government and we shall speedily resume diplomatic relations with Mexico. The greatest difficulty in the way of our recognition of the present Mexican Government was Article 27 in the Mexican Constitution of 1917. It was provided that all mineral rights below the surface of the ground belong to the Government. Article 27 made that provision appear to be retroactive. Some months ago, however, the Mexican Supreme Court in the so-called "amparo" cases, instituted by the Texas Company, decided that petroleum properties upon which development had begun prior to the time when the Carranza constitution went into effect would be protected from retroactive application of Article 27. Apparently the new agreement between the two governments extends such protection to the rights of American citizens in oil lands owned before May 1, 1917, even though no oil work had begun on the land at that date. We may well congratulate the administration on its achievement. When President Harding appointed Senator Fall Secretary of the Interior, we shared the general fear that the administration had committed itself to Fall's aggressive policy. But it soon became evident that Secretary Hughes and Secretary Hoover were to dominate in the Harding Cabinet. Secretary Fall's influence on our Mexican policy gradually disappeared. The present agreement should leave no hard feeling in Mexico. The Mexicans have saved their face, and the American government has secured the property rights of its citizens. Great Britain, France, Belgium, and some other countries have refused to recognize the Obregon Government until we should do so. Now Mexico should be received back generally into the fellowship of nations.

THE RENEWED SPECTRE OF FAMINE IN RUSSIA.

General Haskell has come home from Russia and the work of the American Relief Administration has come to an end there, but the Soviet Government is once more troubled for fear of famine. A wide area in northeastern Russia and several extensive districts in the west are threatened with a complete shortage of grain. Down in the south and southeast the crop is an average one. But in Crimea it is estimated that the crop will supply only half of the grain needed for consumption and seed. That means a shortage of fifteen thousand tons in Crimea alone. The Soviet Government's commissaries of Food Supply and of Foreign Trade are cutting down their estimates of the quantity of grain that can be exported from Russia. It certainly appears that Russia will need some aid from outside this year unless thousands of her people are to languish and even die.

WHY DID THE THIRTY-ONE SIGN THEIR LETTER?

The other day Professor Irving Fisher of Yale told of a private conversation which he held with the late President Harding in July of 1920. At that time, according to Professor Fisher, Mr. Harding said, "I want the United States to get into the League just as much as you do," but he went on to point out that the Republican Party was divided on the League. "I am the Marshal Foch of the Republican forces," he said, and as such he thought it necessary to unite both wings of his army before he could triumphantly lead the United States into the League. He was, he said, against the "Wilson League," but he expected, when the right time came, to get the nations together to form an "association" which should appropriate all the strong points of the present League and should be free from its weaknesses. Mr. Harding told Professor Fisher, the latter says, that the conversation was "personal," but not "confidential." In other words, Professor Fisher was not at liberty to go out and tell the reporters at the door what Mr. Harding had said to him, but he was at liberty to tell his friends. Professor Fisher actually did tell ex-President Taft. No doubt this was one of the reasons why three months later the ex-President was ready to sign the famous manifesto of "The Thirty-One." We ourselves have heard at least one man of the thirty-one tell a tale somewhat similar. According to this man's statement, as we recall it, Mr. Harding told one or more of "The Thirty-One" that he had voted for the League of Nations with reservations three times in the Senate, and that those votes still represented his position. He gave it to be understood that friends of the League might have perfect confidence in him. In the course of the next year or two we should be privileged to hear some of the inside history of the campaign of 1920. When we know all perhaps we shall not think the "Thirty-One" quite so gullible as they have appeared.

THE CAMPAIGN FOR THE CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

The Jersey City and Newark authorities have recently been making an investigation of the employment of children in home sweat shops. They have made many disquieting discoveries. Nearly a thousand children were doing contract work at home, oftentimes under most injurious conditions. In one flat of three small rooms and a kitchen in Jersey City lived a family of mother, father and seven children with four boarders, two cats, and twelve chickens additional. During the summer while the children were not in school they spent their whole day fastening together the two halves of tin toy horses and bending the shafts into the holes provided. The combined earnings of the children amounted to six dollars a week. Of course, such a home is one of the very worst. But it was by no means unique. Investigators, for instance, found tubercular children making sanitary powder puffs! The results of the investigations in the larger New Jersey cities has led to State or local investigation in practically every good-sized town in the State. It is not only in New Jersey, of course, that children are overworked. In the oyster and shrimp canneries on the Gulf coast are thousands of American-born children working long hours. Among thirteen hundred and fifty of these children who were studied by the Federal Children's Bureau twenty-five per cent. could not read nor write. That figure is six times the percentage of illiteracy of children for the country as a whole. Only nine of the thirteen hundred and fifty children in the canneries were of foreign parentage. The demand for labor in the last year and a half has led to a great increase in the number of children employed. The census of 1920 showed 1,060,858 children between ten and fifteen at work. This does not include, of course, children who are helping their fathers and mothers at home, nor does it include children under ten who are employed. As every one knows, the Supreme Court has twice decided that Federal laws against child labor were unconstitutional. Sad as it may be, it is nonetheless the fact that some States are backward in passing laws to stop child labor. Certainly the easiest and quickest means to bring us up to a standard such as has been reached by the more advanced European nations is the passage of a constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to limit the labor of a person under eighteen years. Those who are interested in the problem—and who is not?—can keep in touch with the situation through the National Child Labor Commission, 1230 Fifth Avenue, New York.

WALL STREET ANALYSIS OF DISCONTENT

"The resentment and bitterness of the farmer-labor group has its foundations deep in economic conditions and it will not do this time to reply to them with soft words," writes Mr. George M. Branting in a special article in the "Wall Street Magazine." Their mutual dependence is throwing them together and "it is altogether likely," he says, "that little by little they will continue to work for their mutual advantage." Speaking of labor's position and the causes of its present discontent he says: "A great deal of mischief has been created by the hypothesis that high wages are ruinous to the employing classes. As a matter of fact, a liberal economic viewpoint will indicate that the higher the wages, the greater the spending power and the more firmly secured our economic position. The safeguard of this nation does not consist of holding wages down, but rather the reverse. Prosperity can more easily be maintained by maintaining a high standard of living which can only be secured by maintaining an adequate wage scale. Only a short-sighted policy on the part of manufacturers and other employers of labor will defeat this end." Mr. Branting says that "there is no question that the farmer's position is desperate, particularly in the West. With his purchasing power down below that even of 1913, his position is probably the poorest of any of the large national groups." "If it be true," he continues, "that the nation is served by high wages for labor, it is equally true that the nation's best interests can only be served if the farming interests receive sufficient for their labors to permit a decently reasonable standard of living. It does not require proof that there can be no prosperity without its being shared with the farmers." Farmers and labor are coming together because labor realizes that "it cannot prosper without the prosperity of the farming classes," and because the farmer realizes "that since most of his products are consumed by labor, he cannot prosper without labor's receiving a high wage scale." Their united action, he says, will "in the long run be indeed the best thing for the country," since the general prosperity of the country depends upon their prosperity. Prosperity among farmers and city working people would benefit the business men of the country and the investors. "With a contented laboring class and a satisfied farming population," Mr. Branting goes on to say, "we would reach a situation wherein a steady amount of industrial activity could be obtained. The factories, in that case, would always work at close to capacity, our railroad systems could always earn reasonable amounts and in general all our industrial and farm interests would benefit. A certain amount of stability would be guaranteed investors, who would thus be divorced from the dangerous financial results of strikes and other industrial disturbances. Thousands of investors last year were deprived of their dividend because of strikes."

WHAT LABOR WANTS OF THE CHURCH

In the August "Forum" Paul Blanchard of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers discusses "What Labor Wants of the Church," holding that, while there is no one opinion about the Church held by labor, in general the workers consider the Church as something entirely apart from the labor movement, and are indifferent to it. If the Church helps the workers to get what they want they will regard it as a friend, if not, as an enemy. Labor's great problems are the inequality of wealth, the degradation of personality in the industrial system, and the "autocratic control of our industrial system by investors." The workers feel that the Church should be just as militant in its opposition to industrial ills as it was in its fight against Negro slavery or the saloon and that the Church must clearly prove by its action that it is no longer largely controlled by business men. Labor asks the Church for, first, "constant denunciation by preachers and church leaders of low wages, long hours, of the denial of real collective bargaining and the economic inequality of our society;" secondly, "fact-studies of modern industrial situations" made by the Church and given to the public; thirdly, great personalities such as the late Bishop Williams.

A DECALOGUE FOR DONORS

We have all grown familiar with the counsel of the charity organizations not to give indiscriminately to people who ask for aid. The Niagara Falls Chamber of Commerce recently drew up a new decalogue especially addressed to business houses. The New York Charity Organization Society's Bureau of Advice and Information has paraphrased and amended it to read as follows:

Don't contribute to unknown charities without first obtaining disinterested information about them.

Don't feel bound to contribute to sectarian organizations unless you are a member.

Don't advertise in programs until you know whether the advertising is offered on a sound basis.

Don't buy any advertising blindly. Learn whether your money is financing a bona fide proposition or is a straight donation.

Don't purchase tickets merely because some acquaintance or customer asks you to. Examine the merits of the project to be benefited.

Don't answer "remit or return" letters from organizations with which you are not connected.

Don't keep on giving year after year to a cause without additional checking up of its work. You have the right and duty to know where your philanthropic dollar goes.

Don't be satisfied with turning down an appeal that seems to you irregular. Notify the Bureau of Advice and Information and help protect your neighbor.

Such counsel is very good if it does not leave us wholly with a negative idea of our duty in regard to charity. If we are not going to help the ill-managed or dubious enterprise, let us be all the more ready to help the one that is worthy.

RULES FOR HEALTH

The Life Extension Institute puts out the following sixteen rules for health:

1. Ventilate every room you occupy.
2. Wear light, loose and porous clothes.
3. Seek out-of-door occupations and recreations.
4. Sleep out if you can.
5. Breathe deeply.
6. Avoid overeating and overweight.
7. Eat some hard, some bulky, some raw foods.
8. Eat sparingly of meat and eggs.
9. Eat slowly.
10. Use sufficient water internally and externally.
11. Evacuate thoroughly, regularly and frequently.
12. Stand, sit and walk erect.
13. Do not allow poisons and infections to enter the body.
14. Keep the teeth, gums and tongue clean.
15. Work, play, rest and sleep in moderation.
16. Keep serene.

Some of us already regard it as a distinct fault for a person to be sick of the ordinary avoidable complaints. Our children's children may yet live to see the day when the fanciful rule in the utopia of "Erewhon" is put into actual practice and we shall treat the sick person with something of the same disapproval as we treat the criminal to-day.

cause she belonged to an association whose every law she has violated. She is not only a member of the League of Nations, but was one of its chief advocates at Paris and Versailles. The League has provisions for investigating and treating just such acts as the murder of the Italians in Greece. So Italy has not only committed an outrage against civilization, but has violated her pledged word. So she has not only thrown her shells on an unprotected and unsuspecting people, but she has thrown away her honor at the same time. There might be some extenuation for this breaking of faith, done in a sudden passion, if she had promptly apologized to the League, withdrawn her troops and demanded an investigation, but at this writing she boldly declares that she will withdraw from the League if it attempts to hold her to her pledges and obligations. Then deliberately she prefers dishonor, prefers to threaten the peace of the world than be deprived of her intention to seek personal revenge.

Not only is Italy on trial before the world, but so is the League of Nations. Its prestige is at stake. If it wavers now it is doomed. If it stands firm and insists on Italy abiding by her pledge, it will strengthen it in the eyes of all the nations. It will also win more favor for it from the United States than all the propaganda and argument of the last four years. If the League wavers every enemy of it in America will say, "We told you so," and we should have some sympathy with them. The firmness of the League at this juncture is of infinitely more value than keeping Italy's membership.

The League should act, and act quickly. Let Italy withdraw if she insists (we doubt if she will). If she does, she becomes an outcast among nations. Let the nations put both a political and economic boycott about her and see how quickly she will come to terms. There is little danger of Italy staying out of the League long. Great Britain has spoken immediately and if the other members of the League will take equally firm action there is little to fear.

The whole incident is but another illustration of the fact that chaos and anarchy must persist in the world so long as nations are permitted to do what long ago we have forbidden to individuals, namely, take the law into their own hands, act as their own judge and executioner. There is no fundamental difference between a nation doing what Italy did and an individual in America taking the law into his own hands when he has been wronged. We have reached that stage in civilization when society is so organized that when an individual is wronged he takes his case to a court. If he insists on taking the law into his own hands he becomes a criminal and is so treated. He makes himself an outcast from society. The greatest enemy of the nation is the man who takes the law into his own hand, whether acting alone or as a member of a lynching gang or a Ku Klux Klan or anything else. It means anarchy and chaos for the nation. We have had no such organization in our international life until the League of Nations, with its International Court, was set up. The League was the first step to remedy this anarchy among the nations. It attempts to substitute communal action and judicial processes for the taking of the law into a nation's own hands as Italy has done in Greece. Italy is doing what the individual does who refuses to recognize the state and proceeds on his own initiative—not for justice—it is justice he is afraid of—but for personal revenge or gain. Who is there outside of Italy who down in his heart does not to-day believe that Italy is taking a chance of gaining something,

Italy and Greece

THE act of Italy in shelling and occupying Corfu was a pure piece of barbarism; but we in America cannot criticize Italy on this score, for we have been doing the same sort of thing in Mexico for several years. When anything happened in Mexico similar to what happened to the Italians in Greece, instead of making legal representations to the Mexican government we sent in an army. Neither are any of the other great powers in a better position than the United States to criticize.

On the other hand, the Italian case is entirely different, and here the United States has a perfect right both to criticize and condemn Italy. In the first place, Italy has put herself in the list of "baby killers." She bombarded without notice the Island of Corfu and killed a lot of babies and children, some of them little refugees being cared for by the Near East Relief, an American institution. It is a pity that Italy has thus put herself in the category of Germany. Early in the war Germany dropped bombs on unfortified towns, killing little babies on the beaches of England. There was a universal outcry of horror from all civilized peoples—a justifiable protest. Italy has aroused the same indignation throughout the world.

In the second place, Italy's act is utterly unjustifiable be-either of power or territory beyond justice? Who is there even in Italy who does not know that the League would have seen justice done? The one thing to which all the world should bend its energies is to the strengthening and perfecting the international organization so that the nation which takes the law into its own hands will be regarded as a criminal and outcast, just as the individual is, and treated accordingly. It is the only way out of international anarchy and chaos into permanent peace and civilization. F. L.

and to form some conception of their respective effectiveness. In the complex social machinery around me I have pulled lever after lever and noted the results. I have pulled the lever of prayer, and I have found the most remarkable results of all. I have seen, too, that all the other results are then deepened and combined into a complete efficiency."

The Unseen Leadership *

"THE UNSEEN LEADERSHIP" is a story of such deep interest, so informing, instructive and inspiring that it ought to be called to the attention of Americans. Its ideals are the highest men can cherish, and Mr. Stead's efforts to realize them are sustained and far-seeing, adventurous and heroic. The achievements recorded prove him to have been a bold and wise pioneer, the harbinger of better days, the faithful sower of seeds that have yielded great harvests of good for men, and that will be fruitful for many years to come.

The fascination of the book is that it is autobiographic. It consists of a succession of chapters of personal witness. It is a record of the inner life of a strongly believing man, fearlessly converting his faith into deeds; going forward along the divinely marked-out path, without haste and without rest, always assured that he is borne along by the unseen Lord of his life and of the life of humanity. It is as rich in self-revelation as Augustine's "Confessions" or John Bunyan's "Grace Abounding," and like these immortal books, it will capture and hold the reader by its intense realism, glowing fervor, invincible faith and entire consecration. Those who read it will find their confidence in prayer wonderfully strengthened, their zeal for evangelism guided and inflamed, and their inward life nourished.

But while the story is autobiographic, it is beautifully modest, and indicates at many points much self-repression and reserve, and thereby the personal witness will gain in power.

For the chief charm of the book is the presence—actual and real—of "The Unseen Leader," the ever-ruling will of Christ, from whom comes the initiative for every fresh adventure, the impulse for every new movement. Just as the initiative of the Spirit of God in action is seen on every page of the book of the Acts of the Apostles, so is the guidance of Christ asserted in every chapter of this volume. The author says in effect, "I live, yet not I; but Christ liveth in me."

Again and again as I have been reading, the story of George Muller and his Bristol Orphanage has emerged; and I have felt, here too is powerful persuasive to belief in the certainty of "answers" to the prayer of faith, and another counsel that "men ought always to pray and not to faint." The following set in the light of the story of the Browning Settlement and the works carried out there ought to have weight. Mr. Stead says: "I speak that I do know. I have had some experience of social engineering. I ought to be able to estimate the relative magnitude of social and political forces,

Supreme Love for Christ

IN a passage of Matthew's Gospel, Jesus demands more love for Himself than for father or mother, son or daughter. The parallel passage in Luke adds wife, brothers and sisters, and one's own life, and demands that these shall be hated. We are quite sure that if any of us really believe that Jesus wanted us to hate those who are nearest and dearest to us, in order to be His disciples, we should not want to be His disciples at all. Our conception of Jesus, based upon a general reading of the Gospels, is such that if the interpretation which these words seem to bear were the only possible interpretation we should without hesitation say that Jesus never uttered them. A false text somehow must have crept into the record. Either that, or else Jesus must have fallen somehow from His own standard and uttered the words in a moment of fanaticism. Any particular passage, taken as substantially genuine, must be interpreted by comparing it with the general character and the general teaching of Jesus and with the spirit of His Life revealed in the Gospels as a whole. When we have done this, we are quite sure that Jesus never meant us to hate our fathers and mothers, our wives and children or our own life. But what, then, did He mean? If He used the word "hate" at all, He could only mean that we were to hate what was opposed to Him, even in our dearest. This means only that allegiance to Christ is to be first, and that if natural relations are hostile to that allegiance they must give way. In the early time when the Christian cause was pioneering in a hostile environment allegiance to Christ was such a new thing that it often divided families, and unless allegiance to the new cause was to be stronger even than the family bond it could never have made headway at all. When we read of Jesus saying that He had not come to send peace on the earth, but a sword, and to set a man at variance against his father, and a daughter against her mother, we must remember that these words describe results, not intentions. The real intention of Jesus was to win men for a new spiritual ideal; if one man in a family responded to that ideal, Jesus would have him be faithful to it even though the family be against it, and even though the result of that be division in the household. Those words about not coming to send peace but a sword have often been quoted, and are quoted now quite frequently, as a justification of war, as if the sword in that passage could possibly mean the sword of a soldier. We often think that the old theory of Biblical infallibility, by which one can pick up a text anywhere, give it a literal interpretation and claim it as the mind of God for the world, is responsible for more wickedness in this world than any other theory. The sword in the passage is plainly a figure of speech. Does anyone suppose that Jesus would not have liked it very much better if all the members of a family had responded to the spiritual ideal so that there might be increased joy and love among them. It would be easy to show from the Gospels that Jesus did not think little of family unity and family affection. But at any time He would have claimed that the spiritual value must be the highest, that the Kingdom of God must be first, and that men must pursue it even when those nearest to them refused to do so. The highest human bond that can exist is between those who set themselves together to do the will of God.

But now we must ask whether this position so expounded is one we should accept, and if so, how it bears upon our natural relations and connections. If we grant the claim that Jesus must be put above all others in one's love, Jesus is not to us a mere individual, but a representative of the love of God and of all the higher demands of our own souls. If the Christian demand were that we must love Jesus the individual, the person who lived in Palestine long ago, more than we love our own dearest ones about us, it is a demand that we could not comply with. If by love is meant an intense personal fondness, a sort of clinging of soul to soul, we could not possibly love Him more than we do them, nor as much. But love in Christianity, of course, means something more than this, and Jesus in the claim means not the individual, but all that He represents in the kingdom of spiritual values. Jesus has given us a spiritual conception of God, a spiritual valuation of life, and a spiritual ideal of character which constitute the highest good. It is for this highest good that Christianity claims our main allegiance. If, therefore, in this effort it becomes necessary for us to differ from others, even though they be our dearest, we must leave no doubt in our own minds nor in theirs as to what our main allegiance is, as to the supreme sanctity of our ideal. But this should not affect our general relationship with those from whom we have differed; it surely would not be the mind of Jesus that we should regard them even with coldness; He would have us still behave towards them with positive good-will, which is what He means by love. Indeed, He who commanded us to love our enemies could not possibly wish us to hate our friends.

Now, the demand of Christianity to-day, as throughout the ages, is that we should not sacrifice to any personal affection the great Christian ideal of individual character, nor the great Christian ideal of society, viz., the Kingdom of God. We are frequently up against this, and it is by no means any easy matter to show full fidelity to the Christian standard. In dealing with those who are very near and dear to us there is often a temptation to sacrifice something of truth, something of integrity, and certainly to fail in that expansive good-will towards the world which Christianity demands of us. Family love sometimes obscures the larger issue; under the plea of doing his best for his family a man often fails to consider what would be best for the world. The world wide significance and meaning of Christianity is often wrecked on that reef. A great many fail to get their boat out over that bar. What would Jesus say? He, standing for the widest good, the love of God for the world, would say of any narrower good, "He that loveth that more than Me is not worthy of Me." The reason why so many to-day are unworthy of a better social state is that they love personal interest, family interest, and group interest more than they love the general interest. Not until men are prepared to put community good above their own will they be worthy of the better community. The principle embodied in the old words is a vital one for the world to-day. We must cease to think of one person setting himself over against all other persons and demanding supreme love for himself. In that form it would not appeal, nor would it be the true life. By "Christ" we mean the highest good we know, personal and social, especially as revealed in Jesus, and it is this good that should win the supreme loyalty of our hearts and command our endeavors into its service. To this we should subjugate all personal ambitions, and we should subordinate all personal affections to the truth, the integrity, the general good-will, required for the realization of the great ideal.

We may further emphasize the point that this is the only way to make the lower loves real and true. If personal affection for a child should lead to a treatment of that child which sacrifices in any way truth and honor, the child is not being loved in the right way. So in regard to friends. If we sacrifice to personal affection or personal kindness what duty demands of us on the moral plane we are not loving our friends in the right way. "I could not love thee half so well, loved I not honor more." To love a man more than we love truth is to love a man too little. The value of your love for others will depend upon the worth of your character, and if you are sacrificing in your personal character the greatest and the highest things, no sort of affection that you can bestow upon others will be to them the good or the help that you mean it to be. The man who loves Christ more than he loves his fellows is the man who loves his fellows best; that is, if he interprets Christ in the right way. We have known of men who have persecuted others for what they thought was the love of Christ, but that was a detached Christ, therefore an unreal Christ, usually a theological creation, or the idol of a sect. The Christ we must love is the Christ that is in us, and also in the other. To love Christ best really means to love what is highest in ourselves and in others. And unless we do love that highest best no love or action we can bestow on others is of vital worth. We need not be afraid of giving our supreme love to Christ, the Christ in us and the Christ in others; we need not be afraid that this will deprive our children or anyone dear to us of any love; it will really bring them more and purer and fuller love. If our love for our children were always controlled by the vision of the Christ-possibilities in them, what a glorious thing it would be. It would not spend itself in planning worldly success for them, but would help the unfolding of the soul, the gaining of wisdom and beauty and goodness, and the becoming rich in the values of the Kingdom of God.

There is a world of meaning in those New Testament phrases which speak of loving men "in God," "in Christ," "in truth," of doing all things, even eating and drinking, to the glory of God or in the name of Christ, giving a cup of cold water to a disciple in His name. All such phrases mean that human relationships properly understood are embedded in this general universal Divine Life which holds them together, and that men can serve each other best as they recognize that, and put the importance of it above everything else. When we love Christ more than we love our dear ones our love will be great enough to give them pain if that be for their highest good, love will not be a sentimental softness, but a real elevator of character, a strengthener of the best in the loved ones. If you want your love purified, redeemed, made eternal, then it must be love that puts the highest in the highest place, and subordinates all else to it.

THE OBSERVER

The Beautiful Isles of Shoals

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

THEY lie ten miles out to sea opposite Portsmouth, New Hampshire. There are three fairly large islands—Appledore, Smutty Nose and Star Island. There are three others, great rocks rising out of the sea, on one of which is the big lighthouse, which every reader of Celia Thaxter knows well. The islands are best known to the world at large through their association with Celia Thaxter. In 1839 her father, the Hon. Henry B. Lighthouse, became so disgusted with politics and what he thought the failure of democratic government that he decided to quit it all forever. Somehow he secured the position of lighthouse keeper on White Island and moved there with his wife and three children—Celia, Cedric and Oscar. Celia was five years old at that time. After serving six years in the lighthouse Mr. Lighthouse built a cottage on the largest of the islands, Appledore, making that his home for life. The children were all interesting, but at an early age Celia began to manifest a remarkable poetic talent and it was not many years before she stood in the front rank of American poets. Excursionists to the islands discovered this interesting family and began to clamor to board with them for a while. The result was that in time two great hotels were built by Mr. Lighthouse and his sons—one on Appledore, one on Star Island. They were filled and the islands became one of the most popular of resorts. In time both were burned to the ground, but the one on Star Island, the Oceanic, was rebuilt and is still standing. With the advent of the motor car the summer people preferred the coast resorts, and the Oceanic became an unprofitable enterprise. In the summer of 1895 Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Elliot, of Lowell, while resting on Star Island observed that the hotel was not paying and that it must some time close. They realized the suitability of the place for study and worship and felt the extraordinary beauty and so conceived the idea of turning it into a retreat. They got the Unitarian denomination interested in the project and in 1897 a conference was held at the hotel, which has been continued ever since with increasing attendance and success. After a time the Unitarians bought the hotel and island. In 1914 the Congregationalists began holding an annual conference of two or three weeks after the Unitarian conference had closed its sessions.

The islands will be forever associated with the memory of Celia Thaxter. She loved them and loved the sea. She spent most of her life on Appledore and wrote most of her poems there. In almost every poem is some mention of the sea. Few poets have caught all the moods of the ocean as has she. Some of her songs are of exquisite beauty. So did she love the ocean that she was never happy when far from it. One of the most beautiful of her poems, "Land-Locked," grew out of this longing for the sea while she was spending a while among the hills. It is one of the loveliest lyrics in our American literature.

Black lie the hills, swiftly doth daylight flee;
And, catching gleams of sunset's dying smile,
Through the dusk land for many a changing mile
The river runneth softly to the sea.

O happy river, could I follow thee!
O yearning heart, that never can be still!
O wistful eyes, that watch the steadfast hill,
Longing for level line of solemn sea!

Have patience; here are flowers and songs of birds,
Beauty and fragrance, wealth of sound and sight,
All summer's glory thine from morn till night,
And life too full of joy for uttered words.

Neither am I ungrateful, but I dream
Deliciously how twilight falls to-night
Over the glimmering water, how the light
Dies blissfully away until I seem

To feel the wind, sea-scented, on my cheek,
To catch the sound of dusky flapping sail
And dip of oars, and voices on the gale
Afar off, calling low—my name they speak!

O Earth! thy summer song of joy may soar
Ringing to Heaven in triumph, I but crave
The sad, caressing murmur of the wave
That breaks in tender music on the shore.

That is poetry. There are many more just as beautiful, and some time I should like to come back to them here. "The Sandpiper" has been one of the most popular of poems with children for two generations. One day last week I went over to Appledore and found Celia's grave amidst a tangle of wild rose bushes on top of the bleak island. There is a monument for the Lighthouse family and little headstones about it and on the top of one "Celia." That is all. About her the sea murmurs and the sea birds call to her as of old.

I went to the Isles of Shoals last week to take part in the three weeks' conference being held by the Congregationalists. I found when I arrived a company of eager students of the Bible, religious and social problems, who were listening to three lectures a day by eminent scholars and taking part in conferences which followed the lectures. The afternoons were left free and were spent in sailing, fishing or strolling along the rock-bound shores. The brother of Celia Thaxter, Oscar Lighthouse, still lives on Star Island. He is eighty-four years old, but hale and hearty. He runs his motorboat in all sorts of weather and all who get opportunity to sail among the islands with him find it a delightful experience. He is something of a poet himself and is just publishing a volume of verse. If it is anything like the one poem by him included in the collected edition of his sister's works it will be real poetry.

My lectures were on religious novels, beginning with "Robert Falconer" and "The Minister's Wooing," and coming down through "Robert Elsmere" and "John Ward, Preacher," to our own day. I enjoyed the days very much and it was very interesting to meet such audiences as one found there. I had prepared a list of all the religious novels I was acquainted with and read it at the first lecture, asking for additions from any who might know of some I had omitted. I got suggestions of new ones almost every hour after that. The subject proved so interesting to me—and I think the subject at least proved interesting to my hearers—that I want to take it up in this column some time. One daily event made a lasting impression on me. There is, on Star Island, on the highest point, about three minutes' climb from the hotel, the stone church built by the villagers many years ago before there was hotel or cottage on the islands. The floor of the little church is brick, laid on the solid rock. Every night at nine o'clock at the close of the evening lecture everybody takes a candle in his hands and the procession walks slowly in absolute silence to the church, where a fifteen-minute responsive service, with one hymn and prayers, is participated in, the only light in the church being from the candles put in racks on the wall. At the close of service each one takes his candle and the procession moves slowly back to the hotel in silence.

The most outstanding feature of the conference was the daily morning lectures by Dr. Frederick Emrich on the Bible. These were among the most illuminating talks I have ever listened to. Dr. Emrich is a remarkable combination of the scholar and mystic. I could not help wishing that some rich layman would pay the expenses of fifty young Congregational ministers at the Isles of Shoals each summer just that they might come under the influence of this wonderful man. It would mean more to them than their course in the divinity school. Here is a great opportunity to render a very valuable service to the Church.

THE WEEKLY SERMON

All, With One Accord, in One Place

Rev. Van Tassell Sutphen

"And when the day of Pentecost was fully come they were all, with one accord, in one place. And suddenly there came a sound of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance."—Acts 2:1-4.

THEY were ALL, with ONE accord, in ONE place.

It is nearly two thousand years since the whole Christian Church came together to wait upon the will of God. And richly they were rewarded in the descent of the Holy Ghost, the coming of that Comforter promised by our Lord himself. "And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever, even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him; but ye know Him, for He dwelleth with you and shall be in you" (St. John 14:16-17).

The record of this visitation is as clear and unequivocal as words can make it, and under the urge of that mighty energy the Church has functioned throughout the centuries of its corporate existence, even to this very day and hour. But there is nothing in our Lord's words, or in the constitution of the event itself, necessarily to limit the outpouring of this divine afflatus to the one occasion recorded in the Book of the Acts. Why should there not be a second day of Pentecost, a renewal of that spiritual impulse with a corresponding revival of pentecostal faith and fervor? Is it that the windows of heaven remain tightly sealed, or is the blessing reserved because there is no burning desire on the part of the Church to receive it?

We mourn, and justly so, our Laodicean lukewarmness, the deadening of our faith, our neglected opportunities, the comparative failure of the Church to adapt itself to the conditions of modern life. The rate of progress has slowed down perceptibly; the time seems far distant when the kingdom of this world shall become, in very truth, the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

We ask ourselves where the fault lies, and one obvious answer is to point to our divided forces, the Body of Christ, torn by inward dissensions, rent by outward schism. Like a mighty army moves the Church of God, but alas! it is not a united army, animated and inspired by one faith, one hope, one determined and resistless purpose. And so the victories along one line are nullified, at least in part, by the defeats along another; the advance has not been absolutely halted, but it has lost the vigor and dash of its first splendid charge. Why should these things be?

Is it but a roseate dream to voice the conviction that there might be a second day of Pentecost, if only the Church were able to fulfil the simple, primal condition, to be ALL, with ONE accord, in ONE place? Let us assume the impossible, let us postulate the unthinkable.

Suppose that, without entering into any formal alliance or even modus vivendi, the churches throughout Christendom should undertake to send uninstructed representatives to an ecumenical meeting at some conveniently situated central point—say one of the larger cities of western Europe. It would be understood that the assembly should convene on three successive days in a given week (perhaps the Whitsun season of 1924), the sessions to last from twelve o'clock noon until three o'clock. There would be no set program, no order of business, no selected corps of speakers, not even a committee of arrangements, with the possible exception of a local bureau to make provision for the reception and lodging of the delegates, to furnish needed information and to perform other functions of a purely clerical nature.

Naturally, the place of assembly would be a church, and it would have to be a building of considerable size to accommodate the attending delegates. According to the "World Almanac," there are in the United States alone 187 indepen-

Such are the headlines from the daily papers of this week. They underestimate the calamity, for each issue tells a more desolate tale.

Among these thousands of refugees are several thousand members of the native Christian churches which were established by American Missionaries and are now in charge of native pastors. To these pastors will fall the care of these thousands of starving children.

While Americans should make no distinction in their quick work of mercy, and will not, yet these Christian children have a direct claim upon the Christians of America. They are our wards—our special care.

We want to cable $25,000 to these Christian pastors immediately to be used for these children.

Fortunately a very eminent member of our staff knows every pastor and church in Japan, he having spent all his life there as missionary and professor in Doshisha University. He has just returned from Japan where he has been on a visit to

We hope—we feel sure—that everyone who reads these lines will send us something immediately. Do not delay, for these children are in terrible straits.

To the Pastors who read The Christian Work

We hope that every pastor who reads these lines will take up an offering for the starving children of Japan, either to be sent direct to these pastors or through the Red Cross. Do it next Sunday or the Sunday after.

Think, too, what an opportunity this is for creating lasting good-will between America and Japan. Japan will remember us forever as the good Samaritan who bound up her grievous wounds. If we feed her hundreds of thousands of children now, and help them to find homes, it will be worth more than all the peace treaties that could ever be signed.

dent religious bodies calling themselves Christian; the "Catholic Encyclopedia," however, groups them all under thirteen general divisions—Roman Catholics, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Reformed churches, United Brethren, Friends, Mormons, Dunkards, Disciples of Christ and Adventists. The splitting up tendency is not so noticeable throughout the Old World, and one may conjecture that the total number of autonomous Christian churches would not exceed 250. If each sent a delegation of four persons the assembly would have an aggregate roster of one thousand members. Or perhaps the representation might be proportional to the communicant membership in each particular church.

There would be no standards of eligibility, no tests of orthodoxy, no credentials covering even the irreducible minima of Christian faith. All would be welcome who love our Lord and wait for His appearing. Moreover, no obligations, whether expressed or implied, would be incurred; the delegates would be free to withdraw at any time, either in a body or individually. No one would be compromised, no one would be bound, factional differences would be ignored, and propaganda of every kind would be discountenanced absolutely. In no sense would the assembly seek to resolve itself into an ecumenical council; its primal purpose would not be to legislate, nor even to confer; its sole function would be to wait upon God, if haply He might be gracious unto His people.

No one but accredited delegates would be admitted to the sessions of the assembly. Not even ushers would be necessary, for there would be no set places assigned to the various delegations; indeed, the individual representatives would be requested to avoid grouping themselves by racial or ecclesiastical units. The more widely diversified and commingled the assembly, the closer it would approximate to its primitive model.

Let us imagine, as best we may, the scene and setting of that opening session: the ponderous bell of the sanctuary tolling the last quarter of the hour before noon, the long line of delegates filing into the silent and empty interior of the great church, the people standing in serried ranks to see them pass. Within the church itself there would be a marked absence of the ceremonial features characterizing our ordinary ecclesiastical assemblages; there would be no procession of white-robed choristers and gorgeously appareled dignitaries, no rolling thunder of organ diapasons, no pomp and circumstance of pastoral staff and embroidered banner. Equally removed would be the bustle and confusion of our secular conventions; no chattering of telegraph keys, no scurrying about of pages and messengers, no consulting of programs and agenda, no tables for secretaries and press correspondents, no presiding officer with anxious-faced delegates endeavoring to catch his eye, no throng of favored ticket-holders in the galleries, no whispered conferences among would-be leaders and sectarian protagonists—nothing but the amazing spectacle of the Church of God, ALL, with ONE accord, in ONE place.

And now the great bell has ceased to toll and the doors are shut. What would happen?

As we turn again to the record of that first Pentecost we may read between the lines of certain things not formally set down by the sacred historian. Surely, at that final moment of assembly there must have fallen a great silence—how otherwise could the disciples have become aware of the first, almost inaudible, murmur of that rushing mighty wind? It was only after they were filled with the Holy Ghost that they began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

Silence then, but "Silence," says Carlyle, "is the element in which great things fashion themselves together, that at length they may emerge, full formed and majestic, into the daylight of Life, which they are henceforth to rule."

And again, "Bees will not work except in darkness; thought will not work except in silence."

And again, "Silence, the great empire of silence; higher than the stars, deeper than the kingdom of death."

"From the moment that we have something to say to each other," adds the Belgian mystic, Maurice Maeterlinck, "we are compelled to hold our peace." Perhaps the Quakers, in their obedience to this profound psychological law, are wiser in their day and generation than we with all our lessons, all our liturgies. Nevertheless, we are justified in avoiding a confusion of thought; worship is one thing, and the exercise of the purely devotional faculty is quite another. We are bound to make our offerings of praise and thanksgiving to the Almighty in the only form of expression at our command, the confessedly imperfect medium of words; but when we would be filled with the very Spirit of God we must wait upon Him in patience and in silence.

"What would happen?" we ask again, and even the most reverent of conjecture would seem to be presumptuous. How shall man dare to come within the shadow even of omnipotence? Who are we that we should seek communion with the Ineffable? But the world, only just now emerging from the bloody welter of war, still deafened and appalled by the crash of falling civilization, looks dumbly to the Church of God for guidance and leadership. And to whom shall the Church, in her turn, look but to her ever-living Lord and Head? The veil of the temple was rent in twain two thousand years ago, and the approach to the Holy of Holies still stands open to all who draw nigh in humility and faith. One thing we know, that upon that pentecostal assembly of the first disciples the Holy Ghost did assuredly descend. Doubtless they came to that place of meeting devoid of any preconceived notions of how God was to visit them; they presented no human program, no intellectually devised plan of procedure; they were there simply to wait upon God, and He did not fail to meet with them.

The ecumenical or universal character of that primitive assembly is clearly indicated in Holy Writ: "Parthians and Medes and Elamites; and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea and Cappadocia; in Pontus and Asia; in Phrygia and Pamphylia; in Egypt and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene; and strangers of Rome, Jew and proselyte, Cretes and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongue the wonderful works of God."

The boundaries of the visible world have long since been pushed past the ancient Pillars of Hercules, and the sun never sets on the uplifted Cross of Christ.

As o'er each continent and island the dawn leads on another day,
The voice of prayer is never silent, nor dies the strain of praise away.

But our Lord still delays His second and more glorious coming, waiting upon our faith and upon our works to bring all men everywhere to the saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. We can of ourselves do nothing, but the Comforter is to teach us all things, and bring all things to our remembrance. Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together; is the admonition of St. Paul, and if the whole Christian world should seek once more to wait upon God, who would deny the possibility of a second descent of that Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost; and in even fuller and richer measure than before? With Christendom, in the person of its chosen representatives, ALL assembled, with ONE accord, in ONE place, what showers of blessing might not descend upon our thirsty souls? Even if no human word were spoken in that great house of assembly, still it would be good for us to have been there. Nor would we be sitting entirely apart and alone in our waiting upon God. An innumerable multitude would surround us on every side:

saints and prophets, the glorious company of the apostles, the noble army of martyrs; yea, even the high host of heaven, rank upon rank, tier upon tier; cherubim and seraphim; angels and archangels, thrones, dominations, prince-doms, virtues, powers.

Our part is but to come, to present ourselves, our souls and bodies to be a reasonable, holy and living sacrifice unto Him. Truly, we would do well to be silent that God may speak to us, if so be that He may incline His ear unto us and hear us; that He may make His face to shine upon us, and be gracious to us; that He may lift up the light of His countenance upon us, and give us peace, both now and evermore. Amen.

Religious Education in the Secondary Schools—II.

LAST week in our Educational Number we printed several answers to the following questions to the principals of a few of the secondary schools:

How much time should be given to religious training and the development of Christian character in our schools?

What are you doing along these lines for the pupils in your school?

The following are answers which came in too late for us to print last week, so we publish them now:

It seems to me that the first of the two questions must be answered somewhat differently by two groups of schools. Those which are frankly sectarian have a perfect right to spend as much time as they see fit in teaching the fundamentals of their peculiar beliefs. Patrons of such schools expect that they will treat the problem of religious instruction in their own way. On the other hand, the non-sectarian schools, by the very fact that they profess to be non-sectarian, give a promise to all that their methods of religious instruction will not be offensive to any. As it is difficult, if not impossible, to teach the fundamentals of religion without following the tenets of some particular form of religion, it seems wiser for the non-sectarian school to present its religious teaching generally, along with the ideas of morals, ethics and the commonly accepted ideals of Christianity. These things can be presented casually, as a rule, much better than formally. Every-day insistence by instructors and school leaders upon the value of the principles of honor, honesty, unselfishness, respect for the rights of others, and the like, will gain much more ground in the long run than formal lessons devoted to the consideration of such principles. Answering your first question, finally, I should say that in non-sectarian schools the only formal considerations of religious instruction and of character development should be in faculty meetings and in conferences with school leaders. Perhaps informal presentations might profitably be made in school assembly periods.

As to the second question, I may say that the work in our school closely follows the lines I have drawn above. We limit our Bible readings at morning exercises or in assembly to the Psalms. They satisfy all and disturb none. Usually, we have limited our prayers to the use of the Lord's Prayer, but this year we have used with great satisfaction to the boys a little volume called "A Book of Prayers for Boys."

I have talked occasionally. More often I have read from such things as Dean Charles R. Brown's talks to young men, Dr. Drury's "The Thoughts of Youth," or from some such volume.

Thus far, our activities in this field have been about as described above. The need for more cultivation of the field is apparent, however, and this year we shall try to do more and plan the work better. In general, however, we shall probably follow the direction I have indicated in this letter.

GEORGE E. CARMICHAEL,

Headmaster, Brunswick School, Greenwich, Conn.

Northfield Seminary has a very definite program for the religious education of girls. It has always placed special emphasis upon the development of Christian character as well as upon the highest standards of intellectual training. We do not wish to put our training into compartments, religious and secular, but to make everything in our curriculum minister to the building of character.

To quote Mr. D. L. Moody's own words, the high purpose of the school is "to help young women to lives which will count the most for the cause of Christ." Throughout the forty-five years of its existence this purpose has been consistently maintained.

The time given directly to religious training is as follows: Daily chapel services and morning and evening services on Sunday are held throughout the year, at which our students are expected to be present; two recitation periods each week are given to graded Bible study and all students are required to take one of these courses in Bible each term.

A morning "quiet time" and a brief prayer service in each hall after dinner at night have always been a part of the seminary schedule. Two of these prayer services each week in the halls are in charge of the students.

The emphasis upon Christian ideals is constantly kept before our pupils in as sane and wholesome a way as possible, the practical side of Christian living being dwelt upon rather than detailed doctrinal instruction.

The history of the school and of its alumnae justifies the principles incorporated into it by Mr. D. L. Moody and maintained by those who followed him.

In closing permit me to say that the response on the part of the students to the methods used has been very general and gratifying.

There seems to be a growing demand that schools, both public and private, give more attention to the development of character. During the past five years we have been giving our best thought to efficient methods of inculcating those habits and attitudes that lie at the foundation of character. We call this training for citizenship, but in reality it is character development of the broadest kind. We place our emphasis upon conduct rather than upon discussions of moral problems.

All the pupils of our junior and senior high schools are organized, through their Girls' League, for welfare work. There is no organization or activity in the school more important, in the pupils' opinion, than this. Several thousand dollars are raised each year through the girls' activities and a dozen or more of social agencies are helped. The keynote of it all is work for the welfare of others. In the elementary school the older pupils have their Civic League, which devotes fully half of its attention to similar interests. The general assembly of the school is regularly opened by devotional exercises of a simple kind.

An Interpretation of the Labor Movement—V.

Rev. F. Ernest Johnson

Director, Research Department, The Federal Council of Churches

V. IS LABOR RADICAL?

DURING a period of intense strife between employers and workers, such as that through which we have been passing, it is commonly heard that labor organizations are essentially revolutionary and destructive in their aims. During the railroad shopmen's strike, which is still continuing in some districts, the position was taken by many executives and widely supported in the press that the strike was "against the Government," that is, essentially revolutionary. Of course, this was untrue, since the Transportation Act allows both the railroads and the workers to accept or reject a decision of the Railroad Labor Board; the Pennsylvania Railroad is now availing itself of the same privilege. But the accusation illustrated the tendency toward an easy use of strong epithets during a heated controversy. Equally untrue is the statement commonly made, that labor's hostility to the use of the injunction in industrial disputes is essentially unpatriotic and disloyal. Resistance of an injunction granted by a lower court under conditions that other court decisions have declared unfair can hardly be called rebellion. The moral motives and the ultimate legal rights in the case must be taken into account before judgment can be pronounced. The Church has always maintained the right of resistance to civil authority on conscientious grounds. This would certainly apply in the case of a religious congregation which was denied the right to worship in its own way. It ought to be remembered, likewise, that labor's occasional hostility to the forms of government may sometimes be dictated by a conviction that these forms are standing in the way of the spirit of liberty.

The charge of radicalism is raised nowadays as a regular part of any campaign against a labor organization. During the Denver tramway strike of 1920, a comparatively orderly contest with the exception of the outbreaks precipitated by the presence of armed strikebreakers, it was widely advertised to the public of Denver that their city had become the Mecca of the most dangerous, vengeful and destructive elements to be found in American industry. Even in the printers' strike of 1921, which was not characterized by mass disturbances of any kind, a certain employers' organization sent out publicity charging dangerous radicalism against men who were conducting a regulation strike for a shorter working week. The cry of revolution must never be taken seriously without investigation.

As a matter of fact, radicalism in any organization is a matter of degree. Theoretically, it is always possible for a body which has economic or political power in its hands to do drastic, unprecedented things. No such organization, whether of labor or of capital, is far from the possibility of radical action; just as it may be said that no community is far from mob violence, given a conducive psychological situation and a provocation, real or imagined. From labor's point of view, a syndicate of bankers which used its power to interrupt the normal processes of economic life in a community in order to further the open shop movement would be radical; it would be the financial form of "direct action." This phrase does not denote a distinct type of action; rather it applies to any spontaneous resort to force, whether physical or economic. The strike has in it the elements of revolutionary action, and the same is true of the lockout. These mighty weapons may be employed in orderly fashion to attain ends commonly recognized as just; or they may be used in a way that is subversive of orderly government. In the same sense it might be said that Congress is potentially a revolutionary body because it may at any time, and sometimes does, pass drastic, perhaps confiscatory, legislation.

But there is a radical labor movement, or rather there are radical labor movements, properly so-called. As distinguished from the economic conservatism and orthodoxy of the American Federation of Labor, there are labor groups that look upon themselves as instruments of a new order, as agents of ultimate radical social change. The first such organization that comes to one's mind in America is the Industrial Workers of the World—I. W. W. It is an exponent of syndicalism—the organization of power in the community around industry rather than around the political entity known as the State. It would substitute direct action for political action; its creed is sometimes called industrial socialism. The I. W. W. repudiates craft unionism and advocates industrial unionism, a doctrine that may, however, be held quite without reference to revolutionary aims. But obviously only an industrial form of unionism puts enough workers under a single control to threaten seriously the stoppage of an entire industry. And only this basis of organization lends itself to the revolutionary ideal of the "One Big Union" of which much is heard during violent labor controversy in certain industries. Industrial unionism may be, often is, conservative, but it lends itself readily to drastic mass action.

It must be recognized, however, that the radicalism of the I. W. W. is largely a temperamental matter and is fostered by the semi-disinherited status of its membership. These nomads of the industrial world—these modern Ishmaelites—acquire no vested interest in society and have given no hostages to fortune. Many of them have no semblance of a permanent home. They are adventurous spirits who carry, many of them, an ideal of working class amelioration, of a more abundant life for the last man down. The I. W. W. has to its credit the consistent attempt to organize the unskilled workers whom the larger craft organizations have for the most part neglected. Yet the movement is without promise of great size or influence because its recruits are drawn from a class of workers whose size is limited—they are constantly being sucked up into the realm of stability and vested interest where they no longer find expressive of their true attitude the preamble and slogan of the I. W. W.: "The working class and the employing class have nothing in common." The possession of a permanent job and the ownership of a home are powerful deterrents from revolutionary tendencies.

Moreover, it should be said that the I. W. W. has officially denounced the practice of violence, whether on or off the job, asserting that "no principle was ever settled by such methods." It is probable that the organization has never been guilty of a tithe of the depredations that have been charged against it. At the same time its frank aim is the complete overthrow of the present economic order.

Much more important, however, than the I. W. W.—which is only a small storm cloud in the industrial sky—are the several powerful unions which have grown up in the last few years, particularly in the garment and textile trades, which have a strong working class psychology and which aim at ultimate and radical social change. These organizations are sometimes described by the term "the new unionism," because their aims are not confined to particular improvements in wages, hours and working conditions, but to the attainment of an entirely new status by the working class.

Foremost among these are the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, an organization only a few years old, largely Jewish and confined almost entirely to a few large cities, particularly in New York, Chicago, Baltimore and Rochester. This organization, under the brilliant leadership of Sidney Hillman, a young Russian Jew, has gained a place of pre-eminence in the industry, outranking the older "regular" organization in the A. F. of L.—the United Garment Workers of America. The Amalgamated enjoys during periods of industrial peace a reputation for enterprise, orderly participation in joint industrial control and fidelity to agreements. During a contest the preamble of their constitution is heralded from Dan to Beersheba as a slogan of attack upon the government. The fact is, the Amalgamated plainly declares that a "constant and unceasing" class struggle is being waged in industry, and that the proper aim of working class industrial organization is to "put the organized working class in actual control of the system of production, and the working class will then be ready to take possession of it." Strange to say, no one seems to take this declaration very seriously as a revolutionary threat, save during a controversy when it makes good campaign material. Perhaps this is because the emphasis is upon making the working class "ready" to take possession of industry. The Amalgamated is strong on efficiency, competence, knowledge. There is no place in its theory for obstructive or destructive tactics. Mr. Hillman once said, in effect, to a convention of his organization: "Your officers recognize their duty to protect you, but if you think that they are going to protect you from working, you are mistaken."

The entrance of labor unions into banking on a large scale is a new and significant departure, but hardly of a revolutionary sort. In one sense, the advocacy of nationalization of coal mines to which a considerable part of the membership of the United Mine Workers are committed, and the "Plumb Plan" for government ownership and joint control of the railroads are radical proposals. They look in the direction of socialism. On the other hand, such proposals, if adopted, would no more enthrone "revolutionary" ideals than does government ownership of the mail service give a red tint to that drab régime.

But what about "sabotage"—the limitation of output, the occasional slowing down of machines, sewing of left sleeves on to right shoulders and similar reprisal schemes of which labor organizations have been accused? Broadly speaking, there is but one answer, "Guilty as charged." But that answer explains nothing. From labor's point of view, taking the movement as a whole, the limitation of output is simply a way of seeing to it, first, that the job does not give out, and, secondly, that some equality shall be maintained between work done and compensation received. Of course, this attitude is as unsound as it is vexing to the employer. But let us consider for a moment. Recall the industrial situation toward the close of the war when every nerve was stretched and patriotic loyalty was translated in the workshops into the one word—produce! Now recall the situation immediately following the war when the wheels of industry stopped, glutted by goods that nervous hands had produced, but the most skilful salesmanship could not sell. This situation was brought on by the war, but it is in no sense peculiar to war periods. The recurring business cycles are notoriously characteristic of our industrial life. To the worker's mind such experiences are a clear justification for limiting output. Not infrequently they see the employer playing the same game, not maliciously, but because he, too, knows no other way. It must also be recognized that the workers are constantly impressed by the disparity between what is in their pay envelopes and what is distributed in dividends. The frequent smallness of the margin of profit they do not appreciate. The all but universal practice of secrecy on the part of employers as to their costs and profits has created the general impression in the workers' minds that "the company is rich." The experience with "piece work" has contributed to this same result. When production has run high there has been a tendency for wage rates to go down. In spite of the fact that statistics of our national income show a deficit as compared with the normal requirements of a hundred million people, no way has been devised to give the workers themselves so great a stake in industry and so thorough an understanding of its processes that they will always do their best.

But rarely indeed are obstructive and non-co-operative practices and attitudes on the part of labor an evidence of hostility to the existing industrial order. They do not constitute a conspiracy against capitalism; they have no political significance. The really radical unions are the least likely to employ such weapons. And as for the rank and file of American labor, it is conservative. No one knows this better than the leaders of radical movements.

COUNTRY CHURCH DEPARTMENT

The Religious No Man's Land

By Rev. B. F. Lamb

Secretary of the Ohio Federation of Churches

[The following article portrays a condition which, while not nationally true, does exist in large areas of the eastern central West.—EDITORS.]

THE above title is the appellation which seems best to fit a situation that has been discovered time and again in the course of the careful church survey of the State of Ohio now being completed under the auspices of the Ohio Federation of Churches. The "no man's land" thus revealed is an irregular belt of territory which surrounds many community centers and which is not adequately cared for by any church. In county seat towns and other centers the several active churches extend their influence only a short way beyond the thickly populated town district, and thus leave outside their sphere of influence a belt of territory of varying width and shape in which live many people in whose lives no church plays a really important part.

There was a time when the former open-country church covered this churchless belt of to-day, meeting the religious needs and demands of the population. This is no longer true in all cases. In many instances the open-country church has been abandoned, and in many others it has lost its grip upon the situation and is steadily declining in influence.

This whole problem, constituting one of the many interesting and important pieces of knowledge which the church survey of Ohio has brought to light, is a development of comparatively recent years and illustrates the transitional stage through which we are passing with respect to certain phases of church work.

Not the least of the causes for the growth of the religious no man's land has been the improvement of roads and the development of the automobile. Improved means of transportation have led the country resident to frequent the town or community center. A few years ago he went to town only once a week, once a month, or in extreme cases, once a year; to-day he often goes daily. Getting into his machine, he runs off to town for every little thing needed for business or pleasure. There, on business, he forms fellowships and friendships which have lasting qualities because they are built around substantial common interests. The result is that the rural resident goes to town to attend lodge meetings, ball games, picture shows and other social events. The consolidated school has also rightly accentuated the townward tendency. Many other causes have the same telling effect.

The result of these comparatively new influences is the development of a new community of interest centering about the town or village and the disintegration of the old community interest centering about the open-country church which one time met a variety of needs.

When purely religious activities served to satisfy every desire of the people the simple, one-roomed, poorly-equipped country church could command both support and loyalty and wielded a tremendous influence in its neighborhood. But to-day, with many more competing influences, it does not in all cases stand the test. Especially among young people has the old-fashioned country church lost much of its former influence—going to town to school and for social purposes, they demand a church more in keeping with the conditions with which they have become acquainted. If the younger generation in this territory is to be reached by the church it will be the church at the center that reaches them. They are interested in a going concern and they often fail to regard the small inactive country church as such. The town church, with its larger membership and variety of activities, has a stronger pull for the live young people. Furthermore, it is located where their interests outside of the home are centered.

Many signs indicate that churches of the early type will survive in steadily decreasing numbers. To be sure, the pastor of exceptional personality, energy and force can make the church succeed for a time, even though he has to work against social and economic forces that pull toward the town. But, in the long run, greater and more lasting results for the Kingdom could be achieved if the church program were worked in harmony with the natural and wholesome economic pull of the times.

"But," some one naturally inquires, "if the people of the country districts now go to town to school and for recreational purposes, do they not also go there to church and thus automatically solve the problem which has been presented?"

Unfortunately, not all of them do transfer their church allegiance to the town, as a study of the situation in many parts of Ohio clearly shows. A proportion of them do, it is true, and these are, as a rule, the former leaders in the open-country churches. When their support is withdrawn, the country church is abandoned or continues to struggle along in a devitalized kind of existence. As a result, the section of the country population which has not joined the town church is left without adequate church facilities. Many of this latter group ultimately become indifferent to church activities, and thus the condition evolves into what we have referred to as the "religious no man's land"—a belt of territory which no pastor counts as part of his parish.

In such churchless belts in Ohio live thousands of God's people without religious leadership.

The abandoned church, however, is not always a bad sign. It may be a sign of progress, just as the abandoned country school is a sign of progress. But it is such only when the church at the center reaches out and ministers unto the people living in this otherwise neglected area. Sad to say, the town church does not always do this; in fact, it seldom does. Too often the church in town has developed a self-satisfied air and is not aware of the transition which has come so suddenly—mostly within the last ten years.

What is needed, therefore, to wipe out this religious no man's land is an aggressive program on the part of the churches at the community center to reach out in every direction from the town to the extremes of the community—as far as the pull of the stores, the practice of the physicians, or the circle of friendships of the town residents—and minister unto those who live in the byways.

Someone will remark that the town churches are open to welcome the country resident. This is true. But more than that is needed. The church must go out and compel them to come in, not by physical force, of course, but by the force of a strong appeal, the compelling appeal of an aggressive church program which ministers unto them directly as part of the new and larger community.

I would not be understood as urging the abandonment of country churches. To the contrary, where the open-country church is maintaining its place of influence and promises to be able to continue it should be encouraged to do so and town pastors should recognize it and co-operate with it. I am insisting, however, that the church at the community center be prepared to care for the open-country people religiously when the open-country church does pass, as it is likely to do sooner or later, in many thickly settled States like Ohio, just as the old-time country school is going.

Pastors of town and village churches, have you thought of joining with your fellow pastors in the community for a house-to-house religious census of the tributary territory about you, to ascertain the possible existence of a real no man's land in your sphere of responsibility? Or, if in possession of enough facts already to convince you that such a situation exists, are you meeting it by developing an aggressive program that will carry the influence of your church out to these people who need it?

The religious no man's land around the town or village constitutes one of the big church problems of the rural territory to-day. The open-country church near the town is, in many cases, passing. Shall the influence of the church at large be allowed to die with it, or will the churches at the center enter its former territory, extending the arm of religious influence, sympathy, helpfulness and instruction out to these otherwise neglected people? It depends upon you, Mr. Town or Village Pastor.

Glimpses of South America

In spite of the growth of the evangelical work in Argentina, and the three co-operative schools conducted by Methodists and Disciples, co-operation in Argentina is still far behind what it is in most of the other countries of Latin America. It seems to me also that the practical application of our Christian program to the social and educational life of the country is also behind what it is in Mexico, Chile, Brazil, Porto Rico, etc. Outside of the Y. M. and Y. W. work there is practically no community institution. The Disciples are planning to organize one at the present time. As soon as churches enter this community work I am sure that a larger program of co-operation will be developed, for

I have noticed that a new spirit of service has always been followed by a new spirit of co-operation and vice versa.

You will be glad to know that the Uruguayan Minister of Foreign Affairs told me his government would subscribe for a number of copies of "La Nueva Democracia" to distribute among teachers and diplomatic officers. I had some three hours with Dr. Brum, who has just retired from the presidency. He is a leader in Pan-Americanism, the author of the project for an American League of Nations, and expects to give his time to these matters now. He promised to write for "La Nueva Democracia," and also to be on the editorial council, providing we formed one. I have the promise of several other leading men of South America to act on such a council. While such men might not do much actual advising, yet their names would mean much. I also talked over the work of the "La Nueva Democracia" with the President and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Argentina and of Uruguay. They all admire the paper and every day I believe more firmly in the opportunities before it. In all such questions as temperance, hygiene, labor problems, women's work, manual education, student movements, educational problems which were discussed at the Santiago Conference, "La Nueva Democracia" is the only publication ready to push them. The official Pan-American Union Bulletin will not, the local reviews neither will or can. We have a great opportunity here. I long for the spiritual forces of the United States to show through a large emphasis on these matters that our country does not consider Pan-Americanism as simply a movement to get commercial advantage in Latin America, but is for the development of those finer matters of the soul and mind, with the United States ready to unselfishly contribute her part. With a wise policy and a liberal support "La Nueva Democracia" can contribute more toward the promotion of these moral and social questions between now and the next conference in Havana in 1927 than any power I can think of.

I have just received a cable asking for an explanation of the failure of the Santiago Conference. I do not believe the Conference was a failure, as I have said in articles already sent. But I have cabled the following as an explanation of why no great big international program was marked out:

"It is not possible to regard the Santiago Conference as a failure, compared with the other Pan-American conferences, but it did fail to mark new roads for international co-operation. The reason for this was that the United States delegation was desirous of maintaining the status quo of the Pan-American Union concerning Pan-Americanism and to promote principally business relations, while Latin America was desirous of enlarging the movement to give the Union the function of settling inter-American problems, promoting cultural and social co-operation. Latin America has become stronger and is no longer satisfied that the Pan-American Union be dominated by the United States, promoting the latter's commercial program, while the United States is not ready to include political questions and renounce its pater-nity. Santiago lacked positive leadership. The United States took a negative stand in all matters referring to an American League of Nations; Latin America did likewise concerning matters tending to further the commercializing of Pan-Americanism. Latin America feels the right to be treated as 'grown-up' nations, but fears to oppose the United States because of the latter's financial preponderant influence. Mexico's absence from the Conference, because one of the twenty American nations failed to recognize her government, was a constant reminder at the Conference of the preponderance of the United States and promoted secret opposition. The American delegation seemed to fail to understand the situation, interpreting diplomatic acquiescence as approval, Fletcher declaring that they had accomplished everything desired."

The Webbs Indict Capitalism*

THOSE distinguished British economists, Sidney and Beatrice Webb, who are responsible for a good deal of the thought and the platform behind the British Labor Party, have concentrated their attack upon capitalism. They call their volume "The Decay of Capitalist Civilization," and marshal all the possible arguments and evidence to prove that it is decaying.

What do they mean by capitalism? Let the Webbs answer: "By the term capitalism, or the capitalist system, or as we prefer, the capitalist civilization, we mean the particular stage in the development of industry and legal institutions in which the bulk of the workers find themselves divorced from the ownership of the instruments of production, in such a way as to pass into the position of wage-earners, whose subsistence, security and personal freedom seem dependent on the will of a relatively small proportion of the nation, namely, those who own, and through their legal ownership control, the organization of the land, the machinery and the labor force of the community, and do so with the object of making for themselves individual and private gains."

In other words, capitalism, as they define it, is comparatively new in the world's history. Its beginnings are noted in England two centuries ago at the earliest. It has been in evidence in the United States for only three or four generations. Capitalism is practically synonymous with the industrial revolution. The old agrarian system was not capitalistic. The trade of Palestine in the days of Jesus was not capitalistic. The caravans that he saw were a part of another system. The manufacture of the towns in the middle ages was something different. We believe it was different in its aspects, manifestations and organization, but we are afraid that a good many economists do not accept the Webbs' definition and would contend that the people of Greece and Rome lived in a capitalistic order and that the grip of the economic motive on them was as great as it is on the people of England and the United States to-day.

Capitalism, say the Webbs, has caused widespread poverty and destitution. We believe it would be fairer to say that poverty has gone on under what the Webbs call capitalism very much as it did before. Next, there is the great inequality of income. No doubt this is a distressing evil, but there was also inequality in agrarianism and the apprenticeship which preceded machine manufacture. There is gross inequality in agriculture to-day, as every farm management survey has shown.

There is inequality in personal freedom. True again, but again this is a holdover. We believe it would be hard to prove that there is less personal freedom in England and the United States to-day than there was in the countries under feudalism. We prefer the freedom under capitalism to that under feudalism, though we deplore the widespread cruelty and undesirability of many conditions under the capitalistic system.

The capitalistic system has been the cause of war, say the authors. Modern imperialism appears to us as one of the great causes of war, but is it in its essence any different from the economic competition which caused wars from the days of Ulysses to Charlemagne? War has an economic basis. It depends upon competition for "iron and sauerkraut," contend many historians in the ancient or the modern world, but is it logical unduly to blame this "new capitalism" as the Webbs define it?

But we must come to the reasons given for the decay of the capitalism civilization. After a chapter on "The Initial Success of the Capitalistic System"—in which it is pointed out that up to toward the early part of the nineteenth century there was a beneficial increase in production—the Webbs turn to point out the reasons for their belief in "The Eventual Failure of Capitalism." Profit-making is an inherent weakness. The profit-maker, they say, is "led to damage and destroy, not only the most valuable of the instruments of production, but also some of those that are irreparable." Huge quantities of natural resources have been ruined. The waste is appalling. Adulteration, substitution, and so on, have been resorted to in the "worsening" of commodities. Much gain of wealth is possible without production of goods. The growth of middlemen has burdened consumers and producers. Overproduction causes much distress and disorganization. The competitive system means increases in the costs of goods. The growth of monopolies has been pernicious. There has come a divorce of brain workers from the instruments of production which has resulted in an undesirably large middle or professional class. The few who control property have an undue power over the many, and so on.

In the preface Mr. and Mrs. Webb warn that the purpose of the book was not to supply a plan of reconstruction: it is to point out why they believe the capitalistic system as they define it is passing, and undoubtedly most of the indictments they hurl against capitalism can be sustained. The present economic order is being and will be modified so that one can probably truthfully say that the capitalistic system, as we know it, is passing. Of course, it will and should change. But this stimulating book could have been much more valuable if the authors would have been more historical and logical and would have indicated some of the positive elements in the changes which are even now taking place.

"The whole creation groaneth and travaileth"—for what? For the manifestation of the sons of God." The lives and acts of good men are the adequate return for all outlay, the satisfying fruit.—Marcus Dods.

Israel, a Missionary Nation

Ex. 19:1-6; Is. 43:9-11; 45:20-22.

"Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation."—Ex. 19:6.

NOT always is it given to a nation to know its own ideal. In the majority of cases the people are swept along on the tide of circumstance, unconscious of the forces—political, economic, religious—which shape their character and destiny. Nations as a rule are unmindful of any objective beyond their own security and prosperity. It is doubtful if the people of Greece understood their greatness or appreciated even remotely the vast contribution they were to make to the world's thought and life. The one thing that might have prevented the disintegration of ancient Greece was a consciousness of a mission to mankind. They were the most intellectual of all people, but they were unable to discern the brightness of their rising.

We speak of the militaristic designs of the Germans and of their settled purpose to impose their kultur upon the rest of the world; yet it is doubtful if the people at large ever formulated such a purpose, or that they would have acknowledged a program of military conquest had it been pressed upon their attention from within or without. It would appear they allowed themselves to be drawn unconsciously under the influence of godless and unscrupulous men. The picture of an essentially noble people drifting into a state of self-satisfied imperialism is one the world is not likely to banish from its mind.

The consciousness of a high national purpose may not save a state from destruction or declension, but it should prove no mean factor in holding the people true when lower considerations come to the front. It was a great thing for the United States that in the crisis of our civil war Lincoln could declare that our nation had been "dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

Among all the nations of the earth Israel stands out preeminently as the one which knew the call of God, a people with an acknowledged ideal and mission. "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation," was the word Moses brought down from God in the mount. This came at the time when Israel was emerging into a strong self-consciousness; when the twelve tribes were about to become a political entity; when, preparatory to entering into a land of their own, a code of laws was being drawn up for the political and moral guidance of the new state. The assertion of a purpose for a nation at such a moment was highly significant; the assertion of a purpose for that particular nation was an epoch-making event.

"A kingdom of priests, a holy nation"—this was something new in history. There had been kingdoms of warriors, kingdoms of artisans, kingdoms of agriculturists, even kingdoms of scholars; but who ever had heard of a kingdom of priests—an entire people set apart for the service of God, an ideal of character which should apply not only to ecclesiastics, but to the population at large? Yes, it was new, and it was glorious. No one can understand the history of Israel or properly relate this history to the life of the world without recognizing the national ideal as distinctly religious.

Two things were involved: the leadership of God in national affairs and the service of mankind as the great objective. They were to be a kingdom not because later on there were to be kings like Saul, David and Hezekiah, but because God himself was to be king. Whoever—be he judge, prophet or king—might emerge as ruler, was to hold sway not in his own right, but as the deputy of God. The name Jehovah, we are told, was selected as signifying God's claim upon this people as His very own, and their claim upon God as the director of all their affairs. The relationship was to be unique. Other nations have been quick and eager to assume this same theocratic foundation. The doctrine of the divine right of kings, which has played such a tremendous part in human affairs and which persists to our day, harks back to Sinai for its justification. But God appears to have ordained that just one people should wear the divine crown.

The reason for God's choice of one people is clear when we consider that priesthood involved not only worship but service. And since the entire nation was to take on the form of a servant its field of operations could be none else than the other nations of earth. Israel was set apart for the theocratic idea in order that, being brought into peculiar and direct relations with God, her people, one and all, from the king down to the humblest peasant, might be enabled to interpret God to the outside world. They were to be a nation of teachers, with the human race attending their school. They were to be the almoners of humanity, the middle men of the divine economy. They were to be the foreign missionaries of Jehovah. On no other ground could there be any justification for one nation receiving such signal favors from the God of all the earth. The Gentile world was entitled to look on and behold God's grace poured out upon Israel in full expectation that these favors would be shared in the spirit of grateful responsibility.

Do we realize how deeply the missionary ideal was embedded in Israel's literature and life? It is not something vaguely hinted or occasionally expressed in the Old Testament books. It was a conception which grew with the growing sense of Israel's God as the one and only God; but it was not the exclusive thought of one or two prophetic, world-visioned souls. It crops out in the sacred writings all the way from Genesis to Malachi. It appears in the story of Abraham, who may be called the first missionary, since, under the command of God, he went out from his country and his father's house, to a strange land, in order that he might be a blessing to "all the families of the earth." As we have already seen, it is the foundation idea of the national constitution given at Sinai. It worked itself into the hymn-book of the Jews, since the Psalms are full of missionary allusions and exhortations. Four of these lyrics, the forty-seventh, sixty-seventh, seventy-second and one hundredth, are missionary to the core. They were to the Israelitish Church what "From Greenland's icy mountains," "Fling out the banner," "O Zion, haste," are to the Church of to-day. When Commodore Perry on that Sunday in 1853 sailed into the harbor of Yeddo, for the purpose of opening the ports of Japan to the commerce and civilization of the world, we read that he spread the United States flag over the capstan of his vessel, and summoning the crew he read the One Hundredth Psalm, and, his men joining with him, sang from Kethe's version

"All people that on earth do dwell.

Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice.

Him serve with mirth, his praise forth tell.

Come ye before him and rejoice."

And as for the Sixty-seventh Psalm, we might well call it the International Psalm. It would make a fine text for the outlook of our own nation upon the world to-day, since it so perfectly expresses the balance between nationalism and internationalism. It begins with a prayer for God's blessing upon ourselves: "God be merciful unto us, and bless us." Then it sends that prayer out into the world that all people may know and enjoy the goodness of God: "That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." Then it shows how the blessing will return upon ourselves in double measure of prosperity and peace: "God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." The man who objects to America's sending money or men to the distant parts of the earth on the ground that there is so much to do at home is about twenty-five hundred years behind the times. Such a man may well be rebuked by the world-encircling vision and purpose of the author of this patriotic hymn written hundreds of years before Christ.

But it is when we turn to the prophets that we realize how the missionary ideal had gripped the hearts of the great thinkers of Israel. Jeremiah tells how before his birth God sanctified and ordained him as "a prophet unto the nations" (Jer. 1:5). In a glowing passage he says, "And thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness; and the nations shall bless themselves in him, and in him shall they glory" (Jer. 4:2). Right faithfully did Jeremiah carry out his world commission, since many of his noblest utterances were directed as warnings or exhortations to Israel's neighbors and even to nations far away.

When the minister to-day prepares for a missionary service and seeks some appropriate passage from the Bible, where does he turn? He may select the Great Commission in St. Matthew's Gospel, or St. Luke's account of the sending out of the Seventy; or he may read from one of the stories in the book of Acts telling of the spread of the Church in the days of the apostles. But it is more than likely he will turn to Isaiah and read one of those sublime passages in which the Prophet of the Exile pictured Israel, restored and refined, proclaiming the goodness of her salvation to the darkened world: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising" (Is. 60:1-3). Missionary literature has not produced a more beautiful picture than that of the nations from near and far, and even the distant isles hastening to Jerusalem that they may learn the truth of Israel's God: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as doves to their windows?" (Is. 60:8).

If we turn to the first part of the book, which we have come to think of as first Isaiah, we find that exquisite hymn-prophecy of the thirty-fifth chapter: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." If we pass to second Isaiah we find the world ideal breaking out in glowing imagery and longing expression on nearly every page. Israel is a servant nation. Israel is a witnessing nation. Jerusalem is to be the spiritual capital of the world. The prophet presents Jehovah chiding his people because they are not ambitious enough to enter into the larger plans of God. "And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth" (Is. 49:6).

Yes, Israel was a missionary nation, in the fullest and deepest sense of the word, if the witness of her great souls became the ideals of the people at large. Alas! we know this was not the case. At no time during her long history do we find the nation as such accepting her mission to the world. Self-aggrandizement, material prosperity, conquest, came to dominate her life much as they did the life of the other nations of earth. The struggle of the early prophets was to keep Israel true to Jehovah even as a national duty. Religious declension, periods of apostasy, lapses into idolatry, stain the pages of her history. It is a testimony to the depth of the missionary ideal and conviction that it persisted in spite of popular unbelief. It may be claimed, when the Northern Kingdom had been wiped out and the nation had been reduced practically to the tribe of Judah, when Judah was in captivity to the Babylonians, and her capital lay in ruins, that the shattered remnant of the people took up the ideal of a spiritual Israel, serving the world, as expressing the original purpose of God. It may be argued by some that in adversity Israel came to understand and accept her mission as she had not when her kings sat proudly on the throne of David.

There are no means of knowing to what extent the ideals of the psalmists and prophets became the creed of the people in those days. Possibly there was a measure of conversion to their noble interpretation of Israel's destiny. What we are sure of is that when Jerusalem was restored and the national life resumed, when once again there was a throne and a temple, there set in an era of pride and self-conceit unequalled in history. When Christ came upon the scene some five centuries later, fulfilling the visions of the prophets, and offering to lead his people out into their mission for all mankind, he found a nation steeped in exclusiveness and self-esteem. Their characteristic attitude towards the outside world was bitterness and scorn.

It is the tragedy of history—a great people gone utterly wrong—the noblest ideals, the highest honor, the climax of greatness trodden under foot. Christ on the cross is the answer of Israel to the call of God. No, Israel was not a missionary nation. She was a slacker nation, a people in rebellion against the divine will.

In all the sayings of Jesus is there a more solemn passage than that of the parable of "The Wicked Husbandmen," in which the kingdom of heaven is likened to a householder who let out his vineyard to men who not only refused the owner his share of the fruits but who abused his agents and murdered his son? It is the one parable in which our Lord places nationalism in a strong light as a blessing or evil to mankind. When Jesus asked the Jewish leaders what the lord of the vineyard would do unto those husbandmen, they replied, "He will miserably destroy those wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their season." Out of their own mouths Jesus pronounced his verdict: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

Nineteen centuries have passed, and as we read history to-day, we see how the ideal rejected by Israel has been kept alive by the Church. Wherever the Bible has gone there has gone the divine thought of nationality—nationality for world service. Through the centuries, whether men have heeded or not, this ideal has lived and glowed on the pages of God's Holy Word. Once given to the world it could never sink out of sight. What Israel's people denied, Israel's literature has preached to the ends of the earth. There is no finer evidence of the inspiration of the Old Testament writings than this sublime conception of a nation's worth to God.

To no one nation has God given an exclusive right in this matter. There has been no successor to Israel as the ambassador of grace. The call comes to Christian peoples everywhere and the door of the world is open. The only discrimination is in favor of those who have received the most. The saying of our Lord, "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required," applies to nations as to individuals, and is the basis of God's call to Great Britain, France, Germany, the United States of America, and all the rest to-day. The American who cannot see that on this score God demands of us that we become an essentially missionary people, that God expects us to lead off in the task of winning the world to Christ, is blind to the plainest facts and the most compelling providences of the modern world. May God preserve America from the tragedy of a refusal like that of the Israelitish nation of old!

"It was because of the very obvious need for such an undertaking that the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Associations in 1916 organized the Hollywood Studio Club as a demonstration of what could be done to make life more nearly normal for the young screen actresses who have yet to 'arrive,' as well as to care for the transient victims of movie madness until they can be returned to their homes or diverted to some other line of work.

"That the demonstration has proved a success beyond all question is shown, I believe, by the whole-hearted support of the motion picture industry in the club's campaign for a new $150,000 building, undertaken with the hearty approval of Will H. Hays, president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America. Mr. Hays, to whom the national board appealed for advice as to the club's future, not only announced that he would back any effort of the board for the extension of the club's service to the Hollywood girls, but proceeded to make good his word. He has been able to pledge his association's resources in an effort to furnish $120,000, a large part of which already has been raised through the Hollywood studios. In this he backed the producers, headed by Charles Christie.

"Last fall Mr. Hays visited Hollywood, studied the club, its standing, and how it was serving the community. He became convinced of its necessity from a sociological viewpoint. The residence community of Hollywood has likewise shown its belief in the work of the club by raising $31,000 toward the fund in a ten-day campaign. Plans for the new building, with accommodations for one hundred residents instead of twenty, will enable the club to operate on a self-supporting basis. Building will be begun immediately on completion of the fund of $150,000.

"Many girls go to Hollywood, despite discouragement from the industry and the club, who are obviously unfitted to act for the screen. These the club director steers into other lines of work. Occasionally there is a clerical vacancy with one of the producing companies.

"One girl learned hair-dressing and now specializes in coiffures for the lesser women stars. Another has turned nurse girl for the children of a motion picture actress and is continuing her schooling in the evenings.

Often there is nothing to do but to show the girl that the best thing is to return home. And this is done so tactfully by the director that much of the seemingly inevitable heartbreak is avoided.

"The most cordial relations have existed from the beginning between the club and the studios, and when Mr. Hays remarked at a luncheon last spring that he considered the club 'Exhibit A' in his plans for the welfare of those working in the motion picture industry I feel that he was, in a measure, expressing in words what the producers themselves have so often expressed in other ways. I think they feel that the club is doing a valuable piece of work in removing from the public mind unpleasant impressions, frequently ill-founded, of the life led by the young actresses of Hollywood."

PEDAGOGIC SURVEY INITIATED

At a recent conference participated in by representatives of the National Education Association and of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, the following four-point program was adopted:

(a) The motion picture companies are to survey the material now in their vaults to determine what subjects are capable of being adapted for class-room use.

(b) Representatives of the National Education Association and of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America are to co-operate in the production of an experimental pedagogic picture.

(c) The National Education Association is to make a survey of existing school facilities, with the idea of suggesting ways and means of distributing educational films when they are available.

(d) The National Education Association is to study and make recommendations concerning the use of pictures as a visual aid to instruction in the class-room.

The Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America have also contributed a sum of money to be used in paying expenses incurred by the National Education Association in making these various studies, and have offered, in addition, facilities of the industry in the experimental work which is to follow.

MISSION LOSSES IN JAPAN

While almost no missionaries lost their lives in the Japanese disaster, a great deal of missionary and church property was ruined. Colleges, boys' and girls' schools, churches, kindergartens, Y. M. C. A. buildings, missionary residences were shaken down and burned. In Yokohama two or more splendid churches of Christ must have been ruined. The Kaigan church there was the first church founded in Japan. It celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in October, 1922. Ferris Seminary of the Reformed Church in America, the Kyoritsu Girls' School and the Bible Training School of the Missionary Union, the Methodists' Girls' School. In Tokyo the Baptists lost the Baptist Tabernacle and the Sarah Curtis Home School for Girls, and in Yokohama the Mabie Memorial School for Boys. Scott Hall at Waseda University, Tokyo, was damaged but not entirely destroyed and five of their mission residences are reported damaged. They have started a fund of $500,000 to replace the lost property. The Lutherans do not yet know the extent of their losses. Probably no church suffered a greater loss than did the American Episcopalians, whose whole work in Japan was in Tokyo. St. Luke's International Hospital, St. Margaret's School for Girls, St. Paul's Little School for Boys, Trinity Cathedral and the bishop's house, as well as the offices of the missionary district and the residences of all the clergy, physicians and workers attached to the schools and hospitals were completely destroyed. The Episcopalians estimate that it would take $2,000,000 to replace what they have lost. They are starting an immediate campaign to raise a quarter of that amount. Of course the losses encountered by all the missions include a great deal of personal property from missionary homes. Most of that property was probably uninsured. The disaster calls attention to the need of providing the missionaries with adequate residences. No building can be secure against such an earthquake as that which Japan experienced this month, but buildings may be made fairly fireproof. Japan emergency relief funds, started by almost all of the boards, are being used for the relief of missionaries who have lost household furniture and other personal effects, for the relief of Japanese pastors and teachers, for the restoration of destroyed and damaged mission property and other assistance through the Japanese churches in their relief work. The Methodists have already cabled $30,000 and talk of raising a total fund of $1,000,000 for Japan. The Reformed Church has sent $5,000, which must be raised here in America. The Presbyterian fund at this writing amounts to $8,254, of which it is worth noting that $724 came from California.

FACISMO IN SPAIN

The Spaniards have been extremely unfortunate in their campaign against the Moors. For two years they have tried in vain to conquer Abdul Krim and to assert authority throughout the part of Morocco supposed to be a Spanish protectorate. Now the whole country is pretty well sick of the Morocco adventure, with its cost both in blood and treasure. Spain also has felt that the first interest of her political leaders was themselves and not Spain. Last week, Tuesday, the Governor General of Barcelona, General Primo Rivra, Marquis de Estella, announced that the military had seized the government. Apparently, the civil administration offered no resistance. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Don Santiago Alba, against whom charges were made of profiting privately through his official position, is charged with increasing the subsidy to Raisuli and other Moroccan chiefs from two million pesetas to twenty million, with accepting huge fees from the tobacco smugglers, and with complicity in smuggling French armament into the Spanish zone in Morocco. Neither did Senor Alba's forcing of his wife into the best circles of aristocratic Spanish society sit well with the Spanish grandes. On news of the coup d'etat Don Alba promptly fled the country. When Alfonso refused to order the arrest of the military conspirators the Cabinet resigned. Alfonso summoned Rivera to Madrid and, acting on his suggestion, suspended all the Cabinet offices except the ministries of War and Marine and altered the form of government to a military directorate, with General Rivera at its head. General Rivera suspended the Cortes and announced that he would call a new one, which might be a constituent assembly. He promises to retrieve the honor of Spanish arms in Morocco, but to respect the Spanish treaty with Raisuli. He also declares that he is a friend of the workingman. The revolution was in part directed against the separatist movement which has been so strong in Barcelona. Communists and Bolshevist leaders in that city have been arrested. The average man in the street in Spain, it would appear, is more or less indifferent to the whole affair, a little dizzy at the swift alteration in the form of government, skeptical of the promises of a new heaven and a new earth, but not wholly displeased that the old rascals are out of office. Through it all, it would appear, the king is as popular as ever.

THE AIR LEVIATHAN

In the past the United States has been rather backward in the development of the dirigible airship. Before and during the war Germany with her Zeppelins led the whole world in that division of air transportation. In the latter part of the war and since then the emphasis in air development has been on the plane. The two dirigibles which our government has acquired or been about to acquire have both suffered disastrous accidents. The Roma burned on its first voyage. The ZR-2 never reached this country, but met with disaster in England before she was turned over to the American navy crew. But the dirigible has not a few advantages over the plane. It can transport a larger number of people and a greater load in much greater comfort and for a far wider radius of travel. New York and Philadelphia and the cities in New Jersey craned their necks last week at the Navy's new great airship, the ZR-1, 650 feet long, traveling above them at the rate of forty miles an hour with only two of her seven propellers running. The frame work of the new airship is duralumin, a new, very light and very strong metal. Its twenty gas cells were filled with 2,150,000 cubic feet of helium, extracted at Fort Worth, Texas. The vessel has a range of 4,300 miles. She can be used for exploration in places quite inaccessible to-day. It is announced that the Navy expects to send her in time to the North Pole. Such a voyage would not be merely a stunt. Aerial experts are extremely interested in the Arctic regions because, if it is possible for airships and airplanes to pass over them, the distances between many of the great cities of the world will be virtually cut in two. London by the present routes of travel is ten thousand miles from Tokyo. Across the Arctic it is six thousand. It would be a very simple thing for the ZR-1 to hover over Mount Everest. Such a ship would bring Australia within five days instead of the five weeks required now for the voyage. We are probably on the way to a change in our ideas as to the time-distance between different points on the globe as great as came about with the substitution of steam for wind in the propulsion of vessels.

THE CONFERENCE OF THE FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION

The Fellowship of Reconciliation stood out during the war as one of the little bodies of men who obeyed Jesus sufficiently well to love their enemies. Since the war it has continued its work as leaven in society. Its annual conference at Belmar, New Jersey, this month stirred one's heart because in it was the spirit of humility and the hunger and thirst for righteousness that ought to characterize every conference of Christians. About a hundred and fifty delegates were present. While most of them came from the Eastern States, there were enough from other sections of the country to make the conference really representative. All of the sessions were discussion sessions. They were opened by special speakers, but these speakers had been warned that their business was not to lecture an audience, but to lead a group in thinking through problems which the group deemed vital. The most pressing of these problems was the one the conference met primarily to consider—How can fellowship be spread? Many a man believing with his whole soul in the "social gospel" has felt that somehow it lacked a certain drive, a "punch," which the old evangelism had. Many of us have wished for a Billy Sunday with the good news of social and economic regeneration. There is need to-day for a social evangelism with power to turn the profiteers to repentance. There is need, too, for a synthesis of the personal gospel and the social gospel so that all can see that there is really but one gospel, and that gospel powerful to save. Inevitably, the conference faced the problem as to what could be done to preach fellowship through example. That meant a discussion of our standard of living. How much can a man conscientiously spend upon himself? Is America justified in holding to a higher standard than other nations can afford? What, after all, is a high standard? These questions were not answered fully and completely, but those who attended the conference were brought to realize more forcibly than before that we have not simplified our lives as we could and should. As Scott Nearing remarked, "We still insist on too many plates under our grape fruit—we want too much service." Dr. Hertha Krause, of Germany, told the conference of the difficulties there. She did not dwell on the physical suffering, but on that which is often forgotten—the mental and spiritual. She told of meetings given up for lack of carfare to reach them; the abandonment of friendly social gatherings for lack of fuel; no new books in the libraries; magazines becoming fewer and fewer; mental and spiritual life dying. The conference insisted on giving, and giving at once. About $1,800 was subscribed on the spot. On Sunday morning there was a service of worship carried on after the style of the Quakers. For most of those present it was the high point of the meeting. One felt God. The climax of this service was a remarkable address by A. J. Musté of Brookwood Workers' College. Mr. Musté is an embodiment of the social gospel. He has thrown himself into the struggles of the workers with all the energy of his intense nature. He knows the cold economic facts, yet his message glowed with spiritual fervor. He pointed out that men from the dawn of history and millenniums before have come together as social creatures, and when they come there is fellowship, there is God. The two go hand in hand. Indeed, there is fellowship in God himself, a truth that the doctrine of the Trinity was meant to express. His analysis of the civilization of to-day was searching and convincing. His remedy, Christ's religion of fellowship and reconciliation, was repeated with power. Mr. Musté made a real contribution to the thinking of the conference. But the outstanding lesson for most of us was that co-operative thinking offers the best method of solving the perplexing problems of to-day.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

PRIZE FIGHTS AND THE PUBLIC

Eighty-five thousand people paid one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars last week in New York to see two big men pound each other with fists cased in five-ounce gloves. Twenty-five thousand other people would have been glad to have bought tickets. They crowded and rushed and almost tore each other's clothes in trying to get the opportunity to buy the tickets. What does it all mean? The American Board has been hard put to it to find two hundred and fifty thousand dollars this summer to meet a probable deficit. The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has sent out a bitter call for help by reason of its need of one and a half million dollars. There are good causes galore which need the impetus of money in order to bring vital blessings to millions of people, and yet find it almost impossible to get funds even to keep them in some sort of dying existence. Why the difficulty when there are such treasures of money which can be tapped by chewing gum and powder and movies and prize fights? Is not a part of the trouble the familiar lack of imagination? People do not know or understand the difference that may be wrought in the life of a Hindu child by the blessing of an education in a Christian school. To be sure, the prize fight has a very primitive appeal. Among the spectators at the Polo Grounds in New York when the American champion, "Jack" Dempsey, knocked out the Argentinian challenger, Luis Angel (!) Firpo were men whose names are known throughout this country in account of their wealth and position. Then, of course, there was a multitude of primitive-minded and rather unintelligent men—and women—present also. But all of our ancestors have fought fist to fist in days sufficiently far distant. The racial memory of hand-to-hand fighting makes the appeal of the prize fight to-day reach all but the more gently civilized. Certainly we need a different training as to the profitable use of money, as well as a different conception of pleasure.

THE NEW YORK NEWSPAPER STRIKE

New York City this past week has been served by a unique form of newspaper, headed "The Combined New York Morning (or Evening) Newspapers." The pressmen of the city papers had an agreement with the publishers which ran out on September 1. Their officers undertook to work out a new compact with the publishers which should reduce hours, increase the men's wages and change some conditions of their employment, but after two weeks no new agreement had been made. In the absence of their president, Major George L. Berry, who had promised to report that night, the union of web pressmen September 17th unexpectedly took a vote which committed them to a strike. Such a vote was contrary to the agreement which the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union had made with the newspaper publishers. Mr. Berry promptly declared that the strike was illegal. He negotiated a new agreement with the publishers which cut down the hours of work for day men from forty-eight to forty-five and for night men from forty-eight to forty-one and increased wages by three dollars a week. Under the new agreement the minimum weekly wage for journeymen on day work is $48, on night work $51. The men in charge of presses receive $54 on the day shift and $57 on the night. When we consider that these wages make the journeymen receive very considerably more than did the heroes for science who were killed in the laboratory explosion at Washington last week, we realize how desirable the agreement was. But the New York pressmen would not consider the agreement. President Berry thereupon outlawed the union and announced that the International Printing Pressmen's Union would charge itself with seeing that the New York newspapers were supplied with men to run the presses. "We will stop the other newspapers, if necessary," Major Berry said, "to print newspapers in New York City normally." It is a good thing to see the officers of unions with the courage to fight against the breaking of contracts by their unions. Major Berry characterized the action of the newspaper pressmen as strongly as could any outsider. "This union," he said, "has violated the law of the parent body willfully and without hesitancy, and they are going to, and are now suffering the consequences of attempting to do business by and through the instrumentality of force and the big stick." At the same time that one feels that the union is rightly condemned, he has a disquieting sensation that perhaps we do not hear both sides of the question. The Associated Press itself very honestly tries to be perfectly neutral in its dispatches. The teaching that it is the reporter's business to give facts and not opinions is dinned into the ears of the reporters on the best papers. Nevertheless, it remains difficult for those who do not know events at first hand to feel sure just what the facts of any dispute are.

THE PASSING OF THE JULIAN CALENDAR

The old Romans understood the length of the year pretty well. But the religious authorities, who had control of its length through their right to order the intercalary months, played politics with the calendar. They had got the year three months out of focus in the days of Julius Cæsar. With the advice of a good astronomer, Cæsar set the year to rights. He started off with a year 445 days long. That was in 46 B.C. After that the years were regular, with 365 days apiece, except every fourth year, which had 366. As everyone knows, that arrangement made the average year a little too long. When Gregory XIII was Pope the vernal equinox fell on the eleventh of March instead of the twenty-first, as it had at the Council of Nicea. Gregory, with an eye to his future fame, reformed the calendar according to the system worked out by Aloysius Lilius, or Luigi Lilio Ghiraldi, of Naples. The southern Roman Catholic countries and the Roman Catholic states in Germany immediately followed the Pope's decree. Protestant Germany adopted the new calendar in 1700, and Denmark and Sweden did so about the same time. But England waited one hundred and seventy years before she adopted it. The Gregorian Calendar had a little flavor of Roman Catholicism to the average English mind. In 1752 the English dropped ten days from their calendar and changed the first of their year from March 25th to January 1st, as Scotland had done in 1600. The Eastern churches have held by the Julian Calendar because of their observance of Leap Year in 1700, 1800 and 1900, their calendar is now thirteen days behind the rest of Christendom. One of the measures adopted by the new government of Russia was to make the western calendar official in 1918. Rumania and Serbia followed suit in 1919. That left Bulgaria, Greece and the Greek Orthodox Church as the only adherents to the older system. Last spring the Pan-Orthodox Conference of the various branches of the Eastern Orthodox Church voted to abandon officially the Julian calendar. The Eastern Christians go to sleep on their September 30th and the next morning will wake on October 14th. From that time practically all Christendom will observe the same calendar. The Ruthinian Catholics, or Uniates, a body of some eight million people who live chiefly in the Russian Ukraine and in neighboring regions, will be left the only people in Europe to hold by the old calendar. Such is their dislike of their Greek and Roman Catholic neighbors that they do not even want the same festival days. The Gregorian (Armenian) Church expects soon to fall into line. The change is a mark of the new unity of the world in which we live.

THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

On page 376 we print the answers of representative ministers to the charges brought by labor leaders against the Church and printed in a symposium on page 244 of THE CHRISTIAN WORK of August 25th. The answers are naturally not so illuminating to people of the Church as were the expressions of the labor leaders, but they are valuable because they afford some index of the present ecclesiastical mind. It is a fairly common human habit to repel criticism, to insist that it is not merited. We are altogether too likely to forget that when the other person makes some disparaging observation he is only reporting how things look to him. If the labor leader thinks that the Church is flabby on industrial questions and is controlled by the point of view of the heaviest contributors to its financial support, we must remember that the Church somehow has given the labor leader that impression. It is becoming, then, for the Church to ask why. A good many of the replies given by the ministers to the labor leaders' charges are disappointing, in that they do not sound so open minded, so eager for light, as we wish they did. We churchmen ought to be the most teachable minded of men, ready to consider dispassionately every suggestion as to our shortcomings, eager to make the Church the minister of humanity. If we lived up to the ideas to which the Church is committed by its very constitution, there is no doubt that we should have an effect on labor questions. The principles of Jesus would solve economic troubles just as they will solve our international troubles or our family troubles. If in our factories and our mines, on our railroads and in our offices, we worked out in every-day practice a regard for the other man equal to the regard which we take for ourselves, our difficulties would fade away. If not only in the wage envelope, but in the matter of management and in economic security, we all sought the interest of everybody, not desiring to have more than our share, but determined that others shall have the assurance of the primary blessings which we ourselves want, then with the passing of years contentment and sense of brotherhood would grow. Suppose the Church refused to take into its membership any business man who would not commit himself to making an honest attempt to carry out the principles of Jesus in his business, would not the atmosphere of our churches very greatly change? Yet that is exactly the position that the Church must take if it is not to stultify itself. When a business man says he is a Christian, and that he believes in Jesus Christ, he must mean that he believes in the principles of Jesus for shop management, for the fixing of prices and wages and the division of profits, for all business relations. If he does not believe in the principles of Jesus for these relations, to say the least, he completely rejects the divinity of our Lord. To be sure, the honest church will ask of the labor leader whether he also intends in his work to act according to the principles of Jesus. It will ask the same of the workingmen. But the directing power in the Protestant churches, taken by and large, is rather the employer than the employee. Because that is the fact, and because nobless oblige, our Protestant churches should begin by raising their standard for the church membership of employers.

The only way in which we shall ever come to a conclusion in regard to tobacco is by scientific experiments. Dr. Robert L. Bates, psychologist of Johns Hopkins University, found by experiment that after smoking a cigar or three cigarettes blood pressure rises and the heart beats faster, but the rise in blood pressure and heart rate is only such as might occur normally from other conditions and both return to normal in from twenty to thirty minutes. Dr. Bates was not able to disentangle the effects of the tobacco and mental effects, for emotions and mental processes also affect pressure and heart rate. So the experiments add only a few grains to what is already known.

O thou that tendest the tree of life that God hath planted in thy garden be not weary in well doing, for surely thou shalt gather fruit at last!—Isaac Edwardson.

war—would just as certainly have happened between Italy and Greece, only now there was “machinery for peace.” What Sir Edward had not, Lord Robert Cecil and others had. There was the League of Nations. Immediately its officers got in touch with Italy and said quietly, but firmly, “You cannot act as sole judge and executioner in these matters; you must submit it to the judgment of others.” Publicly Mussolini shouted loud and fumed. Italy would withdraw from the League if the League interfered. Privately the Italian government saw that it meant the enmity and ostracism of the world did they not follow the League’s request. The end was that it was referred to a Council of Ambassadors, as the League suggested, and there was peace. The insulting elements of the ultimatum were eliminated and the whole thing is now under judicial inquiry and Italy has promised to withdraw from Corfu. The “machinery for peace” was there in the League, and the world got immediate peace.

Furthermore, the whole sentiment of the civilized world condemned Italy for this act. Why? They did not condemn Austria ten years ago in the same degree. Why now? Because the world knew the “machinery for peace” was there; that Italy was a part of it; that the world expected it to be used. The condemnation of Italy was universal because the setting up of the League and the World Court marked the passing of the old era when nations took the law into their own hands and marked the beginning of the new era when nations, just as civilized individuals, must redress their grievances by peaceable and orderly methods. This universal condemnation of Italy was one of the most encouraging events in the history of the world, and it was largely because of the existence of the League of Nations.

It was an interesting thing that the one nation which will have nothing to do with the League was, unofficially, of course, the loudest shouter for the referring of the whole incident to the League, and was loudest in its condemnation of Italy’s actions. There was hardly a newspaper that did not ring with condemnation of Italy, hardly one that did not begin crying, Why not go to the League? This is just what the League is for. In the opinion of the wisest statesmen of Europe the League prevented another 1914 under exactly the same provocations. But we Americans seem still to be more afraid of associating ourselves with the other nations of the world in such beneficent acts than we are of more 1914’s.

“Machinery for Peace” at Last

AT the end of that momentous and fateful week between Austria’s ultimatum to Serbia and the beginning of the Great War, when Sir Edward Grey strained every nerve to bring the excited nations into conference, and failed, the great statesman is said to have exclaimed, “There is machinery for war, but there is no machinery for peace.” It was one of the truest utterances ever made. Europe was reeling with armament. There were hundreds of thousands of soldiers; hundreds of thousands of tons of munitions. There were great navies and plenty of airships. There were thousands of trained generals and other officers. Everywhere there was “machinery for war, but no machinery for peace.” Hence the conflagration; hence the loss of life, the incalculable suffering and the chaos and impoverishment that is still with us.

Every lover of humanity should thank God that at last there is “machinery for peace.” For it is just as certain as 1914 was that had there not been, another World War would have been in progress to-day, after Italy’s ultimatum to Greece. The facts of the beginning were identical with those of 1914. Then Serbs killed Austrians; Austria sent an impossible ultimatum to Serbia, and then shelled Belgrade. Greeks killed Italians; Italy sent an ultimatum to Greece, and then shelled Corfu. What happened between Austria and Serbia—

The Recovery of the Bible

RECENTLY the British government ordered an inquiry into the teaching of English and the report of the committee has been issued. The committee appointed consisted of experts in education and in literature, and the chairman of that committee was Sir Henry Newbolt, who is himself a very distinguished poet and writer.

The report is in our hands, and we may say, without any exaggeration, that it is a fine piece of English literature. It appreciates fully the great language that we use always and misuse so often, and it points out how slowly this great language came into use as literature, with what difficulty it superseded the Norman-French, and then, at last, Latin, which was still the language of literature when Bacon and Milton wrote. It shows incidentally how very imperfect is the educational system of to-day, and how little chance the great bulk of men and women have of knowing anything of the greatness and glory of their language. This report-closes with a section on the reading of the Bible, and that section has evidently been adopted, almost in toto, from the lectures of Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, professor of literature in Cambridge University, who was himself a member of the committee. The committee adopted this section and presented it to the country with its authority. In this section on the reading of the Bible there are three main facts set out.

The first of them is that the Authorized Version, if a translation from an Eastern original, is a true part of English literature; it has, indeed, been finely described as "the most majestic thing in our literature and the most spiritually living thing we inherit." The second fact pointed out is that it is historically true that for five centuries and more no other English book has been so widely read or so closely connected with our national life, or has left so strong a mark upon the mass of our literature. The third fact, which is the most emphasized, is this: at the present time the Bible is less widely read and less directly influential in our life and literature than it has been at any time since the Reformation. The recommendation of this report is that English should be taught in the schools quite apart from the teaching of religion, and that in the teaching of English the Bible should be introduced; that it should be restored, as it were, as a great monument of English literature. That recommendation is sure to commend itself to the judgment of the Government and the Board of Education. It is a very curious thing that the neglect of the Bible should occur in a period when the interest in English literature has grown to be so general, and, when you come to reflect upon it, the reason is not far to seek. The reason why people reject the Bible is that it is a religious book; if it had not the reputation of being a religious book, and were taken simply on its merits as a great piece of English literature, everybody would want to read it, but the fact that it is a religious book determines its curious neglect in the life of the time. You know how it lies—the big family Bible—on the parlor table, where the people seldom enter and never use the Book; and you know how multitudes of young people, who are most ardently desirous to understand their literature and would be ashamed if they were ignorant of the other great piece of English literature—the plays of Shakespeare—let the Bible alone. They leave it for Sunday, and on Sunday they never read it.

Strange as it seems, then, the Bible is neglected because it is a book of religion, but there is some excuse for that neglect in the following fact: There is a view of the Bible which is directly a superstition, and how it came into existence is curious and difficult to explain; but it did come into existence, and it has colored the thought of men about the Bible unconsciously for generations. The superstition is this: that because the book is in a true sense the Book of God—that is, a book that tells you more about God than you can get from any other source—it was therefore a book written, as it were, by God, and that it was produced in so miraculous a way, taken down, according to the familiar term, by the "sacred pen," that it was impious to suppose there could be any mistake within its covers, any fault whatever. This idea, which took possession of the world a good long time ago, and was emphasized in the time of the Reformation, comes in between the people and the appreciation of the Book. It is interesting to inquire how it came into existence. It is chiefly the result of the Jewish superstition about the Hebrew Scriptures. The Jewish Church, in its later period, endeavored to preserve the sacred text by the fiction that the whole of the Mosaic law had been handed out of heaven by God to Moses, and that it was therefore infallible. It had a very valuable effect in preserving the text, but it was, after all, a mere fiction, a mere dogma. When that passed over into the thought of the Christian Church it was strengthened probably by the appeal made to the Koran by the followers of Mahommed. The Koran was presented to the world as a book given to Mahommed directly by God. It stood as a sacred volume which men might not touch without impiety. But the distinction between Christianity and Mahommedanism really was that Mahommed's law was in a sacred book and Christ's law was in a holy life. That distinction was lost sight of, and in order to make the Book, the Bible, equivalent to the Koran superstitious dogma about the nature of its production was disseminated through the Christian Church. There is nothing in the Bible itself to justify the view. There is nothing in the authoritative utterances of the Church to justify the view. No church council, no authoritative decree of holy men, has ever attempted to say about the Book what has been said about the Koran. It is a mere superstition, and superstition is, as we know, on the whole, the greatest enemy that religion has.

An error of this kind may be useful for a moment, but presently the peril appears; there is a great reaction, and the reaction is sure to come if, as in this case, you bring up people with the idea that this book is so literally written by God that there can be no mistake in it, that every statement it makes is authentic, and every opinion it expresses comes from the heart of God. The reaction is certain, and when people find anything which is inconsistent with the theory, instead of rejecting the theory they reject the book about which the theory has been formed. Here is the strange fact, that the Bible had been lost to a great number of English-speaking people, discarded and left altogether, not for any false statement in the theory, but for a false statement, a false theory, about the Book. History is inexorable in passing judgment on that lie. You may remember how, in the story of "Adam Bede," we are told that Adam Bede used to read the Bible and the Apocrypha. But he preferred the Apocrypha, he said, because, in reading this book he was at liberty to exercise his intelligence, and, according to the standard of those days, you were not at liberty to exercise your intelligence upon the Holy Writings. The people to-day, as complained of in the report, have lost the use of the Bible; they let alone that greatest piece of literature, because they thought they might not exercise their intelligence upon it; because they were led to believe that if they discovered a mistake or an inconsistency or an imperfect moral idea in the Book, they were uttering a blasphemy against its author, who was God. We think it is not fully understood that this has been the strength of all the infidel literature that has been published for a generation back. That literature had poisoned the minds of young fellows thirty years ago and caused them to grow up unbelievers and alienated from the Church. All that literature derived its power from this mistaken conception of what the Bible is. There used to be a book in those days that had a wide circulation among the working people. It was called "God and His Book," written by a person who was known as "Saladin," and written with enormous power. He was a man of great ability, and really great literary ability, but the whole of that book, which ruined the faith of an entire generation of working people, derived its plausibility from the claim that this Book, the Bible, is written, as it were, by God. It was the easiest task for a clever man like Saladin to take out passages, phrases, words, from the Book, and to hold these up as the Word of God, with the result that not only was scorn poured upon the Book, but scorn was poured upon the God who was supposed to be the author of it. Thus the Bible, in the generation that has gone, was exposed to peculiar difficulties. There were cross-currents which produced the result that this report deplors. On the one hand, the Book claiming to be divine, claiming to be the Word of God throughout, warned off the irreligious; they did not want to read it because it was religious. On the other hand, the theory about the Book put into the hands of its opponents a deadly weapon; it gave them an opportunity of holding up to contempt many parts of the great Book on the supposition that this was the actual manuscript of God. "How can we accept it or believe it?" they asked; and so scorn was poured upon the Book; it was called by the literary people "the Hebrews' old clothes," or by the common people "old wives' tales." It is highly probable that a large proportion of the manhood of the country to this day regard the Bible as if it were an "exploded" Book, as if its authority had passed and its value had gone. The result has been, as the report says, that "the most majestic thing in our literature and the most spiritually living thing we inherit" is left unread by a large proportion of the English people.

In those days there was a remarkable book, published by Professor Henry Rogers, which was called "The Eclipse of Faith," and he drew a picture, in very vivid language, of the world waking up one morning to find that the Bible had absolutely disappeared. Not a copy could be found in any library or any house; not a quotation could be found in any book; by some disastrous miracle the Bible had been wiped out of the language and the life of the people. The object of the book was to show the inevitable effect of this eclipse of faith upon the life and character of our country; it was presented as an improbable result of the indifference of that time. To-day it does not seem altogether improbable. There seems a distinct possibility, as this report recognizes, that the Book may vanish from the countries that it has made, and the secret of their greatness may be lost. Now, it is from this disaster that we have been saved by the whole movement of Biblical scholarship during the last generation. The scholars of that generation insisted upon treating the Bible exactly as they would treat any ancient literature. They said that, in order to understand it, it was necessary to examine it under the critical tests applied to all other books, and they worked upon the Book for year after year upon that principle. The result of their work has been to bring to light enormously valuable truths in the Book itself. The composition of the Book, the authorship and the dates of the several parts of the Book have been made clearer than they ever were before. Many an old superstition, many a gross error, has been removed, and these books, the Biblia, which we call the "Bible" or "the Book," stand before us to-day with a clearness and authenticity that they never had before. It is this faithful work of honest scholarship that has dissipated in the minds of those who think that superstition about the nature of the Bible—a superstition which has wrought great havoc in the life of our country—that has brought out the unique spiritual value of the Bible. It has shown us in what sense it is a revelation of God, and it has shown us how it becomes the guidance of our life. The result of scholarship on the Bible, which ignorant people dread and fanatics denounce, is to give us the Bible in its truth and power, and it is that which we venture to call "The Recovery of the Bible."

We are recovering it. When this report on the teaching of English demands that it should be taught in the schools as literature, we have new hope for the next generation. Look at the difference it will make! A generation will grow up familiar with the majesty of the intrinsic truth in this great Book, and with all the charm of its incomparable variety of style and contents. Here, in this English Bible, is the greatest prose that was ever written, and here is the noblest poetry that was ever uttered. Here are the most fascinating stories ever told and the most intensely interesting history that has ever been written—biographies which stand out like great master-pieces of painting; and here in this Book are the most impassioned utterances of great men, leaders and teachers, kings and statesmen; and here, best of all, is the long, slow record of the steps by which man came to know God, what He is and what He demands of them, and the way by which men can be reconciled and at home with God. This great reality of the Book is lost for the present generation. It has been taken from them by dogmatic teaching, which has put them off and prevented them from discovering it. A new generation will come in which there will be a chance for English to be taught, and, in teaching English, the school will teach them the Bible. Dogmatically treated, the Bible has had disastrous effects upon the mind; taught for what it is, presented in its intrinsic values and explained by those who understand, the Bible is the greatest thing we possess, the most powerful influence for forming character and shaping life, the truest way by which we can come on earth to heaven and from man to God.

The Sicilian brings to America his love of religious processions. But the Roman Catholic Church here, at least in New York, discountenances the carrying of religious statues in the processions. When the Brooklyn Italians celebrated the Feast of St. Rosalia recently the members of the congregation of the Sacred Heart of Jesus wanted to carry the church statue of the saint in the parade. Father Rugolo, the parish priest, refused their request. The ardent Italians straightway fashioned statues of Rosalia in plaster of paris and started off in their procession two thousand strong. The police stopped them with a request for their permit. They had one for the parade, but not for carrying statuary. So the Italians marched around to the priest's house. "Give us a permit to carry the statue," they demanded. "With your permit we'll parade in spite of the police." But Father Rugolo refused again. The crowd tried to rush the house. The single policeman was overpowered. The fire company a block away rushed to the rescue, and turned the hose on the crowd. Enterprising spirits cut the hose and the crowd rushed into the rectory. Only when sixty reserve police came to the rescue did the paraders give over the riot. Yes, there is need of some Americanization.

Dean Inge on the State

[This page is devoted to a weekly letter recordings the significant events and movements of the day from the Christian point of view]

LAST week I wrote on Dean Inge's "Confession of Faith," as given in his recent volume, "Outspoken Essays: Second Series." I remarked at that time that a considerable portion of this remarkable volume is devoted to the Dean's recent lectures on the Hibbert Foundation, "The State, Visible and Invisible." These five lectures are a book in themselves and are as bold and challenging as the chapters on religion, on progress and on the dilemma of civilization which comprise the other portions of the book. Many will not agree with the conclusions: every reader will be set to thinking over some of the most pressing problems of the day. The five lectures are on Theocracies, The Greek City State, The Medieval Ideal, The Modern God-State, Religion and the State.

The fundamental theorem on which the Dean builds up his lectures is that man has conquered the wild beasts, his fellow-men, and nature; but collectively he has never succeeded in governing himself. A good government would be the greatest of human blessings, but no nation has ever enjoyed it. Men try a government based on the ideals of absolute order, then one based on liberty, but in each experiment think no price too high to be delivered from it. The great ideal is to find a government where order and liberty are properly balanced. As yet man has not been able to attain to it. Dean Inge has not much faith in democracy. It degenerates into mob rule, or it goes into autocracy, such as we see in Russia—"The little finger of Lenin is thicker than the loins of Nicholas the First." To remedy all this men are continually reverting to theocracies. They have always been a method of escape from intolerable autocracies and democracies. One might almost guess from the Dean's lines that he would not be surprised to see the state in its discouragement and despair again handing government over to the Church.

Dean Inge realizes the value of a reasonable nationalism, but lays many of the ills of the world to it. Recent periods have been marked by the successive attempts of states in which nationalism was highly developed, intoxicated by their own strength, to destroy their neighbors. Excessive nationalism, like excessive individualism, seems unable to get on with its neighbors. Germany has been the most marked instance of what extreme nationalism leads to. Here the state becomes a god. We have the god-state. Dean Inge also insists that nationalism is artificial. The real cleavage in modern society is not in nationalism, but in other things—industrialism, class and religion. The cleavage between the hand worker, for instance, and the bourgeoisie is greater than that between citizens of two nations. Hence the war was a stupid reversion to passions which the world has outgrown and rivalries which are really obsolete. I am not sure I agree with the Dean here. I am inclined to think that when the real crisis comes nationalism is still a much more deeply rooted instinct than industrialism or class, or even religion.

The Socialists, with all their high-flown pledges of allegiance to their brethren covering a period of twenty years, all rushed pell-mell to the support of their nation the moment war was declared. The members of the Third Internationale would to-day forget all their big talk of solidarity in a minute should Russia and any other nation go to war. They would fight each other as members of the nations. Should the United States go to war with Mexico or Japan the capitalists and laborers would be side by side in a moment, forgetting all their antipathies. As for religion, it would stand no chance whatever, as the late war showed. Loyalty to Christ and Church was insignificant compared with loyalty to the nation. In fact, they became identical in every nation at war.

I was greatly interested in the lecture on Religion and the State. It has been one of the most engrossing subjects since the time of John Calvin. Hobbes revived interest in the question in England. Dean Inge comes back to it in a way that makes one realize that the last word has not been said on the subject. Whatever one may think as to the identity of Church and State, all must agree, says the Dean, that with human society—the state—as it is, organized apart from God, and being largely a system of co-operative guilt, there must be another society founded on the opposite principles, pledged to assist its members in the promotion of righteousness, peace and good-will, to offset the other. How far it is wise to identify the State and the Church is a question for deepest consideration. Dean Inge evidently dreams of a state built on such spiritual foundations and so actuated by Christianity in ideals that it might be identic with the Church. Let me close these reflections with the concluding words of his lectures, words which foreshadow that ideal state, which, if not the Church itself, yet prophesy that City of God in the earth for which we all are longing:

"But how far is it desirable to organize the moral forces of society into a visible corporation? Or, to put the question otherwise, is the separation of Church and State a permanent thing, or a temporary accident? On the one hand, we must emphasize that spiritual victories can be won only in their own field. The influence of the Church, as a spiritual agency, must be exercised upon the will and conscience of men; and a Church that leaves this, its legitimate sphere, and goes into politics, or attempts to use coercion, always comes out badly smirched and generally outdoes secular governments in craft and cruelty. On the other hand, if the secular State has no spiritual or ideal basis, it is deprived of the strongest and noblest attractions that might hallow the obedience and kindle the devotion of its members. Nor does the dualism of Church and State seem altogether natural. The old idea, that the Church is the nation under its spiritual aspect, is surely the right one. It is impracticable at present, partly because the spiritual Roman Empire, with its claims to super-national or extra-national obedience, still survives, a relic of the dead world-empire still vigorous in the midst of modern nationalism; and partly because the Church has split up into smaller corporations, none of which is capable of acting as the complete embodiment of the religion of the nation, while many prefer to stand outside all religious organizations. But if the State could once more place itself under the protection of religion—not in the sense that it should be controlled by priests, but that it should be recognized by all, as it was in Greek antiquity, as a moral institution, existing to promote the highest possible life among its citizens, we might hope to see a great improvement in the lamentably low standard of international morality, and a diminution in the sordid corruption, class bribery and intrigue which mar democratic politics. If politicians came to regard themselves as the priests or officers of a holy corporation, pledged to stand or fall by the noblest ideals, the whole spirit of political life would be altered, and instead of lagging far behind even the most mediocre standard of private morality, the State might set an example of high-minded justice, generosity and chivalry. There does not seem to be any reason in the nature of things why governments should be unjust in foreign policy, nor why they should appeal to the worst passions of the electors, their cupidity, pugnacity and mean prejudices. The evil is partly due to a mutual shifting of responsibility. The government says, 'We are only the servants of the people'; the people say, 'We must leave it to the government to tell us what is right.' Men of high character either keep out of politics or are driven out of them, and this is most true in the most democratic, which are also the most secularized states. The dualism of Church and State may some day come to an end, and the truths which underlie both Hebrew theocracy and Greek political philosophy may be brought together in some form of polity which can also find room for the ideals of a spiritual world-commonwealth and of a purified and exalted patriotism."

THE WEEKLY SERMON

The Cross of Christ and the Reconciliation of Nations

By Rev. Adolf Deissmann, D.D., of Berlin

Delivered at Whitefield's Men's Meeting, Tottenham Court Road, London, Sunday Afternoon, March 25

IN this season, at a time when international enmity is still raging in this unpeaceful world, we are met together, as it were, round the Cross of Christ. In the power of the Crucified I am venturing to speak of reconciliation, not only of the individual's reconciliation with God, which we experience in Christ, but also of the reconciliation of the nations with one another. From the beginning the Gospel claimed to be both a power for effecting reconciliation with God and a power for effecting reconciliation of the nations with one another.

Jesus himself, the bearer of the original Gospel message, labored at first among His own people, with a program of national evangelism; but under the impression of the desire for salvation and the sincere surrender of non-Israelites, He overcame the barriers of national religion and announced the day when many should come from the east and the west, from the south and the north, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of Heaven. He looked forward to the future of the human race and set His disciples a task in the words, "Ye are the salt of the earth; ye are the light of the world."

To its most perfect expression this fact was brought by the world-Apostle Paul. St. Paul is the one who has made the idea of reconciliation the historical slogan of Christianity. In one of his greatest visions St. Paul gives expression to the supreme work of Christ: "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." Not only a few individuals, nay, the world itself, all humanity has come from the condition of enmity with God to the condition of peace with God, and it is God himself who in Christ has achieved this work of atonement. For many among us these lines of Paul have long been familiar words; still we ought always to remember that it was in the days of Nero that an unknown tent-maker somewhere in Macedonia first brought together these thoughts for the ages: God, World, Reconciliation. The placing of these things into relation with each other was indeed a tremendous issue in the spiritual history of mankind. In heroic consciousness of their mission, Paul and the other disciples, following in the footsteps of Jesus, came to humanity proclaiming, "Be ye reconciled to God."

But Paul is carried yet further by his prophetic evangelistic inspiration. In the words to the Ephesians (2:13-16) he put down that monumental confession that in Christ even the reconciliation of hostile nations is achieved. Jews and Gentiles, he said, separated from each other by the middle wall of partition and bitter enmity, have been brought together and have been reconciled to each other in Christ by abolishing all enmity in His fellowship. For Christ is the body of which all are members, forming among themselves a virtual unity. Yet we must remember that Paul was speaking in the ancient East on an historical battlefield, where in ferocious cruelty one conquering nation destroyed another, only to be trodden down in turn by the Hittite, the Assyrian and the Egyptian. On such ground St. Paul dares to make the unheard-of statement, "In Christ Jesus there is neither Greek, nor Jew, nor Scythian, nor barbarian, nor freeman, nor slave, but all are one in Christ." The Apostle did not say this to deny or cancel national peculiarities. He himself was a Jew and proud to be one. He desired that the individual nations should not act as disintegrating powers, but that they might find the possibility of harmonious co-operation—"You are one in Christ."

If the glorious sublimity of this discernment could ever be excelled, it has been done in that prayer in the seventeenth chapter of St. John's Gospel, which, as if coming from another world, from out the sphere of transfiguration, ascended from the lips of the Master to the Father himself, as He viewed the great multitude from all nations—"That they all be one." In the same manner Christianity, when it became a Church, a hard-and-fast legal organization, and when it formed its baptismal confession, was once more acting upon

Three Hundred Thousand Dead Means a Hundred Thousand Refugees and Horrors

Such are the headlines from the daily papers of this week. They underestimate the calamity, for each issue tells a more desolate tale.

Among these thousands of refugees are several thousand members of the native Christian churches which were established by American Missionaries and are now in charge of native pastors. To these pastors will fall the care of these thousands of starving children.

While Americans should make no distinction in their quick work of mercy, and will not, yet these Christian children have a direct claim upon the Christians of America. They are our wards—our special care.

We want to cable $25,000 to these Christian pastors immediately to be used for these children.

Fortunately a very eminent member of our staff knows every pastor and church in Japan, he having spent all his life there as missionary and professor in Doshisha University. He has just returned from Japan where he has been on a visit to

We hope—we feel sure—that everyone who reads these lines will send us something immediately. Do not delay, for these children are in terrible straits.

If your Sunday School has not already made an offering for Japan will you not have it make one at once for the Sunday School children of Japan who are in dire distress.

Think, too, what an opportunity this is for creating lasting good-will between America and Japan. Japan will remember us forever as the good Samaritan who bound up her grievous wounds. If we feed her hundreds of thousands of children now, and help them to find homes, it will be worth more than all the peace treaties that could ever be signed.

the evangelical and apostolical principle, engraving, as it were, the Master's and His first witnesses' thoughts of union and oneness in brass and marble in the assertion of the One Holy Church. So much is sure, that in the creative age of the Gospel both are closely connected with each other: the reconciliation of the individual soul with God and the reconciliation of the nations among each other, and all this in Christ Jesus. Primitive Christianity is both a powerful popular religion and far-reaching religion for the peoples; religion for the individual soul, and religion for the world. The Greek called this world oikumene, therefore it is an ecumenical, missionary religion, knitting the nations together.

How are we to interpret this historical fact? Is it, as Nietzsche said, a slave revolt in the realm of morals which we observe? Have perhaps new men, with the unhindered fancy and greediness of the beggar, stretched out their hands for ideas, the world-wide importance of which it would have been the privilege of only a few mighty and solitary thinkers to grasp? So much is correct in this putting of the question that we have here ideas of "new" men in a peculiar sense, such men as Paul describes and represents in his own person—men taken out of the unholy sphere of death and sin by Christ and saved in Christ into the world of God. Having become new men by the touch of the living God, they have dared to accomplish the unheard-of, pointing out to this world a divine goal, not an earthly one.

It is only with bleeding hearts that we can realize to-day this glorious dawn of our history, and it is with bitter pain that we feel the taunt which proclaims the whole time of the late World War not only the bankruptcy of Christianity, but even the bankruptcy of the Christian idea of reconciliation. I concede that this period of hatred was a bankruptcy, not indeed of Christianity, but a bankruptcy of Christians. Especially the fact that the great Protestant nations have mangled each other constitutes an awful descent in the history of Christianity. Or was it perhaps nothing but the revealing of a wasting illness that had long existed? I would believe the latter to be true. What we have experienced in this time of self-laceration of Christian, yea, Protestant, nations, has revealed the fact that in all the long years before the war, in every Christian nation, we have not taken in real earnest one of the most vital revelations of the will of God.

Here we have to confess to a similar sin of omission as in the parallel realm of the social question. Much too late the churches, at least on the Continent, have recognized the gigantic task which has grown out of the upward striving of the working masses. Thus the social movement, to a large extent, has slipped out of the motherly hands of the Church, and has been shunted upon the track of religious indifference or even of utter enmity to religion. The Christian churches have indeed recognized and taken up successfully the new tasks for humanity which arose for them out of a century of technical progress, of world traffic and world policy, but solely as missionary labor intended for the benefit of the Christless nations. The churches have not, however, treated seriously their special mission to the nations themselves in the sense of the reconciliation of peoples and governments till now torn asunder by economic interests.

There remains, while we establish this fact, but one consolation. It lies in the observation that, corresponding to the contest of the nations which has passionately continued till this day, there is visibly growing a movement in all Christian lands, under the surface of general happenings, indeed, and therefore unnoticed by many, a movement which strives to fulfil at last the public mission of the Christian churches in the sense of the original Gospel of the solidarity of all Christian peoples. Concerning this movement, let me say, in the first place, this movement is a purely Christian and evangelical movement. There is a parallel movement, namely, the attempt to come to an economic understanding, which also operates with the idea of solidarity. This economic movement for reconstruction is so clear in its reasonableness and necessity that I do not need to speak a word about it. Its assumptions are just as evident as the recognition of hygienic solidarity of all nations, as, for instance, the fact that the fight against spotted fever equally concerns Poland and Germany. But there is no need of a church gathering to recognize the inevitable economic solidarity of the people, and to demand and promote its re-establishment. That hatred destroys commerce is evident even to a mediocre intellect. And it seems to me a blind delusion to imagine that a sick Europe can be made healthy by bayonets. We Christians want to promote, of course, every endeavor toward economical reconciliation, but the ideal reconciliation which we mean when speaking of the Cross and the Reconciliation of the Nations, is not synonymous with commercial reconciliation, but is based on deeper reasons and aims. It is obvious that, if the churches promote the inward reconciliation of the nations, this will make for friendly intercourse in industrial, commercial and scientific circles. But we advance this cause of reconciliation, not on account of commerce, nor for the exchange of goods, but because we are fully convinced that God wills it, that the crucified Master commands it.

This will of God, this command of the Master, has not for us the meaning of an outward legal authority, but is the conviction which our fathers called the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit, the overpowering truth innate in this idea of the reconciliation of the nations. That this old evangelical and old apostolical idea, as few others, gains the appreciation and sympathy of the broad masses of the laboring classes is for us no proof of its doubtful worth, but a hint to the Church that, while ceaselessly fulfilling her public mission, she will find new possibilities for reaching with her Gospel even the unchurched laboring classes.

I say, secondly, the evangelical movement for the reconciliation of the nations does not demand from any one of its promoters the surrender of patriotic convictions and feelings. Thus the German Christian who promotes this movement is not called upon to surrender any of his love for his humiliated country, but is to assist in the fight for a real peace, for liberty and international justice, which has become our special task since the peaceless peace of Versailles, and especially at this present moment when militarism faces an unarmed moral resistance. For the dignified struggle for international justice the Gospel itself places the weapons in our hands, and the friends of reconciliation in other lands have been the first to enter the lists for the cause of peace and righteousness.

I say, furthermore, from the viewpoint of the Gospel the position of the defeated nations, as far as this movement for the reconciliation of the nations is concerned, is far from unfavorable. God is not, as Voltaire asserted, on the side of the strongest battalions. God is with such as are of a contrite spirit. The present distress gives to the Christian people of Germany an opportunity that will perhaps never return, to be strengthened by the rare healing powers which by the secret of God's will dwell in every season of affliction. Of this the deeper thinkers, even among our former opponents, are fully aware, and they consider themselves, though the winners of the war, specially exposed to dangers of the moral order. Signs are not wanting of a deepening of the moral sense in all countries. Immediately before my departure from Berlin the other day I had a visit from one of our Conservative leaders. We spoke about the occupation of the Ruhr. Not a word of hatred came from his lips. His only request was that we should make this coming Good Friday a day of intercession and prayer for all the evangelical churches of the world, on which before the cross of Golgotha the living God should be entreated for the peace of Europe.

I wish to lay stress upon one other thought. The ideal of an evangelical reconciliation of the nations presents a program for the centuries and places us upon the never-ending path of arduous labor. Ours is not a fantastical program of sudden revolutions from one day to another, but we are conscious of a task to be accomplished, step by step, throughout the world's ages. The soberer we remain in the conviction that all we can do to-day must necessarily be pioneering work, the better we shall keep in view our last, far-off goal. Now the chief thing is that a beginning be made.

But how shall this beginning be made? Between the nations there stands to-day, just as during the war, the mighty power of ignorance. The nations know too little of each other, and stand under the fatal spell of silly generalizations and a pharisaical self-conceit. Distrust and hatred embitter the souls of men. Here the churches have the duty to improve the spiritual atmosphere, to create a basis for mutual confidence, to develop by small acts of personal endeavor a network of honest relations from people to people. After the war has drawn its lines of trenches and barbed wire between the peoples, Christianity has the great and peaceful task of building bridges and restoring good fellowship. Therefore, I said the other day to my Berlin students, when saying farewell, "There is for me a bridge to England, a narrow but a very solid bridge, and this bridge is the New Testament, is the Gospel." And I can add to-day, having experienced again for many days the Christian feeling of British fellow-believers: There are untearable bonds of inner Christian unity between Great Britain and Germany, as there are, I venture to say it, between German and French Protestantism.

May I tell you a wonderful experience I had here in England? I found in some of your hymnbooks a song which many of you well know—"Jesus, Son of Righteousness"—a German hymn translated into English by Jane Borthwick. The author of this hymn, Baron Knorr von Rosenroth, lived after the Thirty Years' War and is an ancestor of mine, being an ancestor of my dear mother. Just so, if you would come to Germany you would find a good number of British hymns in our Protestant communities. To build bridges and to restore good fellowship is the chief task of that powerful movement for unity which, at the present time, is actuating the Protestantism of the world. These movements began before the war, and I feel that I must remember in this church the name and the work of Mr. Silvester Horne, who was one of the most prominent spokesmen of this movement. I should like to quote some words of his which I found in a book which Mr. Maurice Watts showed me yesterday, which express the program of this movement. In "Pulpit, Platform and Parliament" (page 119) Mr. Horne says: "It is our belief that when anyone joins the Church of Christ he enlists under the flag of humanity, and that the banner of the cross is superior to all national and imperial emblems." So, in speaking about the cross and the reconciliation of the nations I hope I am following in his footsteps.

May I add a personal confession? I was in this movement from its beginning, long before the war, and then I spoke in the same spirit as I do to-day. The only difference is that now I am speaking with even greater conviction. Whether the special aims of this movement will be realized in a short time is not the main question at all. It is more important for the moment that by these endeavors earnest and leading men of the different nations come together for united effort, that they may learn to know each other, learn from each other, and that each one, in his place, gives room and furtherance to the spirit of good-will. Whether we labor in the World Conference on Faith and Order or in the Universal Conference for Life and Work, the indirect promotion of the reconciliation of the nations through these labels is at present even more important than direct occupation with the programs of these movements. The most valuable instrument for this task of ours is doubtless the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches. Is it quite accidental that in these three organizations we find engaged practically the same persons in both the Old and the New World? These active forces, small indeed in number, have, during the last four years, mobilized forces of reconciliation which are mighty in the Kingdom of God.

I have already touched upon a question which is continually put to us: What are the results of all this labor for reconciliation? This is a question which applies better to the economical problem. It is not a decisive question for the Christian who submits himself to the will of God and of his Saviour, but the question is admissible and the answer is this: There results for all who are engaged therein a good conscience, a God-sent enthusiasm of obedience to duty, lifting us high over the misery of the times, a joyful confidence, in spite of all the gloom of the present day. Sometimes, however, we notice more positive results. There is being formed something like a Christian public opinion which has already again and again come to the assistance of oppressed religious minorities. A really uplifting example of the reconciling power of the Gospel was the Synod of Riga on February 23, 1922. The Lettic Dean Irbe had been elected Bishop of Lettland by a unanimous vote. In his first address to the Synod he made the request that now the Synod would also give a bishop to the German minority of the country in the person of the Rev. Dr. Poelchau. The large assembly rose as one man and voted accordingly. While the gathering intoned the consecration hymn Bishop Irbe laid his hand in blessing upon the head of Bishop Poelchau. Here the saying in Ephesians that in Christ the enmity of the nations is taken away was literally fulfilled, and the German minority of Lettland found a safeguarded and prosperous future through the solemn action of the Synod.

May I mention also that wonderful resolution passed the other day by the British National Free Church Council in Bristol regarding the Ruhr occupation? Future church history, I think, will say that there has been in the midst of this time of bitterness a Christian public opinion concerning the great principles of international justice.

The World War was no triumph of Christ, but a new passion of Christ—a passion, however, upon which an Easter morning is sure to follow. At Saarbürg, on the battlefield in the beginning of the war, a roadside crucifix was hit and carried away by a shell, but, as by a miracle, the Crucified himself remained unhurt. Thus on the lofty base, partly broken, the august body of the Master remained standing upright; the Crucified had become a Living One. His arms, freed from the tree of the cross, seemed to stretch over the wide battlefield in blessing and adjuration alike. We understand that blessing and adjuration. It is, "Ye are the salt of the earth. Ye are the light of the world."

The Church's Answer to Labor's Charges

IN our issue of August 25th we printed a symposium of labor opinion on the Church. "The Homiletic Review" has asked representative clergymen as to their opinions on the principal points or charges made by some of the labor correspondences. These points were that the Church is holding too much aloof from workingmen; that it has no use for "the man in overalls"; that it is controlled by big business; that it is with the strong; that its ministers are unfitted by their occupation to understand workers; that their positions and source of revenue compromise them; that they are indifferent to labor; and that the Church, as one writer put it, "must 'bout face, clean house and weed out the followers of Mammon." Most of the clergymen regard the charges as mainly unfair. In our World of To-day columns on page 366 we make some comment on their answers.

E. Shailer Mathews, of the Chicago University Theological School, says of labor's charges:

They are a mixture of prejudice, ignorance and fact. What is meant by "the Church"?—Roman Catholic, Greek, Protestant, Jewish? There is great indifference to social questions on the part of some ministers, but organized Christian forces are constantly expressing interest in labor. "The labor movement wants the churches"—what can such a lump statement mean? Socialists, I. W. W., and so on, naturally are propagandists and cannot look impartially upon organizations that do not support their causes. But some of their charges exhibit gross ignorance of the facts—as the second group of replies clearly indicate. The message of Jesus needs renewed utterance. Spiritual, i.e., personal and not economic values are basal. And churches of all classes are certainly standing for them with varying intelligence on the part of preachers.

On the other hand, many congregations are composed of non-workingmen and are unwilling to have economic issues raised in the pulpit. This is a dangerous attitude and must be opposed so long as preachers emphasize the moral issues in economic life.

Dr. A. W. Wishart, a Baptist minister of Pittsburgh, replies to labor's criticism by questioning its representatives. Says he:

I think a distinction should always be made between professional labor leaders and agitators and the great body of sober, industrious workingmen. The criticisms of the Church come chiefly from the former class, and but rarely from the latter. Most of the workingmen, as you talk with them individually, recognize that it is not the province of the Church to espouse theories of social organization and carry on propaganda in behalf of them; that it is not the province of the Church to decide as to the relative merits of the open shop or the closed shop and to advocate either the one or the other; that the Church has quite a big enough field in trying to maintain the spiritual emphasis in all the relations of life.

Meanwhile, Dr. H. W. Holloway, Corresponding Secretary of the Benefit Board of the National Baptist Convention of America, writes:

Be it understood that organized labor does not constitute all of the laboring classes, but the thousands of laboring people who are not included in the labor unions do not seem to hold the same idea about churches and other organizations as are held by the leaders of organized labor. In fact, laboring people who are not members of labor unions make up the churches and are satisfied with its methods of procedure.

Dr. Christian F. Reisner, minister of the Chelsea Methodist Church, of New York City, protests:

The attacks of labor leaders sound just like the duty-dodging pleas of hundreds of church neglecters, both rich and poor, with whom I have talked. Most of them are unfair or the product of culpable ignorance, though some of the faults designated are inexcusable. Mr. Arend's loose charge about antiquated doctrines is the handy product of sheer ignorance. To pick faultful church leaders as samples of the whole group is as unfair as it would be for me to name a labor leader, as a sample, who boasted to me that he had not taken a drink for ten years until prohibition imposed on his personal liberty (and yet he favors the closed shop), since which time he had patronized bootleggers liberally, and yet that man heads one of America's new labor banks.

Dr. Frank J. Goodwin, minister of the Congregational Church, of Litchfield, Conn., observes:

The Church is not indifferent to the poor man. The "man in overalls" is as unwelcome at church as he is at a firemen's ball, and for the same reason—unfitness of dress. Unlike the floor committee of the ball, the Church would gladly help the man to get a better suit if the overalls are his all in attire.

Dr. John H. Willey, chairman of the permanent committee of the Lord's Day Alliance, tells us:

This talk of "overalls in church" is the merest moonshine. The church is not the place for overalls. The wearers of overalls have themselves decided that. Overalls are the badge of authority and the symbol of usefulness in the locomotive and the workshop. I wear them myself in the garden, but I put on something else to go to church, and so does every sensible man. If a workman should wear a pair to church I have no doubt he would be made welcome by his fellow workmen on the official board, but they would most likely think that he had escaped from a home for the feeble-minded.

The statement of the editor of "Labor Journal" that "in general the minister is raised and educated in another atmosphere than the workingman," and that men become ministers "because they are looking for something soft," suggests that this imaginative gentleman is talking through his hat. Nine-tenths of the ministers are sons of workingmen, and if Mr. Arends thinks that the ministry is a soft snap, let him try it awhile. As he is a good editor, I am sure that he would also be a good minister, and he would learn something about the business. Why, some of the clergymen edit a newspaper just to rest their brains and to use up the by-products.

Dr. E. Humphries, editor of the "Primitive Methodist Journal," asserts:

Many of the accusations are indiscriminating, unreasonable and unjust. Born and raised in a workingman's family; for fifty years pastor of churches in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, the mill cities of New England, and Brooklyn, New York, I claim to know something of the workingman's attitude toward the Church and the Church's attitude toward labor. The overwhelming majority in membership of all the churches I have served are working people and most of them members of labor unions. It is my candid conviction that the rank and file of the better element of the working people are not only not hostile to the Church, but are in hearty accord with and loyal to it. Some labor leaders who cannot twist the preachers round their little fingers and induce them to advocate their pet theories of workingmen's rights abuse the Church and berate the ministers. They do not represent the great body of workers in this matter. I know ministers, and I am persuaded that, with very few exceptions, there is no body of men more loyal to their convictions or more free and bold to express them.

Dr. James E. Darby, pastor of the First Baptist Church of New Brighton, Pa., answers us:

Pastors do understand the situation of the working people; most of them have been workingmen. After a boyhood on a farm I worked at two trades, on railroad grades and in mines, and in so doing found myself in a large and honorable company of ministerial students. Few ministers come from the homes of the rich.

Dr. C. L. Goodell, of the Federal Council of Churches, has been for twenty-one years a pastor in New York City. He writes:

The majority of the ministers of America come to their present places in the Church from the ranks of labor or the families of laborers. We carried our own dinner pail.

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, president of Temple University, Philadelphia, says:

The churches are composed of workingmen and their wives and daughters; therefore, they have a natural interest in the welfare of their own people.

Dr. Martin Summerbell, president of Starkey Seminary, Lakemont, N. Y., declares:

The major half of the men in membership in the churches of to-day are workingmen, as the labor men themselves say, the "men in overalls." Many of the officers, deacons and trustees of the churches that I have had in charge, or have been closely associated with, have been men who worked with their hands, and some of these have been remarkably devout and efficient in their Christian activities.

Dr. John Timothy Stone, minister of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago, writes:

In our own church, professional man and artisan, employer and employed, sit side by side and are friends.

Dr. Frank Mason North, corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, writes:

People think that there is some purposed neglect or fixed tendency which keeps the Church and labor apart. After a clear definition has been made of the Church and another definition has been given of labor, it will be found that the chief influences which prevent a more rapid increase of understanding and association for right purposes are ignorance and intolerance. Of these neither group has a monopoly. When one makes record that on the sixteenth day of August, 1923, the United States Steel Corporation began to put into operation the substitute for the twelve-hour day one wonders whether some of those whose strong opinions are found in the proofs you send me have ever heard of the Interchurch Commission of Investigation.

Dr. Ernest F. Tittle, minister of the great First Methodist Church of Evanston, Ill., writes:

Is it true that "big business controls the Church"? Of some churches, yes; of many others, no. And among these latter there are at least a few outstanding churches in which "big business" men sit in the pews and contribute largely to the pastor's salary, but make no attempt to control his pulpit utterances.

In the church, as out of it, there are two more or less clearly defined groups of persons. One group is, on the whole, satisfied with things as they are, and fears any radical change in the existing order. Persons belonging to this group are consistently "orthodox" in their theological, political and economic opinions. They believe in "the old-time religion," vote with the Old Guard, and damn the labor unions. In their thoughts the Church fulfils its functions when it prepares men to go to heaven when they die—and helps to maintain law and order and to protect investments while they live.

But there is another group of persons who are keenly aware of the falsehoods, ugliness and injustice in modern civilization, and are making every effort to realize on earth what, in the language of the New Testament, is called the "kingdom of heaven" or "the Kingdom of God." The number of persons in this second group is steadily increasing. Such men as Bishop McConnell, Father Ryan and Rabbi Wise are no longer "the exceptions." Nor are the Interchurch report on the steel strike and the deliverances of the Federal Council on the open shop and the coal strike "mere incidents." They show clearly enough which way the wind is blowing.

Albertus T. Broeck of the Reformed Church of Mount Vernon, N. Y., declares indignantly:

To say that the Church looks only to a world beyond and has no regard for social justice is nothing but pious humbug. When labor accuses the Church of having no message for the improvement of industrial conditions she betrays her ignorance of very significant movements in the Church to-day. There was a time when the Church's vision was centered almost exclusively on the hereafter. That day has passed. The attitude of the Federal Council of Churches on the coal strike and the open shop is not a mere flash in the pan. It is indicative of the ever-increasing interest of the Church in industry. The Church is the best friend that labor has to-day.

Dr. Alva W. Taylor, secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare, says:

Much of labor's criticism of the Church is justified. All too often prominent churchmen whose interests are opposed to those of labor have utilized pulpits and church organizations to fortify their positions. On the other hand, no other great organization, outside those whose specific business is that of promoting labor's cause, has so unequivocally espoused social justice. The basis of membership in the churches rests in religious sanctions upon which men may agree while disagreeing regarding their application to concrete, current issues. Thus we find within the Church the most ardent advocates of industrial democracy alongside believers in paternalism. Progress toward a social conscience is the definite tendency in the Church of to-day.

Dr. John M. Moore, pastor of the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church and chairman of the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of Churches, of Brooklyn, declares:

I am thoroughly in sympathy with organized labor per se and have not hesitated to declare my convictions from the pulpit and in private, even at the cost of antagonizing influential church officers. But I am just as much embarrassed by many of the actions of labor unions as labor leaders are exasperated by the action or inaction of specific churches and church leaders. Labor shows itself quite frequently to be as ready to profiteer and take advantage of its strength as does capital. The industrial conflict is too much a struggle for things and not sufficiently concerned about life.

Dr. Raymond Calkins, minister of the First Congregational Church of Cambridge, Mass., observes:

Of late the Church has been giving careful attention to social conditions and is deeply interested in social problems. It seeks to take sides neither with capital nor labor, but to enunciate the principles of one gospel of love, of justice, and of brotherhood. It may fall short of its ideal, but it holds that ideal steadily before it. I do not think that laborers ought to expect the Church to espouse any one social theory or program. That is not the Church's business. Its mission is to create, a truly Christian mind and temper.

Dr. William Horace Day, of Bridgeport, Conn., a former Moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches, reports:

We have found our Sunday evening forum—with a fifty-minute lecture—often on economic themes, followed by free three-minute discussion from the floor, has brought the pastor and the church in closer contact with organized labor than before. The forum is preceded by a twenty-minute worship: service—very simple—hymns, Scripture, prayer and benediction, with full choir in line with the suggestion of more simplicity and less dogma.

Dr. S. S. Hough, executive secretary of the Board of Administration of the United Brethren in Christ, remarks:

Letters from a Christian friend a few years ago illustrate the far-reaching effect of the principles of stewardship which are now being inculcated by church leaders. He first wrote: "The men in my shop are not interested in their work. They lack initiative. There is a hidden principle somewhere which, if applied, will solve the problem, and I have been trying hard for two years to find it." Later, with enthusiasm, this came: "I have discovered the principle and it works. I found it in the old book: 'There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.' We have conferred with the men and divided up the responsibility. They are now partners in promoting and partners in profit-sharing, and they speak of the factory as 'our plant.' The atmosphere and outlook are fine."

Dr. William A. Byrd, pastor of the Lafayette Presbyterian Church of Jersey City, says of labor's criticism:

The charges are based upon a wrong idea of the Church's office in the world, and the Church's duty is to show all men their sins and point them to a way for pardon. All social work is primarily to open the way to the hearts of men for that great spiritual work.

Bishop William M. Bell, of the United Brethren in Christ, says:

I would have the Church enter heartily upon the adventure of full service in behalf of the elevation of the masses, accepting, if need be, diminished income from any aggrieved sources. The Church should support every just contention of labor; should point out the faults, thoughtfully and sympathetically, of laboring people and capitalists; set out clearly and dispassionately the untried ideals of Jesus; lead in lifting up civilization to higher altitudes, so that hope shall take the place of hopelessness; good take the place of hate; efficiency take the place of slovenliness.

Dr. James R. Snowden of the Department of Systematic Theology at the Western Theological Seminary, observes:

Some of these labor leaders see and say that the Church cannot enter into the settlement of labor problems, for these involve economic factors which the Church was not intended and is not fitted to solve. Jesus refused to interfere in the settlement of a lawsuit between two brothers, leaving such matters to the courts, and thus exemplified a principle that should still guide the Church. The Church, however, should give no uncertain sound on the principles of economic justice and human brotherhood.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, the distinguished Disciples minister of Baltimore, tells us:

In the instances where I have had occasion to sit in cases of arbitration I have been impressed with the fact that the Church ought to be more active in the cause of social justice than in theological controversies, e.g. While I have usually found labor's demands reasonable, these problems must be adjusted in the light of public conscience, which is sadly in need of instruction, hindered, on the one hand, by division in the Church, and, on the other, by unspiritual leadership in labor.

Rev. James I. Vance, minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

The mission of the Church is, as I conceive it, not to tell employers what wages they should pay their employees, nor workingmen how many hours they should give their employers, but both what Jesus taught about life, insisting that both rich men and poor translate into all life's relations these teachings of Jesus.

Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, president of the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, tells us:

The only way to get at the "attitude" of the Church is to study the attitude of the individual minister; and I say emphatically that I have never known a minister of Christ who did not intend to be and wish to be a friend and helper of all other men, poor or rich, employee or employer. The Church's ministry is not a lucrative calling. The average income of a minister is so small that the representatives of leading labor unions would scorn to accept it. And yet there are thousands of these ministers who could draw large salaries and make fortunes in other employment if they chose.

Why call them hypocrites and parasites and toadies to the rich? Is it fair? Is it American? Is it manly or decent?

Perhaps some of them conscientiously hold opinions on particular issues which differ from those of labor leaders. Have they not a right to their own opinions? Is a brother less a brother because he refuses to endorse everything his brother does or thinks? In the controversies that have come up in this country, has all the right been invariably on one side? Has every labor strike been so absolutely right that there was no room for two opinions?

The minister has devoted his life in comparative poverty to fight for what he believes to be honesty, justice and love and right living on the part of men and women. As a human being he may make mistakes, but he is entitled to fair play and just judgment.

My own experience has been in Tennessee, where there has been little or no strife over labor conditions. I have many friends among the representatives of labor unions, and some of my vestrymen and best church workers are members of the unions. I have successfully arbitrated differences when strikes have been threatened, and I have been a friend to and have associated with groups of employees when they have been engaged in strikes.

I believe in labor unions and applaud the good they have accomplished; but I do not believe that every laboring man ought to be compelled by force to join a union.

Finally, Dean W. F. Tillett, of Vanderbilt University asks:

Why should the "Church" be one thing and "labor" another? Why is not "labor" inside the Church as much as the rich or the middle classes are found there? The Church is as open to them as it is to any body. Let them come in and crowd it and dominate it, and run things as they would like.

The Japanese law formerly provided that children between ten and twelve could be employed "on certain light and easy work." But the new Japanese factory act sets the minimum working age at fourteen. However, it allows children of twelve to work when they have finished the course of the elementary school or if they are in employment when the act comes into force. The working day for children under sixteen and for women is limited to eleven hours by the new law, one hour less than at present. Four-fifths of the workers employed in the Japanese spinning mills are women or girls. Most of them are young. Out of 177,476 women and girls employed in 1919 nearly eighty thousand were between fifteen and twenty years old and nearly thirty-three thousand were between twelve and fifteen.

The Charity Organization Society of New York tells of a beggar who is in the custom of dressing excellently and appealing only to men of apparent wealth. The beggar tells the men that in spite of his good looks he has been two days without food. He explains, "My only asset is my appearance and for it I have sacrificed the necessities of life." So the kind-hearted New Yorker is very likely to place a bill in the man's hands. As a matter of fact, investigation shows that the miserable mendicant has averaged a daily income of thirty dollars through his begging. If he "works" three hundred days a year his annual income comes to nine thousand dollars, which might do something to explain his prosperous appearance.

Let but the word of Christ have the place it ought in a soul and it will show itself, as the wisdom from above doth in a good conversation. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the surface of it altered! How gay and pleasant doth it look when it is covered with green.—Matthew Henry

The Church and Agriculture*

BY PROF. JAMES E. BOYLE OF CORNELL UNIVERSITY

SINCE the country church is made up of farmers, the economic problems of American agriculture must claim a share of the preacher's attention. And in most sections of the United States which I have visited, particularly during the last five years, the farmers are frankly not getting an income which constitutes a high standard of living wage. Last summer I found in the State of Illinois that plasterers were hired at two dollars an hour, and farmers at two dollars a day. With such farmers it is an economic impossibility to hire and pay a first class preacher. Now a prosperous agriculture means in this modern day a scientific agriculture. And a scientific agriculture means knowing and practicing proper soil improvement, crop improvement, seed selection, tillage methods, and those other steps in farm management which contribute to a permanent agricultur. No matter how run-down the farms are, or how many so-called "abandoned farms" there may be in a neighborhood, the good earth responds to right treatment and prosperity can be restored. Now I am not arguing that the preacher be an expert in farm management and agricultural economics, but merely that he have the vision of a better economic day for his farmers, and know how to mobilize the various forces that will help realize this vision. It is a problem of using the knowledge and talent and expert training of others. The preacher ought to work hand in hand, first of all, with the county agricultural agent, in promoting better agriculture. Thus, I was recently calling on the county agent in one of the eastern counties in this State, and I asked him who was his warm supporter. He replied that it was the Episcopal minister of the village. The preacher ought also to co-operate with the Home Bureau agent of the county in reaching the farm woman, and with the Boys' and Girls' Club leader of the State Agricultural College at Cornell in promoting projects among the boys and girls. He ought to read one or two farm papers. He ought to manifest a healthy, intelligent interest in the subject of farming, and use every opportunity to bring together for meetings, conferences, lectures, school fairs, contests, and so on, those who are practicing and promoting better farming. In short, instead of holding aloof from farming, let him do all he can to exalt and dignify the science of agriculture. For instance, in the "London Times" last week I found but two names of Americans, and one of these was that of a California farmer. And he was reported in this great world newspaper because of his achievements in farming. And I wondered when I read this article whether or not it was the country preacher who put this bit of news on the wire that finally reached around the world. When recognition and appreciation like this comes to our farmers who excel we will have more farmers who achieve excellence.

The Rural Church in Massachusetts

BY TALLMADGE ROOT

Executive Secretary of the Massachusetts Federation of Churches

THERE are four hundred churches in Massachusetts towns of less than twenty-five hundred inhabitants which cannot give a pastor living salary and "a man's job" unless they combine in federated churches or federated circuits. This is the inference to be drawn in summarizing the results of the Interchurch Rural Survey. This survey in Massachusetts was only seventy-five per cent. completed when the movement abruptly closed its work. Certain data, however, have been summarized by the State Federation of Churches and are sufficient to prove that, in comparison with other States, especially with Ohio, where the survey was completed, Massachusetts has no neglected fields, less overlapping and a fair equipment for practically all rural churches.

Yet the survey clearly shows where these churches are weak and points to the necessary remedy. The average salary paid by 471 churches—$861—is only half of the "minimum subsistent budget" for a family of five—$1,733, as estimated by the National Industrial Conference Board in June, 1920 for Worcester, Massachusetts. The average membership of 496 churches was eighty-nine, of which the "net active" membership was sixty-two. This membership is not adequate to pay a much larger salary and meet other expenses. Nor do these churches furnish "a man's job." The average attendance of 425 churches was sixty, which is barely more than twenty per cent. of the average seating capacity—296. Such congregations are not inspiring, nor do sixty-three families form an adequate field.

How is it possible to command the strong community leaders which the rural church requires to-day without combining churches? That this remedy will avail is proved by the fact that in Middlesex County out of sixty-two churches only four paid adequate salaries of $2,000, and of these three were "federated." In Ashland, three churches, that separately could pay only $900, combined, pay over $2,000 and parsonage, and have nearly $3,000 for general expenses. A similar triple combination in Sandwich has outbidden a city church in field and support. Federated circuits, as in Sturbridge, give a pastor for the entire township. The telephone and automobile have practically annihilated distance. Equip a pastor with these and give him a lay assistant and it will be easier for him adequately to cover thirty-six square miles than under old conditions to cover six.

The survey has also shown us just what needs to be done. In Tompkins County, New York, church statistics have been studied over a thirty-year period. From 1890 to 1920 the church membership grew from twenty per cent. to twenty-seven per cent. of the population; but church attendance fell from twenty-one per cent. to sixteen per cent. Measured in purchasing power, which is the only fair comparison, the total income had fallen thirteen per cent. and salaries nineteen per cent. Only benevolences had increased, no less than seventy-three per cent. Why a gain at this point? Is not this the line in which, for a generation, there has been systematic and concerted education of our church people? Modern methods of "church evangelism" have similarly increased church membership. Now the thing to be done is to apply the same system to the cultivation of church attendance and of liberal giving to meet the rising standard of community service.

Such systematic and patient effort requires adequate leadership by pastors who can and will stick. We must adopt means to secure such leadership. If we do this the rural ministry offers a greater opportunity than a city church does at present.

Some Missionary Teachings of the Prophets

ISAIAH 60:1-3; JOHN 4:10, 11; MICAH 4:1-3; ZEPH. 3:9.

"And nations shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising."—Isaiah 60:3.

TOWARDS the pagan world the common attitude of Israel's ancient prophets was far from that of the modern missionary. Who were those heathen folk that encircled the nation on every side, Egyptians with their cruel task-masters, hostile and jealous tribes of Philistia, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Phœnicia with her Jezebel women, pillagers and oppressors of Babylon, who were they but ruthless and implacable enemies—foes of God's people, and by the same token of God himself? What use had Israel's Holy One for such vile folk except, indeed, as a scourge for chastening his wayward people, after which they could not fail to be overwhelmed in irreparable ruin? Hateful neighbors were those old pagans—dangerous enough as foes, but as friends, pouring into the Hebrew mind the subtle poison of their idolatries, far more dangerous, for those were days when Israel's faith was but a flickering torch and her national life, in consequence, in ceaseless peril.

In such circumstances it is no wonder that the religious leaders showed little zeal for the conversion of heathenism. Jeremiah's stern words doubtless voiced the common sentiment when he prayed, "Pour out thy wrath upon the nations that know Thee not, and upon the families that call not on Thy name; for they have devoured Jacob, yea, they have devoured him and consumed him, and have laid waste his habitation." Not much of the Greenland's Icy Mountain spirit in that! It sounds more like the "Hymn of Hate"; but that is the way they used to feel about the heathen in Jeremiah's time.

Nevertheless, there were three great elements in the faith and life of Israel which made them inevitably, though often unwittingly, a missionary people, and these same three things are the supreme assets with which the missionary of Christ goes forth to his work to-day.

1. They were in possession of the truth about God. Take the Hebrew conception of the divine nature and character voiced by their lawgivers, prophets and singers as it has come down to us in their incomparable literature—take that sublime idea and compare it with the notions of divinity that obtained among other ancient nations. These believed in deity, one and all, not an atheist among them, but deity of what sort? The pagan gods were as the sand of the sea for multitude. Gods innumerable, both small and great, gods for heaven and earth, for land and sea, and for the nether world demanded worship. Every hill, wood, stream, field and fountain had its own divinity; every nation, every tribe, every household had its personal and private collection of gods. With this welter and confusion of divinities contrast Israel's great thought, one only living and true God, maker of heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, King of kings and Lord of lords.

The pagan gods were a shifting lot, immortal only as compared with men. They had their beginnings, might some time come to their end and sink away, giving place to younger gods. Their powers were limited, their wills capricious. But He was the eternal God from everlasting to everlasting. Of Him the psalmist sang:

"Of old didst thou lay the foundation of the earth;

And the heavens are the work of thy hands.

They shall perish, but thou shalt endure:

Yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment;

As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed:

But thou art the same,

And thy years shall have no end."

Again the pagan gods were material, were like something that you can see and handle, so that they were worshiped under all sorts of imagery. Sun, moon and stars were adored, leaping fire, the sacred ox, the ibis, the crocodile, all manner of birds and beasts and creeping things. The prostrated themselves before distorted images of man and beast and many a hideous, grinning idol became the object of their adoration.

The work of men's hands.

They have mouths, but they speak not;

Eyes have they, but they see not;

They have ears, but they hear not;

Noses have they, but they smell not;

They have hands, but they handle not;

Feet have they, but they walk not;
